Religious Experience.

We find in the ChristianRegister, the Unitarian paper of this city, an account of the religious and spiritual experience of Mr. Nathan Soule, of Duxbury. We make a few extracts.

When I was a child, and had arrived at an age that enabled me to take some interest in the conversation of people, and heard my parents and others speak of the wonderful power of God in sustaining this earth in the air, and causing it to revolve around the sun, I was lost in wonder, and it led me to often think of the perfections of God.

After advancing something more in age, so that I could read with some understanding of the subjects that were treated, I perused the works of some writers on divinity, that gave such a glowing description of the eternal sufferings of a large part of human beings in hell fire, as at times to make me regret that God had called me into existence. Then it was impossible for me to feel that love to God which I should have felt had I had a better understanding of the Scriptures.

At length, on reading the psalms of David, where he says that the pains of hell got hold upon him, and that his soul was delivered from the lowest hell, I became convinced that the pains of hell were not what they had been represented to be; and that if they extended into the future world, it was only on the mind. This gave me great consolation, and increased my love to God.

I took the erroneous impression when I was quite young, that God was unreconciled to us, and that our Saviour was more merciful, interceding for us; and I remained in this erroneous view until a very few days after my conversion. My soul was so drawn out in love to my Saviour that my desires and prayer were directed more to him, than to God. But I soon felt a check in this, for he came to do the will of God in reconciling us to him.

Soon after these powerful exercises of my mind had subsided in a great measure, I felt persuaded that but few comparatively speaking, were wrought upon in so powerful a manner. This led me to feel that strong desire for the happiness of all our fellow creatures, the world through, that I never felt in so great degree before. I thought if there was one in the universe that would be eternally unhappy, and I knew it, I could not be perfectly happy myself. I read the Bible with an anxious desire to see if there was any thing in it favorable to my wishes. After reading it from time to time, it appeared to me that all parables and figurative expressions that we do not fully understand, are swallowed up in the comprehensive promises of the Bible. Of which a few I will quote:—

'For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.'

'Who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.'

'For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.'

'The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death.'

'And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may by all in all.'

These promises and many others in the Bible in connection with them, so strongly represented the final restoration of all the human race, that they have been my greatest consolation.

But while the promises are so consoling to us, we must pay due regard to the threatenings on account of our wilful sins and neglect of our duty. Of which a few I will quote:—

'For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.'

'He that despised Moses law died without mercy under two or three witnesses. Of how much sorer punishment suppose ye shall be thought worthy, who hath trodden under-foot the Son of God, counted the blood of the sacrifice wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the spirit of grace.'

From these threatenings, in connection with many others in the Bible, on account of our wilful sins, and neglect of our duty after we have received the knowledge of the truth, and our duties are made plain to us by the striving of the Holy Spirit, (and we not yield to, and discharge them,) I think we have every reason to believe we shall be left in darkness and fear, and in the language of Scripture, that our last state shall be worse than our first; and how long it will continue, is not for us to know.

It is well known by many that there have been instances, after they have been brought to feel it their duty to confess their Saviour before men, by the ordinances that he has commanded, who have neglected it, and lost all peace, and darkness has come over their minds.

There is an obituary notice of this description, of a Mr. Eli Mygatt, in the second volume of the 'Union,' 63d page, published in New-York, in 1836.

As there are many that do not see the 'Union,' I will state from the obituary, that Mr. Mygatt is represented as sustaining thro' life, a good moral character, and was respected by all who knew him. But he neglected to make a public profession of religion after feeling it his duty, as he has since told his friends, and since that time his mind has been much exercised respecting the future state. He became melancholy—said he had neglected his duty—that he had not borne his cross after his Saviour—that the Lord had forsaken him, &c. And finally he hung himself.

And I think it is evident from divine revelation that every individual will suffer for his wilful sins, and neglects of duty, in a just proportion to the light that each individual has on his mind.

But respecting our spiritual experiences (which are made very light of by some,) St. Paul tells us that there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the spirit it is given to every man to profit withal.

And it appears that the manifestation of the spirit is given to many in childhood; for when they are quite young, they are brought to have some spiritual understanding of the Scriptures; and as they advance in age, they grow in grace and feel that it is by grace that they are saved thro' faith in their Redeemer.

Then again it appears that there are others who have no spiritual understanding of the Scriptures when they are young, and some not till the eleventh hour.

But we are all saved by hope until near the time when we receive that faith which is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen,

Elder Knapp's Retraction.

We are now authorized to state that the action against Mr. Knapp, for slander, has been withdrawn; and as much has been said and published in reference to the matter, we have been careful to ascertain the facts of the case. The truth of the whole business is this: When Mr. Knapp enquired on what terms the matter could be compromised, he was told by Mrs. Handy that she did not wish his money, and that if he was ready to do what was right in other respects, she was willing that the whole business should be settled by the payment of all her expenses; and as at the time the precise amount could not be ascertained, the sum of two hundred dollars was named as the amount to be paid before the action could be withdrawn. These conditions have been complied with. Thus has this 'affair' been compromised, and we think the Elder has been fortunate in thus concluding the matter. And it is not improper to add, that with his feelings towards Unitarians and Universalists, we have no reason to opine that he would have dealt so leniently by one of their number as he has been dealt by. He had denounced the Unitarian and Universalist sects in toto, and in the most unchristian language; but when a single Universalist—and a woman too—meets him and demands with authority his proofs, he shrinks, and thoroughly retracts what he has asserted!

The 'affair' looked threatening at one time, to be sure. Mr. Knapp said the Lord would take care of him and his cause! and the Lord has taken care of him in a different way than he expected, as he has been made to do right. He prophesied that the severest judgments of heaven would overtake all those who were concerned in getting up this suit against him before they could bring the case to trial, or before they could harm him! His friends have joined him in denouncing the slandered lady and her advisers, and threatening them with temporal injuries—the loss of business and the like. The Meeting-House and the pulpit were said to be too sacred to be polluted by the footsteps of a civil officer, notwithstanding the slander complained of was uttered in the pulpit! All these things have been met with firmness—and here is the result.—Let it be a warning to those ministers who trust too much to the defence of the pulpit, and who prostitute the sacred function to the basest purposes. 'Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor,' is a command to be observed as strictly by the clergy as the laity—in 'the Church' as in 'the world.' It is too much violated by and in both. 'Stand in awe and sin not.'

'Providence, Dec. 4th, 1842.

Mrs. Stella Ann Handy,—Madam,—Having made a statement at a public religious meeting, from the pulpit, (on information which I received from another person,) which has been understood as an impeachment of your character; and having at a subsequent meeting, and as soon as I was informed that said statement was not true, so explained the same as to entirely prevent, as I supposed, any injurious effect upon your character, I am now anxious to confirm the explanation then made; and therefore I assure you that I intended then and do now intend to make a fair and full retraction of every word and syllable that I uttered, which could possibly be taken as an accusation against you or as an impeachment of your character, and I wish it to be so understood.

Respectfully your ob't serv't,

(Signed,) Jacob Knapp.'

Mr. Knapp alludes, it will be perceived, to a person from whom he received certain 'information,' and this person, he says, is a Baptist clergyman of this city, whose name need not be given; but we cannot but add the hope that he will, from his own sense of justice, as fully retract what he privately said, as Mr. Knapp has retracted what he publicly said, prejudicial to the character or reputation of Mrs. H.—Gospel Messenger.

Conquest of Babylon.

The Babylonians were the first of the provinces which endeavored to shake off the yoke of servitude; but their attempt cost them extremely dear. Darius encircled Babylon with his army so as to cut off all supplies from the adjacent country. The inhabitants exerted a savage resolution. All who were useless for the defence of the city, and served only to consume its provisions—the women, the old men and the children—were strangled by a public decree; each head of a family being allowed to preserve one of his wives, and a maid servant. At length, after a siege of twenty months, Darius won the city by a treacherous stratagem. One of his captains, mutilating his visage with hideous wounds, fled, as if for safety, to the Babylonians, and offered his services to avenge himself against Darius, who had used him thus inhumanly. The man was trusted by the credulous Babylonians with a high command, of which he availed himself to open the gates to the Persians. With aggravated meanness and cruelty, Darius impaled alive three thousand of the principal citizens.

Endless Misery on a Death-bed.

The following letter from Br. Tharp adds another to the already numerous list of renunciations of endless misery on the death-bed. It is no uncommon occurrence for persons to embrace Universalism at the near approach of death—it is the only doctrine that can carry a soul out of the world with peace and joy.—Star in the West.

New Richmond. Ohio, Nov. 9th, 1842.

Br. Gurley:—We often hear it reported by the Partialists that certain persons have renounced Universalism on a death-bed; but strange as it may seem to them, an instance the reverse of this has occurred recently in Kentucky, six miles south of Covington. It was an old and quite intelligent man by the name of Copen, who had been a reformer or Campbellite and a believer in the soul-chilling dogma of endless wo. But last September being taken sick and supposing that the hour of his dissolution was near at hand, he began to examine his old theory in order to find something as a basis on which to rest his hopes of future blessedness, and to console him in this trying hour, but in vain. All was dark and dreary; not a ray of light by which he could look beyond the tomb with any other, save sensations of horror and despair;—and he found nothing to console him until he became a believer in the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation. The writer being on a preaching tour in Kentucky, and staying all night near his residence, was sent for next morning to come and see him. I accordingly went and found him rejoicing in hope of the glory of God; he spoke of a deliverance from this bondage of corruption not only of himself but also of all the human race with rapture and delight, and I may truly add, he rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

This was the consolation which all might enjoy in the trying hour of death but for the God-dishonoring dogma of endless woe. O why will men persist in traducing the character of the Father of mercies and drive peace and happiness from the bed of death? The doctrine of a world's salvation alone can assure us of a future blessedness. This our friend Copen has fairly proven. Br. Egelston, in a letter to me says, that Br. Copen retained his confidence to the last and died tranquil and happy, often speaking of the interview which he had with me; and could I have known his situation I should have rejoiced to see and administer to him the consolations of the blessed God. But he has gone home to his Father's mansion in heaven; and blessed be God! he has escaped the heart-rending anguish which every believer in the doctrine of future misery must experience in the hour of death. O it is a lasting evidence of the sustaining power of Universalism to calm the troubled soul in the solemn moment of death. Blessed faith! heavenly consolation! The Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces! Amen! Hallelujah! Yours in the bonds of affection,

C. B. Tharp.

Slander.

Of all the evils that ever infested the heart of the Christian, that of slander is most to be lamented.

Personal slander is the Bohon Upas of the Christian world, planting its loathsome root in the soil which should be consecrated to the sweet plants of kindness and love. I have seen a beautiful female in the morning of life, calmly and quietly pursuing the flowery path of duty; her heart went forth instinctively, to love all that is beautiful and pure in nature—all that is kind and holy in the affections.—The untamed bird—the nameless but eloquent wild-flower—the grief-stricken and lowly penitent from the ways of vice, were objects of her peculiar love and care. Worldly riches and aggrandizement she had not, but hers was the priceless inheritance of a good name, the only boon really worth possessing, and the deprivation of which naught else on earth can ever supply. Can there be found, even in the registers of crime itself, a heart black enough to desire to deprive of this one sacred treasure a fellow-being? Dreadful—dreadful as this may seem, yet it is even worse. The spirit capable of so foul a deed is concealed beneath the specious garb of friendship, and the voice that can utter a calumny so base, has been tuned to the sweet accents of love. I have seen the beautiful temple of her fair fame demolished and herself cast out, to crave the 'cold charity of an unfeeling world,'—a wretched and despised wanderer. O if there is one sin that will bring down the judgment of God in unspeakable horror and anguish upon the perpetrator, it must be this; and though the slanderer may think himself secure in the hushed whisperings of his own foul breast, yet, 'Doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he that keepeth thy soul doth not he know it? and shall not he render to every man according to his works?'

Is it not a painful and soul-sickening truth, that this besetting sin has found its way into the ranks of those who profess to follow the meek and lowly Jesus, even those who acknowledge him as the Saviour of the world? They too, rejecting the spirit of their religion, have cast 'firebrands, arrows and death' over the fair heritage of an unsuspecting victim.—But blessed be God this can never be the fruit of a belief so divine, it can never be the practical tendency of a faith which encircles in the arms of love every child of humanity, and requires its believer to be perfect, even as God is perfect.

Oh let not woman, the 'fairest workmanship of her Maker,' ever indulge in this degrading sin, let her not pollute her lips with the utterance of words that may injure a fellow-being. Hers should ever be a ministry of love and goodness, and if she has professed a faith in the perfect system of God's impartial love, how peculiarly ought she to walk forth—a being of love and mercy, wearing ever upon her placid brow that heavenly signet—the 'ornament of a meek and quiet spirit,' striving to heal dissensions rather than create them. Thus will she honor the pure name of her holy religion, and let all who have taken upon themselves the name of Jesus, avoid above every thing else the sin of slander, for, 'The lip of truth shall be established forever, but a lying tongue is but for a moment.'

Something quite amusing.

Br. Whittemore,—While in Mason Village, N. H. a few days since, I was informed that Mr. Mason, Baptist minister of the village, was most critically explaining the 24th chapter of Matthew to his Bible Class; and that Mr. M. and another gentleman of the village, had been holding a kind of a discussion on Miller's theory; Mr. Mason making the reserve that his opponent should not use any Commentary, while he himself would use 'Elder Himes.' Mr. Mason, I believe, is not a thorough-going Millerite, but would like to use the craft to catch a few birds in his snare.

I was not a little amused when I was told how Mr. Mason explained the 28th verse of said chapter to his Bible Class. 'For wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together.' The 'carcass,' he said, meant Christ, and the 'eagles,' his followers. When I heard this I laughed outright, and thought they must be joking. But they said, this was really his exposition of the passage.

I would inquire of the Baptist Theological Institution, how many such wonderful expositions of Scripture it would take to entitle Mr. Mason to the honorary appellation of D. D? What a wonderful exposition! The 'carcass,' a just representation of the 'Messiah,' the 'Wonderful Counsellor,' the 'Mighty God,' the 'Everlasting Father,' 'Jesus Christ,' the 'Prince of Peace,' the 'Saviour of the world'!

The fierce and devouring 'eagle' representing the meek and humble followers of the Lamb of God. Indeed, the Baptist denomination must feel proud of Elder Mason. And will he not soon be located in some of our popular cities?

Our learned and pious fathers of the church, who poured out their lives in writing Commentaries on the Bible, tell us that the 'carcass' means the body of the Jews in Jerusalem. And that the 'eagles' mean the Roman army that carried an eagle on their standard. Wheresoever the carcass is, (the main body of the Jews,) there will the eagles (the fierce and devouring Romans,) be gathered together. It was so. The eagles (Romans) gathered together, and preyed upon the 'carcass' (Jews) until they devoured it.

And I would now say in conclusion, that the minister of whatever order that explains Scripture as Mr. Mason has done in this instance, either from ignorance or craft, is unworthy of the confidence of any people.

Politeness.

Not long since in a journey to attend the Rockingham Association, we inquired of a gentleman (and he was truly one) the most direct way to Haverhill. He very readily and courteously gave us the desired information as he supposed. We thanked him, and drove on; but had not gone far, before we saw this gentleman riding at full speed towards us. We halted. He came up, asking our pardon for misdirecting us, for he had discovered soon after we left him that he had by mistake given us the wrong direction. As soon as he discovered his mistake, he hurried back with all haste to set us right.

We thought him very much of a gentleman before, but this new evidence of his goodness of heart, drew from us all a warm expression of praise, and we all with one accord set this down as one of the best specimens of true christian politeness we had for a long time met with, and we decided he must be a gentleman of the first order.

How often do we meet with men, in our journies, who will hardly deign to answer civilly our inquiries about the best roads, &c. and should they direct us out of the way, will take no pains to set us right again, and suffer us to go miles out of our direction, and subject us to a great deal of trouble.

Then how pleasant it is to meet with one like the above. Should I ever see this gentleman again I shall know him, and thank him anew, for this piece of true politeness. I admire such traits of character, in man or woman. I wish I could see them oftener, and I hope the reader of this will feel a stronger desire than ever, to 'go and do likewise.'

The gentleman I have since learned is a clergyman; I am glad of this, Br. Whittemore. Every good clergyman will be polite. Would that every clergyman were good.

Br. Whittemore,—We have had fears that the Miller excitement would prove a great hinderance of the spread of gospel truth—that it would end in unbelief and infidelity. But we are now more than half inclined to think that it will be overruled for good. When Joseph was sold by his brethren into Egypt, they meant it for evil, but God overruled it for good. So we trust it will be with Millerism. We already begin to realize that such will be the happy effect. In a certain Orthodox Society, not fifty miles from your city, where a part of the Church have become Millerites, there is much trouble on this wise. Their minister beginning to be alarmed for his own safety, he undertook to reclaim some of the leaders of his Church, who had been carried away under the Miller excitement. He told them that Miller's theory was false. But these wandering sheep would inquire of their pastor whether the 24th chapter of Matthew did not (according to Mr. Miller,) teach the coming of Christ at the end of the world. He told them no! it only referred to the destruction of Jerusalem. They inquired, 'Do you feel sure that the 24th chapter of Matthew only refers to the coming of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem?' He said he did. 'Then, (said they) you have long preached to us what you were sure was falsehood, for truth! You have always taught us that the 24th chapter of Matthew sets forth the coming of Christ at the end of the world. Now you come on to the Universalist's ground, and are sure that it only refers to the destruction of Jerusalem!'

Here is trouble enough in this Orthodox Church between the pastor and these strayed sheep. Some of the leaders of the Church have already said, 'If the world does not come to an end in 1843, it will prove Millerism false; and then there will be but one denomination under the christian name that can stand, and that is Universalism.' The 'signs of the times' are favorable—priestcraft is exposed—Millerism will be overruled for good—a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand. A. M.

Safety in Believing.

'Still, sir, you must admit, that when the balance is struck between our respective sentiments it is decidedly in my favor; for should my doctrine be true, your situation is highly dangerous; whereas no evil consequences can accrue to me from a disbelief in your system, for if it should prove true, still I am safe.'

Safe! is religion, madam, a mere expedient for safety? But admitting your views of God are correct, I then have mistaken his character. I have ascribed to him more benevolence than he really possesses. I have supposed him so much a friend to his whole intelligent family, that, eventually, he will destroy whatever is inimical to their purity and happiness. I have thought that his infinite holiness would ultimately triumph over all rebellion and sin. Well; I am mistaken. I have given more beauty to the portraiture than is to be found in the original. Will my Maker be very angry with me for this?—Truly, madam I cannot perceive why one faith should render our condition in the future state more safe than another. Truth is adapted to make us happy, wise and virtuous, while we are under its influence and direction; and, consequently we are safe as soon as we come into its possession—safe from ignorance vice and misery—safe from all the evils which tread upon the heels of error. One would be tempted to think that the divine Being had given you believers in endless misery, strong reasons for distrusting his goodness. You seem to think it a very insecure ground of dependence, although in theory you admit it to be infinite; but you are very apprehensive of its failure, and are continually dreading explosions of his wrath. Hence you require to be fully secured against such an event; and hope, in the case of its occurrence, to be able to shelter yourself in some way which you can regard as safe!

'If, on reaching the eternal world, I should find your doctrine true, I shall, of course, be most painfully disappointed; for I shall find millions rolling in waves of ceaseless ruin, with whom I contemplated rejoicing in the realms of blessedness and love. Still I may be safe; for opinions cannot be admitted to form the basis of the different allotments in that world. If, on the contrary, you should find my doctrine true, your disappointment will be of the most pleasing character, for you will find no widows and orphans in the kingdom of bliss, whose husbands and parents are in the flames of hell. But the truth and beauty, and amplitude of that most cheering divine promise, shall then be matter of astonished and enraptured sense! In thy seed shall all the families and nations of the earth be blessed!'

'As thy Day, so shall thy Strength be.'

When adverse winds and waves arise,
And in my heart despondence sighs,
When life its throng of care reveals,
And weakness o'er my spirit steals,
Grateful I hear the kind decree,
That—'as my day, my strength shall be.'

When with sad footstep memory roves
Mid smitten joys and buried loves;
When sleep my tearful pillow flies,
And dewy morning drinks my sighs;
Still to thy promise, Lord, I flee,
That—'as my day, my strength shall be.'

One trial more must yet be past,
One pang, the keenest and the last;
And when with brow convulsed and pale,
My feeble, quivering, heart-strings fail,
Redeemer! grant my soul to see
That—'as her day, her strength shall be.'

The Bible contains all I Profess.

The truth as it is in Jesus, is attacked on every hand, not by avowed enemies only, but by professed friends; and, if I mistake not the signs of the times, the Universalists have a testimony to bear for God's truth, far surpassing in importance any service to which they have hitherto been called. I deem that they have been preserved and strengthened hitherto that they may in the coming struggle, stand forth as faithful witnesses for Christ. I speak but the language of one who is fully persuaded in his own mind, when I say that the Universalists alone can take up the Bible and say, 'Within this book is contained all I profess: this is all my salvation and all my desire. I need no reference to councils, the fathers, or church history. Here, and here alone, I rest my cause; this only would I practise!

Proofs.

All those who are earnestly seeking for Scripture evidence of Universal Holiness and Happiness, and whose hearts are truly open to conviction, are directed to peruse Psalm ii. 7–9; Isaiah xlv. 22–24; Isaiah xxv. 6–8; Isa. lv. 10, 11; 1 Tim. ii. 1–7; 1 John iv. 14; Hebrews ii. 9, 10; Ephesians i. 9, 10; Philipians ii. 9–11; Colossions i. 19, 20; Acts iii. 19–21; Romans viii. 21; Romans v. 18–21; 1 Cor. xv. whole chapter.

The above quotations form but a small portion of the proofs that may be brought to support the doctrine of Universalism, but they will be found amply sufficient to convince the candid inquirer.

'He that believeth not, shall be damned.' Mark xvi. 16. 'Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name—that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father.'—Phil. ii. 9–11.

Will every one confess what they do not believe? But suppose they do confess; they may do it, and yet suffer. True, but will you tell me how it will add to the 'glory of God,' for sinners to blaspheme his holy name thro'out eternity? They may confess and blaspheme, but will it be done to His glory?

Do not yield to misfortunes, but meet them, on the contrary, with fortidude. You can only subdue adversity by bearing up against it.

'If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me if the dead rise not?'—1 Cor. xv. 32.

The ancient nations were very cruel. They had fights in buildings called amphitheatres, between men and men, and between men and beasts. The Spaniards and Portuguese, to this day, have fights between men and fierce bulls. The men try to stick the bulls all over with darts, and torment them and then kill them; and the bulls, in revenge, try to kill the men, who, three or four in number, are on foot and horseback; and sometimes they tear out the bowels of the poor horses, or knock down the men and rip them up, and trample on them, when the unfeeling people, made barbarous by these shows, cry out 'bravo, el tauro!' that is, 'well done, bull.'

Among the Romans, parties used to fight against parties, for diversion, and kill one another; or, as before noticed, single combats took place of man against man, where one of the party was slain; and men used to fight with lions and other wild beasts. For this purpose they had large circuses, or a sort of theatre, built in the form of a half circle, one of which had seats to hold the immense number of one hundred and fifty thousand persons.

Some suppose that the apostle Paul was, as a punishment for preaching against the heathen gods, made to fight really with wild beasts; but we are not always to understand words of this kind in their full meaning. You know I have told you, that 'dogs' sometimes means wicked men; and the connection or sense of the next words will generally show us what is meant; so here, by beasts, the apostle means fierce, persecuting men, who would have killed him if they could, for preaching the gospel; and by his boldly withstanding them in the name of Jesus, he had, as it were, fought with these 'beasts at Ephesus.'

Now, the apostle Paul preached everywhere about Jesus, and the resurrection of the body, at the last day; and as, before Christ came, this was not very clearly made known, even to the Jews, and not at all to the heathen, his doctrine seemed new, and so wonderful, that men would not believe it. The apostle preached it because God had plainly convinced him by his Holy Spirit that it was true; and so he says, 'If I have been fighting, as it were, with wild beasts, and hazarding my life, I should gain nothing by this, did I not feel sure that my God is with me always; and that my body whatever cruelties I may suffer here, shall rise from the grave by the power of Almighty God, who is able to raise it.'

What a shocking thing it is, that men should hate those who try to do them good, and carry them news which should cheer their hearts, about the salvation of Jesus, and the resurrection to eternal happiness through grace divine.

To the Infidel.

Others may denounce your crime in bitter language, or scorn your folly. I compassionate your intolerance. It is greater than I can express. Prosperity has no true joys for you, and the sting of adversity is envenomed by despair when it reaches your heart. Does philosophy cheer you in suffering and sickness? Does it console you for the loss of one dear to you—a relative—a friend—a daughter—or a wife? Does it soothe the pang inflicted by the ingratitude, contempt or perfidy of the world? Will philosophy ever teach you to be content amidst privations and poverty? Where the Christian bends under the weight of his sorrows, there is a hand that props him; where he sighs and weeps, there is a voice that comforts and encourages him. But how unlike him you are! how truly unfortunate! how could you be happy! you are 'without God in this world,' you hold no communion with him by prayer, and you never bend the knee in homage to his supreme and adorable essence.

Your understanding destined to live by the truth which it rejects, can have no steadiness, and, necessarily, floats between doubt and stupid ignorance. Your heart, which is 'alien from God,' finds no object on which to fasten itself—none that answered its deepest and sweetest want. How could you be happy! You never look up to Heaven, where shines the bright star of Hope.

A certain pride of mind may bear you up in the eyes of men, but you feel that it is hollow—and, after a brief effort to appear what you are not—you soon sink into wretchedness. Have you no misgivings? is your understanding perfectly blind to the proofs of Religion? is your breast steeled against its threats, or callous to its promises?—Catholic Advocate.

Fickle character of the Athenians.

Plutarch records many anecdotes which strongly mark the fickleness of the character of the Athenians. The following may serve as an example: Themistocles intimated in public that he had formed a most important project, but that the strictest secrecy was to insure the success. The people answered, 'Let it be told to Aristides alone, and we will be regulated by his advice.' Themistocles acquainted Aristides that the project was to burn the fleet of the combined States, then at anchor in perfect security in the harbor of Pegasus; a scheme which would give Athens the absolute command of Greece. Aristides told the people that nothing could be more advantageous than the project of Themistocles; but nothing at the same time more unjust. The whole assembly with one voice, cried out, 'Let us have nothing to do with it.' This was to feel and to decide with rectitude and propriety. But mark a striking contrast to this honorable decision. A few years afterwards, it was proposed to the Athenians to violate an article of a treaty formed with the allies of the republic. The people asked the advise of Aristides, who, in the same spirit as before, told them, that the counsel was advantageous, but unjust. The upright statesman had no longer the same influence; the perfidious suggestion was now unanimously approved of.

We every day sacrifice principles which we esteem, through fear of being blamed by people whom we despise.

There is a chord even in the most corrupt heart, that vibrates to kindness.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 24, 1842.

First of January.

This is an important period to us. It is the close of the first half year, and consequently the time when many of our subscribers make payment for the volume and save the sum of fifty cents. Our terms are

'Two dollars per annum payable IN ADVANCE; to which FIFTY CENTS will be ADDED, if not paid within six months from the time of subscribing.' See Terms, published in every paper.

We desire to return our thanks most sincerely to those who have paid us. The Legislature of Massachusetts meets on the first Wednesday in January, when the Representatives will come to Boston from almost every town in the State.—Doubtless every Representative, unless prevented by sickness, will be here at the opening of the Legislature. They have always been willing to bring us any thing our subscribers may have to send. Our office is in the central part of the city (37 Cornhill) and it will be but little trouble to them to call.

Such as prefer, can hand the money to the Postmaster, who will doubtless send it without expence. This will be the best for those out of the State. Such as owe for several years, if they cannot send the whole, are requested to send a part.

Christmas.

To-morrow is the 25th of December, and the day will be observed very generally in the Christian Church as the anniversary of the Redeemer's birth. We wish a happy, profitable christmas to all our patrons. Let us go to the house of God, and offer up our grateful orisons to Him who is the author of our salvation. Next Saturday will close the year 1842. It will then have passed, never to return.

'Time speeds away, away, away,—
No eagle through the skies of day,
No wind along the hills can flee,
So swiftly or so smooth as he.'

It was some five or six weeks ago, that we perceived all the Boston papers were teeming with accounts of a pamphlet which had just appeared in this city. The design of it seemed to be, so far as we could judge from the notices, (for we had never seen the pamphlet itself,) to prepare the public mind for an effort to induce the Legislature to make indemnification. About the same time appeared a flaming handbill, which was posted at almost every corner of our streets, calling the public attention to this pamphlet. What can all this mean? said we. There is some object not yet revealed. Somebody, we knew not who, had made this publication at the present time for a purpose which, so far as our knowledge extended, had not been disclosed. Moved by such thoughts, we put the following brief paragraph into our columns. We were not aware that we were about to disturb 'principalities and powers.'

'The Catholics without doubt are designing to make a very vigorous effort at the coming session of the Legislature, to obtain a grant from the State to reimburse them for the loss of the Convent in Charlestown. A pamphlet has been published, and very widely circulated through the community, favoring such an object, and handbills we see are posted in different parts of the city calling attention to that publication. These extraordinary efforts mean something. There is an untiring spirit at work somewhere, which will soon develope itself more decidedly. For ourselves, we do most devoutly pray that there may never be another NUNNERY in Massachusetts.'

This brief article from our pen brought out an article of some length in the 'Daily Advertiser and Patriot,' signed 'Justice.' We know not who this Mr. 'Justice' is. He knows perfectly well who we are; but he prefers to remain incognito. We always love to know who a correspondent, or an opponent may be; and we should have been better pleased therefore, had he given us his real name. Report says he is a Counsellor of some note in Boston; and as he has requested the favor, we here insert his article entire:

'A word of answer to the above. The Catholics have nothing to do with the movement now making on the subject of the Convent. They have abstained, wisely, and it is to be hoped they will continue to abstain, from such efforts. The pamphlet referred to above consists of certain Documents, now republished and circulated, by the exertions of persons of various denominations and of all political parties, not one of whom is a Roman Catholic; and if the editor of the 'Trumpet' had looked into the pamphlet, he would have seen it stated by its Editor, that up to the time when it was to issue from the press, no Roman Catholic here or elsewhere was aware that it was about to be published. It will be a great mistake, if it is supposed that the Catholics are the only persons who feel a strong interest in this question. It is not pleasant to parade individual names, as the promoters of philanthropic enterprises; but if the 'Trumpet' is very curious to have them, it could be furnished with a list of names connected with this 'vigorous effort,' which would show that the opinion, that the honor of Massachusetts is concerned in this matter, is not confined to Catholics—that the lapse of time has brought to the minds of men eminent in Church and State, a deep conviction that we are in the wrong, sadly in the wrong, to neglect this subject as we have done.

The devout supplication of the 'Trumpet,' that there may never be another NUNNERY in Massachusetts, if designed merely as an expression of general theological dissent, is all very well. But if in the emphasis of those capitals, there was sent a lurking insinuation that the Nunnery which was here, was in any way an objectionable institution, the editor of the 'Trumpet' must excuse us for requesting him to look into the pamphlet. There exist in it abundant means for the people of this Commonwealth to disabuse themselves of any prejudices they may have had against that Nunnery, and it is time they had done it.

'As to the probability of the Convent being rebuilt, if the Legislature grant an indemnification, it is pure and perfect unfairness, to trammel the question of the right to such indemnification, with any such considerations. These considerations pervert the judgment, embarrass the understanding and rouse up the prejudices of the community, in array against the real question of public justice. That question is a very simple, though a very grave and important one; it is very plain, though of great magnitude. Whether the Convent will be rebuilt, if the loss of the owners should be made good, is what no one has a right to assume—and we think the strong probability is that it would not be. The nuns are mostly dispersed into other lands, and some of them are gone where 'the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.'

'There need be no disguise about the pamphlet alluded to by the 'Trumpet.' It consists chiefly of a Report made by a committee of the citizens of Boston, in Faneuil Hall, which sate two or three weeks after the riot, investigated the whole affair of the mob, and the entire character, religious, domestic, moral and educational, of the Convent. It has appended to it the signatures of citizens to whose testimony and opinions the community cannot refuse weight. It has lately been re-printed, and sent by mail, gratuitously, to every member of the past and the next Legislature, and to the Press generally. That it might be accessible to others, one thousand extra copies were printed and put on sale at Mr. Redding's, in State-street, at the low price of six and a quarter cents a-piece. The handbills alluded to by the 'Trumpet,' are Mr. Redding's show-bills, in which he chooses to advertise it.

'The 'Trumpet' is respectfully requested to copy this article, and oblige its obedient servant,
JUSTICE.'

'Justice' says, 'The Catholics have nothing to do with the movement now making on the subject of the Convent.' What movement? There is evidently some movement going on, beyond the mere publication of this pamphlet. May the public be informed, in explicit terms, what that movement is? Whether the Catholics have any thing to do with it, or not, we cannot say; we have not charged them with any participation in getting up the pamphlet. We expressed the opinion that they design to make a vigorous effort, at the approaching session of the Legislature, to obtain a grant from the State. They have done so in former years. What they have done once, they may be expected to do again; unless they have been persuaded by others to stand back from motives of policy.

Whether the Commonwealth is under obligation to rebuild the Nunnery, is a question we have not touched. If they are under obligation to do any thing, it is to rebuild the Nunnery.—The claim of the Catholics should be considered with just as much favor as if it were preferred by any Protestant sect. We have no enmity to the Catholics; we think as well of them as we do of some of the Protestants. But if a claim is to be put in for an indemnity, let it be done openly.—Covert and underhand operations sometimes spoil a good cause. It is a singular spectacle that presents itself to our eyes. All the Catholics, who are surely the most interested in the case, stand in the back-ground, looking on with intense interest; but, as if by agreement, not uttering a syllable. Forth comes a wonderful pamphlet, with the handbills before referred to, which certain men, for reasons best known to themselves, are thrusting into the eyes of the community. There is something here which we cannot explain. It looks to us very much like contrivance; and is not so deserving of attention, in our humble estimation, as a direct petition from the Catholics for the Commonwealth to rebuild the Nunnery. Moreover, what causes this sensitiveness on the part of 'Justice' and his coadjutors? If we had smitten him in the face, he could not have turned upon us with more feeling. We published a brief paragraph in our humble journal—a paragraph of only a dozen lines—when lo! the columns of the 'Daily Advertiser' and 'Boston Atlas' are both opened upon us with no small degree of spirit. There seems to us something suspicious in the very form of this matter. We say again, that we should regard the effort as more honest, if it came directly from the Catholics themselves. They are able to attend to their own business.

We have a word in regard to the pamphlet.—The recent edition we have not seen, and of that we do not speak. We are told that 'it consists chiefly of a Report made by a Committee of the citizens of Boston, in Faneuil Hall, which sate two or three weeks after the riot, investigated the whole affair of the mob, &c. &c.' We would not offer a syllable that can be construed into a justification of the mob; but we have often asked ourselves, what interest this Boston Committee had in the matter more than that of any other city or town? and who put the honor of the Commonwealth into the exclusive keeping of that Committee? The Nunnery was not in Boston, neither was it in the County of Suffolk; the town of Charlestown, in which the Nunnery stood was abundantly able to investigate the matter, and to them that duty belonged. We said at the time, that this Boston Committee undertook a work of supererogation. What was it to Boston (seeing the offence was not committed in this city) any more than it was to any other city or town in the Commonwealth? It seems to us there are a class of men here, who think they were born to preeminent influence; and that they must be the managers and directors in all things.

'Justice' has convinced us that our first suspicions were well founded. We believed that this pamphlet, and the handbills aforesaid, were the precursors to a vigorous effort to move the Legislature. Such means may be compared to lobby members, who hang upon the skirts of the legislators proper, seeking some favorite object.—'Justice' now confesses, that the pamphlet has been 'sent by Mail, gratuitously, to every member of the past and the next Legislature.' Here the secret comes out. What further evidences do we need, that an effort is to be made at the approaching session to obtain a grant from the State? What we first conjectured, is thus rendered almost certain.

Who pays the expence of these pamphlets? If the Catholics have no agency in the matter, there must be an unaccountable and very unusual generosity on the part of those who supply the means.

We join most fervently in execrating the conduct of the mob who destroyed the nunnery. We pronounce no opinion as to the duty of the State to rebuild. We concede to the Catholics all the favor any portion of the community can claim; but what they do, they had better do directly. But we must repeat the language before used, 'We do most devoutly pray that there may never be another NUNNERY in Massachusetts.'

East-Boston, Mass.

The corner-stone of the Universalist Church in East Boston was laid week before last. After the stone was put in its proper position, fervent prayer was offered by Br. S. Streeter, and an Address made by Br. S. Cobb. The 'Freeman' says, 'The builders are making good progress.—The cellar wall is completed; the brick basement for vestry and stores, is fast going up; and the frame will be raised in a few days.' There must be some men engaged in this business, who know how to make things move forward.

End of the Half Year.

This number of the 'Trumpet' is 27, the first number of the second half of the year. It is now the time for all to pay their subscriptions, who desire to pay in advance. 'A word to the wise is sufficient.

The Free-Will Baptist Failure.

This subject continues to excite the public mind. We have rarely heard of any thing of the kind more disgraceful. In the zeal to build a meeting-house with a very high steeple, and otherwise to make a great show, how many poor girls and deluded mothers have been cajoled out of their all. Truly, the words of the Saviour are verified again, 'Woe unto you, hypocrites, for ye devour widows' houses.' How are these poor creatures to get their money back? Alas, they will never get it. The Corporation, in effect, has failed. Perhaps the meeting-house will be sold under the hammer; but it will not bring one-third of its cost. The Free-Will Baptists perhaps will buy; and thus they will legally secure the high-steepled house, and pay about 33 cents on a dollar of their debts. This is what they call piety, religion, a zeal for God. What a mockery!—Pure religion is to 'visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction,' not to rob them, but to do them good. How little do the Baptist revivals promote pure religion.

By their fruits ye shall know them.

The orthodox are very fond of saying, when they speak of Universalists, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' We have no objection to being judged by such a rule; and we trust others are ready to be judged by it also. If so, they will find no fault with the publication of the following article from the Cincinnati 'Star in the West.'

MORE FRUITS OF ENDLESS MISERY.

A Rev. Mr. Valentine, called Elder Valentine, was brought in guilty of seduction, in the Court of Common Pleas, in this city, last week, and fined $500. The 'Daily Message' contains an exhortation to the Rev. sinner, as he is called, to be careful and live hereafter as his Master has directed. The whole system of endless misery, as at present advocated, leads to such crimes, as well as others. The doctrine of pleasure in sin, and repentance to take away the guilt in a moment as it were, is the rock on which many of both people and preachers make shipwreck. The preacher has been employed we are told, in the vicinity of the city.

Books for the Gift Season.

☞Christmas and New Years is fast approaching. We have, therefore, taken pains to provide a stock of books suitable for gifts, which we will sell at low prices. Please call at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, and examine them. In addition to the large variety of valuable books which are found advertised in our columns, we name the Rose of Sharon, 1843, the Merchant's Widow, Poetry of Woman, Christian Graces, Poetry of the Seasons, Stories from the German, all new works. Christian Comforter, 2d Edition, Law of Kindness, Shanty the Blacksmith, by Mrs. Sherwood, which so far as any theological tenets are involved, favors Universalism. Bacon's late work on Experimental Religion; the miniature Life of John Murray; Pocket Bibles, &c. &c. Besides the above, we have juvenile books of all sizes—just what are needed for children—not filled with trash, but with useful information.

Elder Knapp's Retraction.

We sometime since informed our readers, that the Baptist Elder Knapp, had been arrested and held to bail in Providence, R. I. for slander of a lady's character, in one of the Baptist pulpits in that city. It was fully determined, by the friends of the injured lady, that he should not be shielded from justice, unless he should make a full acknowledgement for his insolence. By looking at the first page of this number, the reader will see that the work is finished. Knapp has humbled himself, made an acknowledgment, and paid all the expences that have been contracted. Is not this a singular predicament for a divine? First, he stood up in the sacred desk, and uttered what proved not to be true. He then refused to make proper satisfaction, until he was compelled by the near approach of the trial, to do so. Perhaps he thought that a weak, feeble woman, would not pursue the matter to a legal crisis.—He hoped, perhaps, she would falter, and he should escape. But she had a good cause, and because she was abused, by a man in high life, she found many friends. Such a case demanded notice. If such attacks on private character, in the sacred desk, under the name of religion, may be tolerated, to what might the evil grow? Elder Knapp has, in this case, met his just deserts. It is said that the person who breathed into his ear the foul reports against this woman was a Baptist clergyman. If it were possible to get legal proof of this fact, justice should be required of him also.

There is an article in the 'Boston Recorder,' of last week, on 1 Cor. xv. 22. 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' This passage seems greatly to trouble our partialist brethren. The article refered to, is from the pen of Mr. Storrs, of Braintree, as we judge from the signature, and from the spirit which is manifested. We will perhaps notice it next week.

Letter to the Editor.

The following letter from a young gentleman in one of the interior towns, will be interesting to our readers.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—As our town will send no Representative this year, I am obliged to write by mail. I enclose $3. It was all I could raise; but you shall have more soon. O Br. W., if you knew the pleasure that I, and my wife take in reading the Trumpet, you would not think I am careless about the pay; but would impute it to the proper cause—poverty. But I hope others will pay you, if I do not. My poor wife has buried her father. He had been a professor for over 40 years, and yet he did not die happy. He often told us, that our doctrine would not do to die by; you will not be happy, said he, in the dying hour. But how was it with him, poor man? He was afraid he had no interest in Christ; and his anxiety made large drops of sweat stand out on his face. My poor wife was almost distracted, because he had not the comforts of the truth. But we believe he has gone to the God who made him, and we do not sorrow as those who have no hope. O precious gospel, what a treasure! How soothing to the wounded heart. O that I had the privileges I once enjoyed in attending public worship; but I am now far, far away from any Universalist Meeting-House. 'My soul longeth, yea even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God.' O how can Universalists, who live in the midst of gospel privileges, neglect their precious opportunities? How can they do it? Talk to them, talk to them, Br. W. on this subject. Don't fail to have the Trumpet come regularly.

Yours in love, P. H.

The Universalists of Harvard, Mass. are about making arrangements to build a good and commodious Meeting-House. We have long desired to see a Universalist house crowning the beautiful eminence on which the village is situated.

Opposition in New Hampshire.

The 'Congregational Journal' is out with quite a long article in opposition to Universalism. An unusual effort is to be made to arrest the progress of the truth in that State. It will avail nothing except to help us along. The more the truth is opposed, the more it will prosper, by the blessing of God. We are not afraid of opposition therefore; it cannot harm us. The spirit of the editor of the 'Congregational Journal' is well known. The public will remember his fierce and unfair attack upon the late United States Convention at Providence, and the gross and palpable misrepresentations he made of the doings of that body.—Universalists are a plain spoken people. What they mean, they say. You will not find them using words of oil, for the sake of deceiving mankind, but they will speak out openly and fairly their own convictions.

The 'Journal' says,

If Universalism is taught in the Scriptures, is it not surprising that not a single Biblical scholar has found it there? As the question is one which revelation alone can answer, nothing but the voice of the Lord is competent to decide it. But where is the individual whose general scholarship and intimate acquaintance with the original languages of the Bible have secured to him the confidence of men of intelligence and learning, who pretends that future retribution is not taught in the Scriptures, and that retribution eternal? A few third or fourth rate linguists, like Loveland and Balfour, may torture the original words of the Bible to favor their own prejudices; while the world over, not one Biblical scholar gives the sanction of the Scriptures to the speculations of Universalism! Can it then be of truth and of God, when the testimony of all competent witnesses is against it?

The modesty of the man who wrote the above paragraph is worthy of admiration. What is the tenor of it but this? WE the believers in endless damnation, are the wise men; WE are the learned; we are the critics, and all the rest of the world are fools. It may be said to them as Job said to his pretended friends, 'No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you.' Universalists are said to be 'third or fourth rate linguists, like Loveland and Balfour.' Balfour was once a clergyman in the Calvinistic church; and then he was considered a very wise man; but having been converted to Universalism, it makes a wonderful difference with him in the estimation of his present Calvinistic enemies. His learning and talents for which he was so much prized among them, are now all gone; and he is nothing more than a 'third or fourth rate linguist.' Such is the effect which a man's conversion to the truth will have, on his old associates in error.

But though Balfour and Loveland, and the Universalists in general are 'third and fourth rate linguists,' we suppose it will be allowed they are as learned as were the twelve apostles, whom Jesus sent forth to preach the kingdom of God.—We would not offer a syllable to the disparagement of human learning, but we do not consider it the only qualification necessary to a servant of Christ. Peter and John were accounted 'unlearned and ignorant men,' by the unbelieving world; but still the people took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus. See Acts iv. 13. They preached in the demonstration of the spirit and with power,—not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but in the words the Holy Spirit teacheth; and the arguments they advanced, although not adorned with human learning, reached the hearts of the people; and the VERY LEARNED Scribes and Pharisees were not able to refute those arguments. Now, if the Universalists are so ignorant a set of men as the learned Mr. Wood, the editor of the 'Journal,' has represented them, it is more easy to overcome them. We are told that they have no learning, no talents, that the Bible is altogether against them, and of course they labor under every disadvantage. What is the reason then they are not put down? Why do not their VERY LEARNED opponents come up to the spiritual contest? Why do they not annihilate Universalism at once? What is it that has protected Universalism under all these disadvantages? We will answer,—it is the invisible arm of God. On a certain time, the king of Syria determined to make a prisoner of the prophet Elisha, the servant of the true God. Having learned that the prophet was at Dothan, he sent a great host, with horses and chariots, and encircled the city round about. 'Alas, Master,' said Elisha's servant, 'how shall we do.' The prophet replied, 'Fear not, for they that be with us, are more than they that be with them,' a most singular declaration, for he and the servant stood apparently alone, and an uncounted host of Syrian enemies were round about them. But Elisha prayed God to open the eyes of the young man, and he saw, ☞'and behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha.' Thus we see, that God protected his prophet, in a way which the world knew not, and all the hosts of the Syrian army could not harm him. So God will protect his cause in the present age. He protected Murray, he protected Winchester, with a wall of fire; he protects his cause now; and all the gates of hell cannot prevail against it.

It is a sound rule, that where there is the most boasting about learning, you will find the least of it. Who is this Henry Wood, editor and proprietor of the 'Congregational Journal?' Is he a very learned man? Is he a profound linguist?—We know him not. We have never seen any specimens of his great learning. But if he will look on our first page to day, he will see how learned is one of his brother defenders of endless torture, who, in explaining to his Bible Class, the words of Christ, 'For wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together,' declared that the CARCASS applied to CHRIST, and the EAGLES to his FOLLOWERS. Wonderful man! Learned defenders of endless misery!—How well it becometh you to taunt others for a want of biblical knowledge! We will not deny however, that there are men deeply learned among our opposers, who have put forth many sound criticisms; and unlearned though Universalists may be, we trust we may avail ourselves of the concessions of our very learned opponents. Now we will engage to prove the truth of Universalism beyond all possibility of candid contradictions, from the arguments and concessions of our learned opponents. If we can do this (as we are sure we can) then the whole argument of the editor of the 'Journal' is prostrated in the dust.

We regret that we are now obliged to proceed to the solemn duty of exposing the ignorance of this boasting editor of the 'Journal.' He has proved himself profoundly ignorant of the history of theology. The old proverb, that 'those who live in glass houses should not throw stones,' we should think would have made him more cautious. He says, 'If Universalism is taught in the Scriptures, is it not surprising that not a single Biblical scholar has found it there?' . . . . Again he says, 'The world over, not one Biblical scholar give the sanction of the Scriptures to the speculations of Universalism. Can it then be of truth and of God, when the testimony of all competent witnesses is against it.' That is, as we understand this argument, if the 'Biblical scholars,' the 'competent witnesses' adopted Universalism, then Universalism would be 'of truth and of God.' Now, although we do not wholly approve this rule, yet as it is one of the very learned Mr. Wood's own choosing, we propose to rest the matter upon it; and we will proceed to name some of those 'competent witnesses' who have defended Universalism, although in so doing we shall be obliged to show the great ignorance of our boasting antagonist. Clemens Alexandrinus, who flourished in the second century, was a Universalist. The great, the holy, the learned, the indefatigable Origen, the pupil of Clemens, was a decided Universalist, and defended the salvation of all men from the Scriptures with great ability. It is altogether probable, that the vast influence of Origen, who was placed at the head of the great Catechetical School at Alexandria, and who was repeatedly appointed by the Bishops to expound the Scriptures to the people, inclined many of his pupils, some of whom became great lights in the Church, to his peculiar views. Marcellus was a Universalist, and so were Fabius Marius Victorinus, and Titus, Bishop of Bostra, and Gregory Nyssen, and Didymus of Alexandria, and Evagrius Ponticus, and Diodorus of Tarsus, &c. &c. &c. If our opponent wishes the proof that the eminent Christians here named were Universalists, he can be accommodated. But he will not dare to deny the facts here stated. We do not find many Universalists during the dark ages, and we should not expect to find them at that time. The awful doctrine of endless misery, then shrouded the earth in darkness, with occasionally a few faint beams of light. But when the Reformation arose in Germany and England, Universalism arose with it. There were many Universalists in that period, as we can abundantly prove. Afterwards Universalism was defended by very learned men, among whom we may mention Rev. Jeremy White, Chaplain to Cromwell; Dr. Henry More; Archbishop Tillotson, defended it indirectly; Dr. Thomas Burnet, wrote a book in favor of it; Sir Isaac Newton doubted the doctrine of endless misery; Dr. George Cheyne and the Chevalier Ramsay, defended Universalism; Dr. John Wm. Peterson, was a great defender of the doctrine in Germany; Paul Siegvolk defended it, as did many of the eminent German theologians. Petitpierre was a Universalist, and so was Lavater and M. Necker. The pious Wm. Law was a Universalist; and the learned Henry Brooke; Dr. David Hartley, Abraham Tucker, Dr. Thos. Broughton, Bishop Thomas Newton, Sir George Stonehouse, John Henderson, of Pembroke College, James Brown, D. D., Rev. Francis Leicester, of Peter-House College, Rev. R. Barbauld, son-in-law of Dr. Aiken, Dr. Samuel Parr, Rev. John Brown, of Sidney Sussex College,—to say nothing of the early English Unitarians, Priestley, Lindsey, Belsham, Kenrick, &c. &c. Time would fail us to give an account of the one-half of those of whom there can be no doubt that they believed in Universalism. What will the editor of the 'Journal' now say? Here we have proved that many 'Biblical scholars,' alias 'competent witnesses' have defended Universalism; and our opponent must then confess, upon his own rule, that said doctrine is therefore 'of truth and of God.' A great and glorious concession for him to make! He is refuted by his own reasoning! He is overthrown by the means he has put in our hands!—In addition to this, he has exposed his own great ignorance, at the precise moment when he was complaining of Universalists for being unlearned. If all this is any honor to him, or benefit to his cause, he is welcome to it; and in addition he is welcome to the very Revs. M. H. Smith and E. Dow, whom he has named in his article.

We intimated at the beginning, that the article in the 'Journal' was of some length. We have noticed one paragraph only; and for want of room must now close. We may take up other parts of the article at some future time. In closing, we respectfully request the editor of the 'Journal' to give this article an insertion in his columns. Let us see, if he will do it.

Capital Punishment.

The House of Representatives, of the State of New Hampshire, has passed a bill totally abolishing capital punishment in that State. It remains to be seen, whether the Senate and Governor concur. This is a very favorable step; and we are happy to perceive, that the leading journals in that State support the measure. This course of true benevolence is onward.

We have, in another article, called the attention of our patrons to the opportunity sending money to pay for their papers, by the Representatives. All the Representatives will probably desire to be in Boston, at the very beginning of the session, as it will be quite an exciting time with the political parties at the outset. We hope our friends in the country will not forget us.

The Temperance Samaritan.

That excellent paper, the 'Temperance Samaritan,' published at Stockbridge, Mass., by Rev. A. B. Manley, has been suspended, for the present, for the want of patronage. Its Editor says,

Our 'bump' of caution has persuaded us to suspend the publication until such time as the 'bumps' of benevolence shall prompt our temperance friends to 'help the cause along,' by sending in their names as subscribers. We hope and trust sufficient encouragement will be afforded to enable us to commence the work again on the 1st or 15th of January next. If not, this is the end of the 'Samaritan,' and those who have paid in advance will receive back their money.

We now ask our temperance friends who are willing to patronize the 'Samaritan,' to enroll their names on this prospectus and return it to the Editors at Stockbridge, with uneecessary delay. We do not ask for your money until we can give assurance that the publication will be continued. Let all those who are willing to take the paper and pay for it at the proper time, send in their names.

We deeply regret, that a paper which promised so much usefulness, should not be sustained.

Removal.

Br. Henry Belding has removed from Clarksville to Cherry Valley, N. Y. and desires that all communications for him may be directed to the latter place. We will comply with the suggestion in his letter, and wait the time to which he refers.

Outrage in Cincinnati.

The Cincinnati papers have abounded of late with accounts of a deed of cruelty that almost surpasses even fiction itself; and what makes the matter the more to be lamented, is that the offending parties are all professors of religion in connexion with the Methodist church. We hesitated last week to give publication to the sad tale through fear of exaggeration; but subsequent opportunities of making ourselves acquainted with the facts, have dispelled all doubt. None should be implicated but the guilty; and their conduct should be held up to the execration of mankind. The aged lady who was the subject of the ill-treatment was Mrs. Stibbs, nearly 95 years of age, and the actors in the awful tragedy, were her own children. The following article is abridged from a long expose that appeared in the Cincinnati Daily Times:

The old lady referred to, lived in the city of New York, possessed of sufficient property to smooth the down hill of life, and make her comfortable in her declining years.

A son, now living in this city, in good circumstances, it is stated, squandered a part of this sacred fund, and came to this city with the balance, leaving his parents to the cold charities of strangers. After some time a daughter of the old lady brought her out to the West, with whom she lived near the Little Miami river for a while; but at last getting tired of her, she brought her to this city, and quartered her on another sister, who in a short time, reflecting no doubt, that as her brother had possessed himself of all the old lady's property, he ought to take care of her, and therefore applied to him to receive her under his roof. This he refused to do. Determined not to be at the expense and trouble of shielding that venerable gray head and those feeble limbs, and of comforting that heart-broken mother who had nourished her from her own bosom, fondled her in her arms, and watched her slumbers in infancy and childhood, she placed her tottering frame in a carriage, and proceeded to her brother's house, when, not finding the family at home, she seated her mother on the door steps, and left her in the rain, where she remained for an hour or two.—On the return of her son she was placed in a small back room in his house—a miserable straw bed and covering were given her, and then she was locked up. The condition in which she was found is sufficient proof of the treatment she was subjected to. Humanity shudders at the picture—the mind is unable to conceive and the pen inadequate to describe the scene in all its loathsome particulars and heart-rending imaginings. Suffice it to say, that the lady who first accidentally heard of the circumstance, told her husband, who immediately called on one of the sons-in-law of the sufferer, a local preacher or exhorter in one of the Methodist churches of this city, (the Wesley Chapel,) who is in the yearly receipt of several thousand dollars of rent from his real estate, and stated the information he had received in relation to his wife's mother, and his apprehensions that unless something was done immediately, she could not survive such cruel treatment. Alas! he conjectured truly—the old lady died soon after.

The Christian (?) minister answered he 'knew it all; the old woman was very old, and ought to have died years ago; and that it was nobody's business.'

But our friend was not to be so baulked; the holy precepts which he had imbibed, taught him to persevere. He accordingly called on the township trustees, and insisted on their going to see her, which at first they refused to do; and it was only after he had threatened to publish them if they refused, that they consented to go.

His wife, previously to this, had called on the wife of her minister, and taken her down to view the scene.

After the whole matter was thus made public, and earnest threats made to the relatives of the victim by our informant, that if they did not provide for her, they would publish them to the world, he consented to and did employ a woman to board and wait on the aged and helpless invalid. They gave her some food, which she devoured as a famished wolf would have done.—They cut off her hair, combed her head, and washed and dressed her. While the process of cleaning was going on, her daughter advanced, placed her gold spectacles upon her nose, and gave directions to 'be careful not to leave any of the creepers!'

The poor old creature was at last made clean and comfortable, and removed to the house of a hireling, where she afterwards died.

Our informant states further, that one of the regular stationed ministers of the Methodist church in this city, was an eye witness to the condition of the deceased, and remarked afterwards, 'that he never had witnessed such a case of human wretchedness, such a revolting scene—it was, he thought, without parallel in a Christian community.'

As yet, we understand the consciences and Christian feelings of the Church associates of these guilty ones remain unawakened—the thunders of the Church sleep—and the wealthy son-in-law of her who now sleeps beneath the clods, desecrates the altar and temple of the Most High, by exhorting his brethren from the holy desk. The preacher, too, who witnessed the miserable condition of the old lady, after approaching the footstool of his God, with prayer, praise and thanksgiving, calls upon him 'to close the meeting'—and when called on by one of the members to inquire if he intended to insult his congregation by such an outrage on the best and holiest feelings of our nature, answered, 'he didn't think of it or he would not have done it!' He had forgotten it! Yes, he had forgotten it!—When asked if he did not intend to bring the man before the Church tribunal, he said, if any one would prefer charges, he should feel bound to notice them. But who will do it, we ask? Well do most people know that, 'Plate sin with gold, the lance of justice falls harmless; but when clothed in rags, a pigmy straw would pierce it.'

It will be seen that the parties all belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church. We have already intimated that none are to be condemned, but the guilty. There are bad people in all sects; and the sects are not to be condemned for the faults of individual members, unless they wink at them. If they hesitate to reprove and rebuke the ungodly, then they have 'fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness.' The following from the 'Star in the West,' throws further light upon the melancholy subject:

Since the foregoing was written a trial has been had at 'Wesley Chapel' where all the principle facts given in our paper were clearly proved and established as the daily papers say, and also those who attended. The only difference of any consequence, in the statement of facts as given in the papers and what appeared at the trial, is, that the parties implicated appeared in a much worse light on trial than in the papers. All present with whom we have conversed assure us of this. They agree in saying that the testimony made out one of the worse cases of wickedness and neglect on the part of the children of Mrs. Stibbs that they ever heard of in any civilized society. The preacher who said 'let her die,' &c. is Rev. Mr. Richardson. All the parties are members of the Methodist Church except one, we are informed. The principal witnesses also were Methodists. The room where the trial was held, was crowded almost to suffocation; and such was the indignation felt on the part of many of the audience that it was found very difficult to keep order. Very many wept as they heard the testimony given—tears flowed copiously from eyes unused to weeping at details so shocking.—For the honor of humanity we hope such a case may never occur again. The cause of Christianity bleeds from such conduct among its professors—professors too, making the highest pretensions to godliness and respectability. Nearly, if not all the daily papers have spoken out in just terms on the subject. They concur in saying that the charges were fully sustained by testimony.

ing by slandering Universalists. Judging only by his paper, Universalists would be considered the very refuse of everything vile. He gives them no credit for any good action. He represents them as ungodly, licentious, profane, irreligious, the enemies of God and men,—spiritual marauders,—a sort of ecclesiastical banditti; fit neither for earth or for heaven, and worthy only of the pains of hell. It is his trade, his regular calling and employment, to give such representations of Universalists. Would it not be well for this said Luther to look at the picture drawn in the above extracts? He will then learn that there is some wickedness in his own fraternity—that Universalists do not commit all the wrong that is done in the world. We know this is no justification to others who do wrong; and we know the innocent should not be condemned with the guilty. We do not refer to the case with such views; but to show the world that they cannot place implicit reliance on pious professions; that much wickedness is at times covered up under the garb of sanctity.

State of the cause in Waterville, and in other parts of the State.

A letter just received from our excellent friend, Br. Calvin Gardner, of Waterville, Me., brings us intelligence of the state of the cause in that town, and some other of the principal towns in that State. It seems Br. G. will remain at Waterville for a term of years. The region of the Kennebec is represented as being exceedingly prosperous; and further East, Bangor, Belfast and Castine are spoken of as places where clergymen of our faith might be settled to advantage.

And now—supposing that you feel some interest in matters pertaining to our general cause—I will state a few facts, not only in relation to our prospects here, but in some others places, and throughout the State, generally. You know that I located myself in this place some ten years ago, and have been here, doing the best I could, with my feeble powers, from that time to the present. I have found myself pleasantly situated, in very many respects—as much so as I may ever expect to be, in any place,—among good friends, firm friends, fast friends—who have done a good work here, all things considered. We have had but little excitement,—not so much as many would deem needful, for vigorous and successful effort,—but we have gone on, with a steady progress, and straightforward, till we have reached the point at which we now stand. We have always stood firm, and stood secure. But, you know, within the period of ten years, a great change has come over the business part of the community—a change which you have yourself doubtless felt,—and many, who had means and courage to do much, sometime ago, have since hesitated, and looked about them, to see what would be the end of these things. This change has been felt by the Society here; a distrust of their ability to do as much as they had done heretofore was the natural consequence; and I must confess, that I regarded the distrust as well founded. I hardly thought that they would be able to give me a competent support, and I therefore, a short time ago, signified my intention of dissolving my connection with them, and give place to some other person, who could labor with them for a less compensation. Accordingly, my labors with them were brought to a close, but scarcely so, however, before they resolved to try their strength once more, and see what they could do, under existing circumstances. The result has been astonishing to us all. They have obtained enough, by subscription, hard as the times are, to close another engagement with me, for five years, if I choose to make it, with six or eight hundred dollars surplusage. This is what I call doing well, and shows what a distrustful Society can do, if they will but try. I think, now, that I must go on with them, as best I can, for another term of five years. I did not intend to do this, I must confess; but I cannot leave old friends, whose friendship has been oftentimes and fully tested, and who have unitedly chosen to give me their support, for new ones, unless circumstances imperitively demand it. And such circumstances, so far as I can see, do not now exist. This then, for the present, must continue to be my field of labor—my home.

Thus much for ourself—and thus much for the Society here, and its prospects. It never stood better, or firmer, or had fairer prospects, than now. So may it long continue! But there are other places in Maine, besides this, where the cause of truth stands well. All along upon our river, from Bath to 'The Forks,' it is doing well, slowly, but surely. A new Meeting-House at Gardiner is about ready to be dedicated, and opened for public worship,—and a fine house it is, too. And, then, 'over east,' as far as the Penobscot, and even down as far as the Frontier territory, the good seed is being sown, and springing up, and taking deep root, and will ultimately bring forth an abundant harvest. We have recently visited the 'City of the East'—Bangor—and have labored with the brethren there; and we are happy to state, that there is yet life and spirit among them, and a resolution to press forward, in the cause of their Master. For some time they have been destitute of a stated ministry, but we are happy to find, that they have not scattered, or strayed into other folds, in consequence of it.—They are all ready to rally again, and will do so, whenever they shall find a pastor, in whom they shall be well pleased, and who shall choose to go among them, and 'do the work of an Evangelist,' skillfully and faithfully. Such a preacher they need; and such a preacher would find a good location there, with work enough to do, and good friends to help him do it. And several such preachers would find employment in this State, if we have not greatly misjudged the state of our religious affairs, and be able to obtain a fair compensation for their labors. There is Belfast and Castine—no preacher in either place, I believe; but they are each able to support a stated ministry, and will do it, we doubt not, when the right man can be obtained. And many such places there are, which should be provided for, with good preachers—acceptable preachers—such as shall do honor to themselves, and the cause they have espoused. An argument suggests itself here, in favor of the necessity of establishing a Theological Seminary; but that I leave, for the present. There has already been more said upon it, than done. The next move will be, action, I hope.

Our readers in Rockingham County, N. H. are requested to observe the notice of Br. Jewell, the Agent, in regard to the important meeting at Exeter. We hope that there will be a full attendance, and that the heart of the Agent will be encouraged and his hands strengthened.

Boston Almanack for 1843.

This is from the press of Mr. S. N. Dickinson, 32 Washington-Street. Mr. D's. establishment is one of the largest, and most elegant in the city. The Almanack is a complete collection of almost every thing appertaining to Boston.

Here we have the calender and memorandum pages, the City Government, Clergy, Custom House Officers, Fire Department, Government of United States, ditto. of Massachusetts, Insurance Offices, Newspapers, &c. &c. &c. besides every thing else that can be named; and in addition to the whole, a picture of every church edifice in the city, and a brief account of each Society. It is a truly valuable work, and every family in Boston, yea, and in the vicinity, should have one. Price 25 cents.

Books for New Year's.

B. B. Mussey, 29 Cornhill, has just published a number of beautiful books for the Christmas and New Year's holidays. Among others we have seen

The Golden Vase, a Gift for the Young, by Hannah F. Gould. This book is elegantly printed, elegantly bound, and is adorned with several exquisite plates. It will be a welcome present to the thoughtful child. It is made up of tales and poetry; and to those who know the other works of this authoress, it is hardly necessary to say, that every thing is in good taste, and ends in a useful moral lesson. It is such a book as a Christian parent would be willing to place in the hands of a child.

Life in the Wilds, a Tale for the People, by Harriet Martineau. This is one of the works of this lady, designed to illustrate the true doctrines of political economy. Its authoress has a clear head, and a good heart. The tale is very interesting; and cannot fail of being useful to the young lad, who is seeking to become acquainted with men and business, the sources of wealth and happiness.

The Hill and the Valley, a Tale for the People, by Harriet Martineau. The same remarks precisely may be made in regard to this, which we have offered concerning the preceding. The books are mate volumes; and where amusement and instruction are thus combined, the effect must be good.

We have been expecting for some time to receive a letter from our friend and brother, Rev. J. E. Palmer, of Vermont.

COMMUNICATIONS.

'Crown of Life.'

Br. Whittemore,—I see that you again call upon me through the 'Trumpet' in relation to my proposed work to be entitled the 'Crown of Life.' I exceedingly regret that I printed a note in my 'Short Sermons' promising its appearance in the summer of 1840. That note has cost me a great deal of postage, and much writing in relation to the means of delay.

I now state that circumstance, over which I had no control, prevented me from publishing the work. I will once more say that if no unforeseen contingency transpires it will certainly be before the public the ensuing summer, (1843) and my friends on seeing this notice will please let the matter rest till then. There is no danger that the world will end next April.

Fraternally yours forever, J. B. Dods.

An Important Meeting at Exeter, N. H.

Each auxiliary society which I have recently formed on my visits in the county of Rockingham, in New-Hampshire, and our friends in every town, who have not as yet been visited, but are desirous of coming into the arrangement, and learning more respecting our method of proceedure, are urgently requested to send one or more delegates to Exeter, on Monday, Jan. 2, 1843, with full instructions how they wish their funds expended; and prepared to attend to such other business as may come before them. At which time and place, the Directors are also expected to meet, that more systematic arrangements may be made for future operations.

☞This meeting is absolutely necessary, for the good of our 'Missionary Enterprise,' and therefore, each brother who reads this notice, will proceed at once to confer with his brethren upon the subject. Let there be no delay, and no negligence. Stormy or not, the meeting must be held.

☞The brethren will meet at the Universalist meeting-house, at 10 o'clock, A. M,

Henry Jewell, Agent.

General Intelligence.

We understand that the receipts of tolls on the Charlestown and Warren Bridges during the year from the time the tolls commenced, amount to $50,300—a larger one than was anticipated.—There is now every reason to suppose, that at the end of the two years prescribed by law, a sum will be realized sufficient to defray all the expenses for past repairs, and a surplus of $50,000.

Duelling. The Grand Jury at New Orleans, in a recent presentment, after saying that the law there against duelling, in consequence of its severity, is a dead letter, add: 'Let the penalties be confined to a fine and imprisonment, and to the support of the family of the deceased, and in case of the relations of the deceased should not be in a situation to require said support, let the creditors have a right of action against the surviving party, and jurors will be found to enforce the law.'

The wild geese passed over, in their southward course, says the Salem Gazette, last week. One was shot, from the old Boston road, which weighed 16 pounds.

The President's Message reached Cincinnati on Friday evening at 5 o'clock, having been received there in 52 hours from Washington.

The Sattinet Factory belonging to Messrs. Slater, at Slatersville, R. I., was destroyed by fire on the night of the first inst. The loss is not mentioned. Insurance to the amount of $11,000 was effected in the Manufacturers' Mutual Insurance Company at Worcester.

The Cincinnati Gaz. of the the 3d inst., says: 'Intelligence reached here yesterday, that the stage was upset near Wheeling, and that Mr. White, M. C., of Indiana, had his arm broken in three places, that another member was seriously hurt, and a third so badly injured that his life is despaired of.'

The Jury in the case of Alexander, at Philadelphia, have returned a verdict of 'guilty of manslaughter.' It is said that eleven of them were for a verdict of insanity, and only gave in after an absence of thirty hours; and that they will unite in petioning Gov. Porter for a pardon.—When the verdict was rendered, the prisoner and his father, who was present, were deeply affected and burst into a flood of tears.

Forfeited Recognizances. James S. Schermerhorn, late cashier of the New York Ocean Insurance Company, indicted for grand larceny and the embezzlement of the funds of the Company, to the amount of $100,280, has forfeited his recognizances. His sureties were John Noble, and Roe Lockwood, who gave bail each in the sum of $5000.

Look out for Thieves. The Mail says, that the yards of several persons in North Russell street, were entered in the evening, and robbed of various articles of wearing apparel, which had been placed there to dry. The office of Dr. Butler, 4 Brattle square, was entered a few evenings since, and robbed of several valuable books and pictures.

The Post says the Millerites talk of erecting somewhere near the centre of the city, a large and cheap building, in which to hold their meetings until the destruction of the world. It is to be large enough to contain four or five thousand persons, and its cost is estimated at $2000. A committee of Elder Starkweather's congregation (formerly Mr. Himes's) now have the subject under consideration.

Railroad Accident. We learn from the Hartford Times, that on Wednesday, the railroad track was covered with snow and ice, to an extent which deprived the brakeman of power to control the train of cars as they approached the depot, and the whole train passed through the partition, and through the office into the street. Fortunately none of the passengers were injured—nor was much damage done to the property.

Mutiny on board a U. S. Brig of War. The following is a short account of a most horrid transaction on board the U. S. Brig-of-War, Somers, Capt. McKenzie, which arrived at New York on Wednesday from the coast of Africa, where she had been cruising for some months, in order to protect American merchant vessels from the interuption of British cruisers searching for slaves. The Somers left Liberia on the 11th of November and touched at St. Thomas on her voyage hither. She left St. Thomas on the 5th of December; and on that day the Captain observed disorderly movements among the crew, which excited his suspicions of intended mutiny. He saw nothing definite, however, or sufficient to warrant the arrest of any. He contented himself, therefore, with ordering all his officers to wear their side arms, and proceeded on his voyage.

He had been out two days when some of the crew informed him of the existence of a plot on board, which was immediately to be put in execution. The plan was to murder the captain, the higher officers and all others who would not join them,—to seize the vessel and convert her into a pirate ship. She is one of the swiftest sailors in the service: and it was thus supposed she would be most completely fitted for the purpose to which they designed she should be applied. They intended first to watch for some one of the Liverpool packets—expected to bring out a large quantity of specie—to seize upon and plunder her and then sail for some more remote portion of the sea. This information was given to the captain by one of those who had been originally engaged in the plot, but had subsequently repented and betrayed their murderous design.

This was on the 7th of December. The Captain immediately ordered all hands on deck, and ordered those of the crew who were opposed to him to go upon the forward deck. Passed Midshipman Spencer, son of John C. Spencer, our Secretary of War, the Boatswain's Mate and the Master at Arms, immediately led the way, and were followed by thirteen apprentices and about sixty of the crew. They arrayed themselves upon the forward deck, without doubt supposing that they would be followed by a great proportion of the crew. Capt. Mc Kenzie immediately ordered them to be put in irons. They were shackled and securely confined.

In the evening a Court Martial was summoned, Spencer and his two companions, as the three ring-leaders, were tried, convicted and sentenced, and the next morning were hung at the yard arm. The rest were brought in irons to this port, where they are still kept in shackles and close confinement.

Thus by the prompt, fearless decision and energy of Capt. McKenzie, one of the most bold and daring conspiracies ever formed wat frustrated and crushed. The whole crew on board numbered, we believe, not far from 100; and had the plot been successful, as a day's delay might have made it, deeds of blood and of fearful atrocity, seldom paralleled in the horrid records of piracy and murder, would have blackened the sea and carried terror to the heart of the world. We presume that official accounts of this astounding affair will be speedily given, when more of its particulars will be spread before the public.

Immediately upon the arrival of the Somers, we understand, a messenger was despatched to Washington with the intelligence. It has been thus far kept secret here, we presume, in order that it might not first reach the ear of Mr. Spencer through the columns of the press. An official investigation will of course be immediately ordered, and all the particulars of the matter be soon made known. There are some portions of this account which lead us to suspect its entire accuracy; but we give it as it was told to us—upon authority, which we deem most reliable.—N. Y. Tribune.

Melancholy. A boy 5 years of age, son of Robert Crandall, of Montrose, Pa., on Monday last ate a piece of opium which had accidentally got into his dinner basket at school. He was taken ill and died the same evening.

Fire. On the 26th ult. Muncietown, in Delaware Co., Ind., was visited by a most disastrous fire. Two printing offices, one dry goods store, one tailor's shop, one iron ware store, and the Recorder's offices, with their contents, were totally destroyed. Loss $6,000.

U. S. Commissioners Court. Death from Harsh Treatment. We learn that an examination of a painful nature was held last week by G. T. Curtis, Esq., Commissioner.

James K. Means, master, and Michael Kennedy, mate, of the brig Apphia, were arrested by Henry Harris, Esq., Deputy Marshal, for assaulting and inflicting a cruel and inhuman punishment on Daniel Lee, one of the crew, deceased.

From the evidence of several of the crew, which was not contradicted, it appeared that the brig sailed from Norfolk with a cargo of lumber; experienced a series of gales; and part of the deck load was washed off by the sea; the captain was hurt by being jammed in between two timbers, and one of the men was also disabled in the same manner. The brig also leaked so fast as to require the pump to be kept constantly going. On Thursday week, Lee's strength failed him at the pump, and he went below, and took shelter under some sails. The next day he was ordered to take his trick at the wheel, but complained of being sick, and refused. He was made to sit upon the binnacle for a long spell. The next morning the cook was ordered not to give him any food unless he turned out to work. Finding this of no avail, the captain had him triced up by the middle to the main boom, his toes only resting on a rude staging. After being suspended about half an hour, he was taken down, and permitted to crawl to his shelter in the timbers, under some sails.—In the evening the captain sent him some tea.—When the cook spoke to him he returned no answer, and, supposing him to be asleep, the cook did not disturb him. The next morning the cook found him dead.

The mate, by the captain's orders, assisted in tricing the unfortunate creature up, but it does not appear that he was to blame, as he had faithfully expressed his opinion that he was unfit for duty, previous to the first punishment being afflicted. The captain appears to have acted upon the presumption that the deceased was shirking the whole time. Such was also the opinion of some of the crew until the last day.

The Commissioner was of opinion that the mate was not bound to obey the captain to trice him up, as he was satisfied that the deceased was not able to do duty, and that the captain had not made due inquiries previous to inflicting punishment.

He ordered the captain to give bail in $300, and the mate in $150, to appear from day to day in the District Court, to answer if an indictment be found by the Grand Jury. The bail was furnished at once.

Distressing Casualtiy. We learn from Mr. Foster, of the Andover Express, that Mr. Cyrus Noyes, keeper of the Almshouse in that place, drove off a precipice of 10 or 12 feet, near Abbot Village, during the storm of last evening, and was instanly killed. Mr. N. formerly resided in Amesbury, was a man of unassuming manners, and universally esteemed. A wife and children are left to mourn his untimely end. What adds still more to the interest of this sudden death, is the fact that Mr. Noyes was the principal witness in a supposed case of murder, for which one of the inmates of the Almshouse is now in jail, awaiting trial—Bay State Democrat.

The Zanesville papers announce the death at that place, on last Sunday week, of Wyllis Silliman, aged 65 years, long a distinguished member of the Ohio bar, and brother-in-law to Governor Cass.

Destructive Fire. On Tuesday morning a fire broke out in Mr. Male's store, corner of Pratt street, Baltimore, and soon spread to Mr. Moody's store and the tea ware house of Mr. Gillet and also the ware house of Mr. Boyle fronting on Gray street. Several buildings with their contents were destroyed, but the total loss of property is not stated.

Be Careful. A sleigh, containing nine persons, in coming down Hull street, at the North End, was upset by coming in contact with a cart, and one of the ladies who were in the sleigh had her jaw-bone broken in two places, and two other ladies were likewise severely injured. This should serve as a caution to others not to drive too fast, particularly when in the city, as broken limbs and even life is often the penalty for such recklessness.

Steamboat Sunk. The steamboat New York sunk along side of the wharf at New Brunswick, N. J., on Wednesday night, about 12 o'clock.—The crew had barely time to save themselves, being awakened by the water rising in their births Efforts are now making to raise her, which will, it is believed, prove successful.—N. Y., Commercial.

Railroads. The finished railroads in the United States, it is said, amount to 4442 miles, and their cost to at least one hundred million of dollars. Beside there is a great amount of work of the same kind in progress.

War among the Preachers. The Portland Argus gives the verdict in a case of slander in that city, in which two Methodist ministers, Samuel Sawyer vs. Mark C. Hopkins, were the parties concerned. The action was brought on the ground that defendant had accused plaintiff of forgery. The jury awarded plaintiff $250 damages.

A Deserved Compliment. The ladies of the Winter Aid Society have presented the Rev. O. A. Skinner with a pair of massive silver spoons, in token of their esteem and gratitude for the aid received by their Treasury, in consequence of his very able and effective discourse in their behalf, delivered a short time since, in Rev. Mr. Robbin's church, It is an affectionate tribute to his talents and zeal, of which the Rev. gentleman is every way worthy.

Fires. At about 2 o'clock Monday morning the alarm was given in consequence of the flames being observed breaking through the roof of building No. 14 Court st.—the lower story of which is occupied as a tailor's store by C. Driscoll, the upper stories as lawyers' offices. The fire caught in the attic, where the fuel for the different offices was stored. The damage was not excessive—as a few hundred dollars will set all to rights. The gentlemen of the law probably suffered some in their libraries by water, the roof was considerably damaged; but all the injury was principally confined to the upper story and attic.

The alarm at 3 o'clock was occasioned by the burning of a house of ill fame at the West End. The damage sustained not very serious. At half past 4 the alarm again sounded, but was found to proceed from the same place, the flames having again burst forth. Our firemen are deserving of the highest praise for the promptness with which they attended to their arduous duties and the success which crowned their efforts.

Fire. We learn from the Merchants' Exchange Bulletin, that the house owned by Mr. Whipple, on Spectacle Island, and occupied by Mr. Murdoch, was totally destroyed by fire on Friday morning, with most of its contents. Capt. Sturgis, of the Revenue Cutter, sent a boat with 8 men to the spot to render assistance.

The grist and clothing mills of D. Smith, near Albany, with all their contents, 300 bbls. of flour 4000 bushels of wheat, and other grain and a new bridge recently erected over Norman's Kill, were consumed on the 3d inst. Mr. Smith's loss is not far from $30,000, of which $10,000 was insured.

Fire and Death. Mooresville, Indiana, a town of about 600 inhabitants, was lately almost entirely destroyed by fire. The flames first broke out in the dwelling house of Mr. James G. Slocum, in which a woman and three children were sleeping and who all perished in the flames. Mr. S. was at the time absent from home on a visit to a distant neighbor; and knew nothing of the fire until his return, three days afterwards.

The Cincinnati Outrage. The committee appointed by the Pastor of the Wesley Chapel in Cincinnati, to investigate the charge against several members of that Church of treating with an unnatural cruelty an aged mother, have made a report which is officially published. The horrors of the transaction, at first narrated in the papers, seem to be increased tenfold. Robert Richardson, Mrs. Richardson, Mrs. Crosby, Mrs. Walker, and Samuel Stibbs are the names of the black hearted creatures—who seem to have evinced an inhumanity and cruelty without parallel.

In the blossoms of beauty and prime;
The flower's transplanted, not dead—
The sunshine of heaven is her clime.

In Malden, Nov. 30th, Elizabeth A. aged 6 years and 7 months, daughter of Mr. Avery White. Her death was occasioned by her clothes taking fire from the stove in the school-house, she having gone there before her teacher, and when but very few of her little school-mates had arrived.

In South-Wellfleet, Mass. Dec. 5th, Mrs. Betsey, wife of Mr. Joseph Peirce, aged 26 years. In the death of Mrs. P. we have another instance of the power of religion to support the soul in the midst of affliction. Her sickness was of but short duration. She had but little notice of the approach of the king of terrors, and yet, when he did come, he had no terrors for her. 'Weep not for me,' she said, to her afflicted companion, and her aged weeping father, 'I am going home to God; we shall soon meet in a better world.' And bidding them an affectionate farewell, she sank calmly into the arms of her Father and her God. We commend the surviving relatives to the Gospel of Jesus, who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light. J. G. B.

In New-London, Iowa, Mr. Hercules Snow, in the 49th year of his age. The deceased was a native of West-Barnstable, Mass. from whence he emigrated to the West, and settled in Franklin County, Indiana, then a Territory. Throughout life he maintained a character of christian kindness, charity and integrity, which caused him to be much respected and esteemed by all acquained with him. Mr. Snow became a believer in the doctrine of Universal Salvation about eighteen years ago, and about one of the first sermons on that subject which he heard preached, was in the Court House in Cincinnati, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore, of Cambridgeport,—the doctrine at that time being almost unknown at the West, and its heralds very few. Since that time he never doubted, but ever cherished a firm and unfailing confidence in the infinite goodness and love of God to all mankind. In this glorious faith Mr. S. died as he had lived; he feared not death, but looked forward to the resurrection morn where he trusted by the promise of Jehovah, and the testimony of the Saviour, he should meet his relatives and friends, and all mankind, to enjoy with them a blissful eternity, where one song shall employ every tongue, even the song of Moses and the Lamb. Mr. S. has left a family and numerous relatives to mourn his loss; but they mourn not as those without hope.—Star in the West.

New Book of Psalmody. Third Edition. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by Thomas Whittemore, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of short Anthems, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Lang, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the Lessons or Rudiments, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

Dear Sir,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

Jotham S. French.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

'Gospel Harmonist.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

PROSPECTUS
Of the Third Volume of
THE GOSPEL MESSENGER.
A. A. DAVIS, HENRY BACON, D. R. HARRIS, Editors.

The third volume of the Gospel Messenger will commence Jan. 7th, 1843, with, it is to be hoped, some important improvements, rendering it more worthy the attention and patronage of the friends of Liberal Christianity. The paper will be decidedly a Universalist periodical. Its conductors will aim to bring out the Scriptural teachings on which our doctrine is founded, showing the harmony which exists between the doctrines to be believed, and the duties which are to be performed. Thus it will be a faithful exponent of doctrinal and practical Christianity, in all the variety of the application to Christian truth to the moral movements of the age. 'Speaking the truth in love,' will be the motto, the spirit of which will be observed by the Editors, and required in all communications. An epitome of Denominational, Religious, and Secular news will be regularly given, and a good variety of interesting and instructive general reading. It is hoped and believed that it will be found to be a work whose influence shall increase the love and zeal of the believer, and furnish light to direct the unbeliever or misbeliever into the path of knowledge and true happiness:

The Publisher has the assurance that he will receive aid in making the Messenger a good paper from a large number of Correspondents favorably known, especially to the Universalist reading community.

To the Universalists of Rhode-Island, it is believed, the Messenger will be the favorite. It will be devoted especially to the interests of Universalism in this State, while it will be suited to the wants of the friends every where.

The Messenger will be published on a medium sheet, good paper and type, every Saturday, at $1,50 per year, in advance. To this 25 cents will be added where the paper is sent by a carrier, and for every three months' delay of payment. All letters pertaining to the paper must be directed, post paid, to 'A. A. Davis, Messenger Office, Providence, R. I.'

All Ministers and Friends favorable to the work, are requested to act as Agents, and aid in the circulation of the Messenger. A. A. DAVIS, Publisher.

Providence, Dec. 1, 1842.

Thoughts on Hell.

And is it then a literal fire,
From which sulphuric flames ascend?
Where God displays his vengeance dire,
On millions of the sons of men?

Is it a long, eternal night,
On which no cheering ray shall break?
Shall endless ages in their flight
Its lurid flames still hotter make?

Will heavenly hallelujahs tell
The joy the saints in glory feel,
While from the dark domains of hell
Deep groans its bitter woes reveal?

* * * * * * *

Methinks I see amid that throng
Of countless worshippers above,
A husband from whose lips no song
Escapes in notes, of 'God is Love!'

For, writhing in eternal pain,
He views the partner of his life!
Tho' he is safe—tho' heaven is gained,
He feels for that loved—cherished wife!

The deep, broad gulf 'twixt heaven and hell,
Cannot the chain of friendship sever!
Deep rooted in the heart 'twill dwell—
It cannot die, no—never, never!

If but one solitary soul
Should down to endless woe be driven—
Thus fail to reach his destined goal—
'Twould silence every harp in heaven!

* * * * * * *

Blush, Calvinism, at the thought!
Hang down thy heavy head with shame!
Such doctrines Jesus never taught—
An endless hell he never named!

For, at the great Redeemer's birth,
Was heard along Judea's plain,
'Glad tidings of great joy on earth,'
And heaven responded to the strain!

Yet, on your banner, streaming high,
The traveller of earth may read,
'That soul the second death shall die,
Who dares reject John Calvin's creed!'

The Atheist reads the inscription, when,
Rather than worship such a God!
He says, 'let me when life shall end
Sink to the earth on which I trod!'

And so say I, if it be true
That those I love must always weep!
If friend to friend must bid adieu,
Thrice welcome an eternal sleep!

Hail, thou long, dark, oblivious night!
Hail, atheism's cheerless reign!
The yoke is easy—burden light,
Compared with endless misery's chain!

Soon may that banner be unfurled,
Jesus, thou friend of man above,
'Round which shall meet a ransomed world
To read th' inscription, 'God is Love!'

Then, freed from fear of endless hell,
All in one brotherhood shall meet!
The Atheist and Infidel
Shall worship at the Saviour's feet!

Miscellany.

An Address,

Delivered by Mr. ENOCH LITTLE, of Atkinson, N. H. on the evening of the dedication of the Universalist Church in that place.

Respected Friends and Christian Brethren,—It is with no small share of diffidence that I arise to address you this evening, when I am surrounded by so many who are vastly my superiors in point of talent and learning. I will be as brief as possible, for I am more desirous to hear others speak, than I am to speak myself. As you saw fit to choose me one of your Building Committee, when you contemplated the erection of this house, and as that Committee selected me to transact a large share of the business, perhaps I should neglect a duty which I owe to you, to myself and to my God, were I to remain silent. I ask the indulgence of this waiting assembly, a few moments, while I, in my feeble stylo and manner, attempt to address you.

Brethren,—as we have friends here from a distance, it may not be altogether improper for me to give them a brief outline of the steps that were taken, when we contemplated the building of this Meeting-House.

At the annual meeting of the Universalist Society in this place, in March, 1841, the subject of building a house of public worship, was brought before the Society for the first time. The Society then chose a committee to estimate the expense that would be incurred in building, and to draw up a subscription paper and see what the brethren would subscribe towards building the house. The sums placed upon the subscription paper amounted to almost one thousand dollars. A meeting was immediately called, and the Society voted to build a house for their accommodation. A Building Committee were chosen, who contracted with one of their number to make the brick of which these walls are composed, before they separated. In a few days I wrote a short letter to Br. Farnsworth informing him of what we had done, and what we intended to do in time to come.

We have succeeded in building the house better than we at first anticipated, at an expense of $1000. We have rejoiced to see its completion and its dedication to the one living and true God. We hope the brethren in the vicinity and from a distance will have reason to rejoice with us, and be exceeding glad. May you all, when you return home to your families, bless God for causing you to be present at this meeting.

We have a few words to say to the Universalist Society in this place, and to the builders of this house.

Brethren,—your Committee for the erection of this house, resolved in the onset to be faithful; how far we have succeeded in our resolution, we leave for you to judge. In the discharge of our duty we have studied all the economy we possibly could. We have taken a deep and a living interest in the work, and our zeal has been so great, that it has removed every obstacle that has presented itself to hinder us from going ahead. We have spent much time, but the hours have passed pleasantly along. Brethren, we ask for no praise, for God has ever been present with us to direct our steps. We sincerely thank you for the kind council and advice, which you have ever been ready to give us, and for the aid and assistance that you have granted us in the erection of this house. This holy Temple is now ready for our reception, and my humble prayer to God is, that we may receive it with grateful hearts to Him, the Giver of every good and every perfect gift. Here may we come with our families and friends, and worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness.

Brethren, our house for public worship is finished, but let us not think that our work is done. Let us consider that we are just commencing anew the journey of life. I would propose to the Universalist brethren in Plaistow, Hampstead, Salem and Atkinson, to unite and call home to their employment, some young ministering brother, who will come richly laden with the spirit of the gospel; and I think that two years would not pass away, before we should stand in need of another laborer in the vineyard of our Master, that the harvest might be gathered in due season.

Brethren, may we, like the noble Bereans of old, search the Scriptures daily; and may we never forsake the assembling of ourselves together.

To the Universalist Singing Society in this town we would say,—brethren, we shall reserve the Singing Gallery, in which you are now seated, for your use and occupancy. In behalf of the builders of this house, I present it unto you, and all who may join you from time to time, in singing and chanting forth the praises of the Lord. May you receive it with hearts overflowing with gratitude to God for all his mercies and past favors, with which you have hitherto been blessed. We hope that your union will be lasting, and that you all will gain such a knowledge of the art in which you are engaged, as will enable you to sing with the spirit and with the understanding also.

In passing along, we cannot, we must not forget the Sabbath School. Children,—we bid you welcome to the joys and comforts and consolations that this house will afford you during a long life. Here may you remember your Creator in the days of your youth, and here may you be brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. May the instruction here given be the means of carrying the gospel to distant lands. We hope that every father and mother will take a living interest in the welfare of your School.

It is pleasant for us to look back and call to mind the many happy hours that we have passed together, since the formation of your School. We have been delighted to see the interest that you have manifested in reading the little volumes that have been purchased for your perusal. May you never be weary in well doing, but may you continue your membership, till it shall be your turn to teach instead of being taught. May you ever be like your divine Master, gentle, kind, affectionate and tender-hearted one to another.

Respected and beloved brethren in the ministry,—As a member of the Universalist Society, and in behalf of the Committee who have spared no pains in collecting the materials for the erection of this house, I present you with this sacred desk, and in connection with it, you will be pleased to receive this Holy Bible as the word of God. Whenever it shall be your happy lot to stand in this desk, may you be prepared to preach the everlasting gospel. Preach as Paul describes it, 'the glorious gospel of the blessed God.' May you preach as did the angel to the shepherds upon the plains of Judea, and say unto the people, 'Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.' Preach in such a manner that the people will give 'glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace and good will to men.' May you preach the excellent loving kindness of God, and give us a history of the humble birth of the Saviour, his virtuous life and character, his cruel and ignominious death, his glorious resurrection, and his triumphant ascension to heaven, where he is seated at the right hand of the Majesty on high. But, my brethren, there is one thing we hope you will never do while standing in this sacred desk. It is this. May you never attempt to preach a doctrine or sentiments for us to believe, which you do not heartily and sincerely believe yourselves.

Ministering Brethren,—When I look around in your midst, I see as it were, one vacant seat. One young brother, whom we fondly anticipated greeting with a cordial welcome at the dedication of this house, is not here.—He has lately been called home to the spirit land. It is hardly necessary for me to mention, that I allude to our respected and beloved, but, now lamented and departed brother, Henry M. Nichols. When I visited the Rockingham Association at its last annual session, the ministering brethren spoke of his sickness, his apparent nearness to death, and how his faith in the gospel of his Lord and Master, afforded him the greatest comfort and consolation in the hour of sickness and trial. It was with feelings of regret, that they gave him up, as a fellow laborer in his Master's vineyard; but, if it was the Lord's will to take him home to himself, they would bow in humble submission. Several hymns appropriate to the occasion, were sung, which I doubt not, had their desired effect upon the audience.

At the mention of his name my heart was sensibly touched with the feelings of sympathy, love and fraternal affection.

After my return home, I soon visited him; found him weak in bodily strength, but strong in mind. He soon learned that I had been to the Rockingham Association, and began to inquire what business had been done by the Council, and how I enjoyed myself at the meeting. I told him that the Council had formed a 'Domestic Missionary Society,' for the advancement and spread of the gospel, and that we had truly a happy and soul-stirring meeting.

I made him acquainted with what was said in regard to his sickness, and that the ministering brethren in Essex County had in contemplation to supply his desk, while he remained sick and unable to preach.

He wished to know how we had succeeded in building our Meeting-House. I told him in reply, that we had met with greater success than ever we had anticipated,—that everything had gone on harmoniously,—that we had met with no accidents in raising and building,—that the Lord had been with us at all times,—and that it was truly the house of the Lord. He rejoiced to hear it. Several times in the course of the afternoon, he urged me to converse freely and without reserve.

When the shades of the evening were about to close in upon us, I extended to him the parting hand, and said, 'Br. Nichols, I hope that you will continue to put your trust and confidence in God, and that you will hold fast the profession of your faith.' He clasped my hand, and replied, 'Br. Little, I shall continue to put my trust and confidence in God, for there is no being like unto Him.—His goodness and mercy are everlasting. I shall hold fast the profession of my faith without wavering; for he is faithful, that promised.' I then, for the last time, bade him farewell.

With the eye of faith we look back and behold him, as it were, in the pulpit, and we hear him repeating the precepts and instruction of his Master, saying, 'whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.' 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest, Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.' 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind; and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' We shall not soon forget these invitations and commandments, for they are recorded in the Bible, where we can read them every day of our lives. If we would love the Lord, let us ever remember that we can do it in no way so well, as in keeping his commandments; for in keeping them there is great reward.

Though our Br. is dead, yet he speaketh unto us, saying, let your lives be holy and virtuous, and then you may confidently hope, that your last end may be like mine, peaceful and happy.

Our departed Br. was always modest, kind and affectionate—free to converse upon the subject of religion, and always ready to give a reason of the hope that was in him, with meekness and godly fear.

We regret that one so virtuous and useful should be called home so soon; but we do not mourn as those who have no hope, for we confidently believe that our loss will be his gain. We are disposed to say, 'The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord.' 'Not our will, but thine, O God, be done.'

Brethren, we cannot close before we present this house unto God, its rightful owner. Lord, we present it unto thee, a holy, and we trust an acceptable offering. Wilt thou receive it, as the richest earthly tribute that we thy humble children can bring. Wilt thou protect it not only from the lightning's flash, but from the devouring element that may be kindled within these walls. Wilt thou watch over it and shield it from every danger.—Thou hast known the intentions of our hearts from the beginning—that we have built it solely for thy worship, for thy honor and glory.

Lord, in connexion with this house, we present unto thee our bodies a living sacrifice, which is our reasonable service, trusting that thou wilt make them holy and acceptable unto thyself. Here may we learn more of thy character and love thee better,—and here may we awake to righteousness, and sin not. Here may we learn our whole duty, and be disposed to carry it out in practice.

Brethren, we ask your forgiveness for having taken up so much of the time, and wearied your patience so long.

Lord, we cannot close without returning unto thee our sincere thanks, for having given us confidence and strength to speak before this assembly of people. Wilt thou guide and protect us all through life, and when thou shalt have done serving thyself with us here below, wilt thou be pleased to receive us into thy heavenly courts, and all the praise, and honor, and glory, shall be thine forever.

A Bad Custom.

Here is a plain reproof of a very prevalent evil. We find it in an exchange paper. We hope all for whom it is intended, young and old, will profit by it.—S. S. Contributor.

'It is customary in many places, for persons who have assembled themselves together, upon the Lord's day, for social worship, to remain in the entry, or around the doors of the meeting-house, sometimes till long after the speaker has got into the desk. This is a bad custom. When the hour arrives for religious service to commence, the entry of the meeting-house should not be filled with men and women, and the seats thereof empty. The reverse of this is the true order of things.—There is, there can be nothing more trying to the feelings of a speaker in connexion with the duties of the Sabbath, (noisy children, or rather infants excepted,) than for the congregation to remain in the entry, and around the house, obliging the speaker to wait some 20 or 30 minutes, after the service should commence, for the people to get their seats, or lay himself under the painful necessity of risking a continual interruption, if he commences his services at the proper time.

When a minister enters the house of sacred worship and obtains his seat in the desk, if the hour has arrived for the service to commence, it is very pleasing to his mind to look about upon his little flock and find each and every individual in his or her proper place, anxiously waiting for the preached word—the door closed—the house still, and all things in proper order to commence the pleasing service. It inspires his soul with renewed energy, and imparts to him feelings which he could not realize under a reverse of circumstances. Will each and every individual who assists in making up a congregation, reflect upon the above—strive to be in his proper place, at the proper time, and thus confer a lasting favor upon him, who upon each returning Sabbath, ministers to your spiritual wants?

In a notice of the peculiar and affecting ceremony of visiting the graves, and strewing them with flowers, on St. Michael's day, the 'Picayune' gives the following beautiful sketch of the lament of an Irish mother, over the grave of her son:

'We witnessed one scene which penetrated to our very heart's core, as we passed thro' the cemetry at a late hour in the afternoon. Beside a grave, in an obscure corner of the cemetry, a woman who had passed the meridian of life, and apparently belonged to the humbler class of society, was on her knees. Her eyes were lit up with devotion, and she prayed audibly that God might have mercy on him for whom she sent forth her orisons. The grave was unadorned with flowers; no sculptured stone told of its tenant, and but one solitary candle burned before it, by the light of which we could read on the plastering, in an inferior style of chirography:—'MICHAEL M'DERMOTT.' The devotee wore a black bonnet, made without any regard to the prevailing fashion, and a black bombazine dress. We instinctively stopped to observe her proceedings.

'After uttering a prayer, in a strain of the most impassioned piety for the soul's repose of her son—for such he seemed to have been, over whose grave she bent—she burst out into the following wailing lamentation, after the fashion of her country. The dew seemed to fall faster as she wept, as if her sorrowing tones made the atmosphere weep with pity. Thus went she on:

'O! Michael, Michael! avec ma chree!
Why did ye lave me?
Why did ye lave your poor mother
Friendless and among sthrangers?
Oh, little, little did I think ma bouhel baun!
The das ye tuck me from my house and home,
That so soon ye'd lave me a bird alone!
O, wirrastru! Michael, sure I wouldn't care
If yer bones lay be yer father's side;
Or if there be frinds around to cry at yer wake;
But cushla dear, my heart is breakin',

'Thus went on the poor woman with her elegy, in tones that were mournfully plaintive. The merits of her departed son Michael, and her own forlorn condition, forming the burthen of her lamentations. Few who had not heard her could conceive how elegantly apt were many of the metaphors which she used, how mournfully musical was her voice.

'We prayed peace to the departed spirit of Michael, and comfort and consolation to his unfriended, widowed mother!'

Anecdote.

A short time since a preacher of Universal Salvation, while journeying to attend his appointment at a distance, happened in company with a preacher of orthodox faith, and was accosted with the following interogatory:—'Friend where are you traveling? To attend a meeting. But why do you preach and labor to travel so great a distance, if, indeed, your doctrine be true? Why, I labor to preach it because it is true. What do you expect to accomplish by travelling so far to-day to preach? I expect to destroy the devil. Poh! but how do you expect to accomplish that?—I shall let forth upon him the Lion of the tribe of Judah, and he will despatch him at once, agreeable to Heb. ii. 14, 18—and then what will become of your notions and sentiments? The Limitarian found himself in trouble, and immediately avoided the subject. —Christian Intelligencer.

Extraordinary Scientific Enterprise.

The expedition of M. de Castelnau to the central regions of South America, under the sanction of the French Government, being decided upon, it may be interesting and useful to give some ideas of this vast undertaking. It embraces nothing less than an exploring journey across this continent at its greatest width, from Rio de Janerio to Lima, a line of no less than 1000 leagues, one half of which has never yet been visited by any European. The return is to be made along the Maranon or Amazon river, and the interior of Guiana. This wide tour will excite public curiosity in the highest degree, as it embraces a country of fabulous history, but told with so many circumstances and incidents as to almost create in some minds a doubt as to whether it was fabulous. Our traveller will have to cross the country of the warlike Amazons, in whose existence La Condamine, the great astronomer and traveller, who visited the Maranon in the middle of the last century, believed.—He will also have to visit the empire of the Grand Wapati, who plays so great a part in the thousand Spanish chronicles, and also the mysterious Eldorado, in search of which so many brave men, including Sir W. Raleigh, faced apalling difficulties and dangers. Independently of these imaginary, or at best apocryphal objects, the scientific explorer will have an ample field for the exertion of his talents and observation. The study of the monuments of the imperial race of the Incas, whose civilization was the wonder of far remote ages, and whose history is still a closed book, seems likely to be exposed to us, with the migrations of the people of earlier ages. To these add the fixing of the magnetic equator, the study of the beneficial produce of these regions, particularly that invaluable medicine bark, observations on the various races of men, on the brute animals and plants and the atmospheric phenomona of these wild regions. These subjects must all attract the attention and researches of M. de Castlenau, who is qualified for his great task by having passed five years in the least known parts of North America, among the red men of the deserts, and by his numerous works on natural history. This great enterprise was planed under the auspices of the late Duke of Orleans, and is now adopted and patronized by the Duke de Nemours, anxious to accomplish the views and wishes of his august brother.—Galignani's Messenger.

A New-England Story.

We have often been diverted at a tale of old times in New-England—short, to be sure, but to the point. It so fell out that two young persons became smitten with each other, as young people sometimes do. The young woman's father was rich—the young man poor, but respectable. The father could stand no such union, and absolutely opposed it, and the daughter dared not disobey—that is, she dared not disobey openly. She 'met him by moon light,' while she pretended never to see him—she pined and wasted away in spite of herself. She was really in love—a state of 'sighs and tears,' which women oftener reach in imagination than in reality. Still the father remained inexorable.

Time passed on, and the rose in Mary's damask cheek passed off. She let not concealment like a 'worm in the bud,' prey upon the damask cheeks, however; but when her father asked her why she pined, she always told him. The old gentleman was a widower and loved his daughter dearly. Had it been a widowed mother who had Mary in charge, a woman's pride would have never given way against the importunities of the daughter.—Men are not however so stubborn in such matters, and when the father saw his daughter's heart was really set upon the match, he surprised her one day by speaking out, 'Mary, rather than mope to death, thee had better marry, as soon as thee chooses, and who thee chooses.'

And then what did Mary? Wait till the birds of the air had told her swain of the change, or until her father had time to alter his mind again! Not a bit of it. She clapped her neat, plain bonnet on her head, walked directly into the street, and then as directly to the house of her intended, as the street would carry her. She walked into the house without knocking, for knocking was not then fashionable, and she found the family just sitting down to dinner. Some little commotion was exhibited at so unexpected an apparition as the heiress in the widow's cottage, but she heeded it not. John looked up inquiringly. She walked up to him and took both his hands in hers. 'John,' said she, 'father says that I may have thee.'

Could she have told him in less words?—Was there occasion for more?

The City of Fountains.

By this beautiful and poetic appellation was New York baptized on the day when the shining Croton first poured its welcome flood through the thousand veins and arteries made ready for their reception beneath the countless streets of this great metropolis. Henceforth let no one dare to bestow upon it the vile and offensive cognomen of the 'city of pigs and nuisances,' for behold is it not written that it is worthy of a more reverential name.

A description of the Croton Water Works has been so often given, that a repetition of it now would probably, by most readers, be considered superfluous. So I shall merely say that the river is brought to New York through an Aqueduct forty miles in length, and is capable of yielding fifty millions of gallons per day. A great deal of water that, and, as every one would naturally expect, there has been since its introduction, a great tendency among the inhabitants to temperance and clean faces. Washingtonian societies are flourishing in a manner hitherto unprecedented, and well they may! for who would be guilty of taking strong drinks, when a river, whose waters are sweeter, more delicious, and more refreshing than any intoxicating draught that was ever mingled, is pouring freely and constantly through every street in New York. Long may it thus be, and may its sources never be dry!

Flow on thou shining river,
Forever and the same!

Flow on in thy beauty, thy pride and thy strength, untill king Alcohol and all his train are, as were Pharaoh and his hosts of old, drowned in thy overwhelming waves!

But I commenced with the intention of speaking of our Fountains. There are several of them in different parts of the city, the most beautiful of which is the one the Park. This Fountain, by means of some machinery which I am not quite able to explain, is made to assume six different forms, all very beautiful. Each form bears a different name from the others. That of one, is, I think, the 'Maid of the Mist.' Another is called the 'Fan.' Another the 'Croton Lady;' the other names have passed from my recollection, but are quite as pretty as those already mentioned. This fountain sometimes throws up a very beautiful jet of water sixty feet high, some times a great number of small ones. It is not a mere mountain of foam—it is a waving, restless, ever changing thing. It is like a thousand snowy birds whose huge white, transparent wings are ever in motion, waving and fluttering, and rising and falling in endless succession. Nothing could be more beautiful.

The fountains are now closed, not to be opened again, I suppose, until spring, as the cold weather would injure the works. When they are again in motion I hope all my young readers may have an opportunity of seeing them.—Universalist Union.

Clerical Dilemma.

In recently reviewing the fortunes of Mrs. Canning, we have had occasion to mention more than once, the celebrated Gen. Scott, whose daughter graced with her hand, and rendered independent with her dower, the late premier, at the commencement of his public career. The General, it is well known, was through life noted for play, and owing to his extraordinary success at a particulrr game, obtained the family cognomen of 'whist Scott.' On the 8th Dec. 1775, this gallant officer died as full of riches as years, at his seat of Balcombie in the parish of Crail, North-Britain. At that period it was customary in Scotland, when so melancholy an event as the demise of a 'muckle man' happened within parochial limits, for the clergyman of the kirk to pronounce a sort of funeral eulogium on the merits of the deceased, as they had been exemplified in his conduct. Among the grave and puritanical people, like our northern neighbors, the playful propensities of Gen. Scott, which, in that austere generation had been the subject of no trifling scandal, rendered the above task one of peculiar difficulty and irksomeness to the Rev. Peter Glass, minister of Crail. This worthy pastor, however, to great shrewdness added a strong piece of eccentric humor, which often served to extricate him out of embarrassing predicaments, with much eclat. He accordingly proceeded in strict conformity with the historical recipe in such cases made and provided, to draw a nice balance character of the dead General—regularly poising his virtues against his frailties, and this working into a web of continuous moral antitheses an impartial portrait of his late friend and patron. Having approached the termination of his discourse, custom prescribed (perhaps in order that the auditory might better guess their own fate, by comparison of promises and conclusion) that the Rev. Censor should at least, shadow forth the destiny that awaited the deceased in another world. When Mr. Glass came to this important point, he made a full and emphatic pause, and then proceeded with the solemn and earnest tone in these words:—'My dear friends, my heart will na alloo me to send him to Heaven and my conscience win'na let me send him to Hell, but do thou, O God, of thy infinite goodness take him up, give him a good shak owr the bottomless pit; but for Christ's sak dinna let him fa'in. Amen!'—Leed's Intelligencer.

Appearance of Fire on the Moon's Disc.

On the 12th of September, at 7h. 30m. P. M., I was witness (with others) to a very novel and interesting appearance on the eastern limb of the moon, situated by computation in 54 deg. of north latitude, and one thousand two hundred, and twenty-five miles of equatorial distance from her western limb, which brought the appearance just visible on the line bordering the enlightenened and unenlightened portions of her disc. On my first examination I failed to detect any unusual appearance, and turned the instrument to the disc of Jupiter and Saturn. After completing my observations of these interesting objects, the telescope was turned to the eastern limb of the moon, armed with its highest magnifier which inverts the object, and brings to view only minute portions of her disc. The atmosphere was favorable for observation, and the pleasurable task of observation was entered on, not with the hope of a discovery over a tract so frequently travelled before; but the telescope moves slowly and surely along; object after object glitters before the vision; and a new phenomanon, undiscovered before, bursts upon the eye. The appearance is that of two immense torch lights of dazzling lustre, issuing from a valley of considerable depression, with much apparent vehemence. Such was the strength of light, that the prismatic colors could be distinctly defined. The two columns were situated N. W. and S. E., and distant about six miles—were of a conical shape, a half a mile in diameter, and one and a half in circumference issuing in angles opposite to each other of about 20 deg. Several witnessed this appearance until a late hour, and with myself are are of the opinion that it is volcanic.

GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM. FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No 37 Cornhill, 'THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM—designed to lead inquirers to the belief of that doctrine, and believers to the practice of it.' By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. This work consists of 408 pages, handsomely bound; and will be sold at the low price of ONE DOLLAR a copy.

I. It gives a brief history of the doctrine from the earliest ages, and notices of its most eminent defenders.

II. It clearly and particularly sets forth the sentiments of Universalists.

III. It gives the evidences of Universalism as contained in the sacred Scriptures, by which it is infallibly proved that said doctrine is the doctrine of the Bible.

IV & V. It explains all the principal passages, both in the Old and New Testaments, which have been used to disprove Universalism, amounting to upwards of ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY, in which all the different subjects are discussed, wherein light is so much needed,—such as the words rendered 'hell,' the 'lake of fire,' the 'furnace of fire,' 'unquenchable fire,' 'everlasting fire,' 'everlasting destruction,' 'eternal judgment,' 'coming forth from the graves to condemnation,' the 'sin against the Holy Ghost,' 'day of judgment,' 'destruction of the soul,' 'kingdom of heaven,' &c. &c.

VI. It answers the common objections to Universalism.

VII. It points out the moral tendency of Universalism, and the duties of those who believe in that benign and heart-cheering sentiment.

VIII. It furnishes a Constitution for Universalist Societies, and advice in regard to the formation and management of the same; showing the only way in which they can enjoy prosperity. It also gives all the laws of the Commonwealth in regard to religious Societies.

IX. It gives directions in regard to the formation of Churches,—presents a plan of Church Government,—gives scriptural views of the Lord's Supper,—and a form of the administration of that service, for the benefit of young clergymen.

X. This chapter is on the evidences of revealed religion; and presents entire that masterly work, which never has been answered, and never can be refuted, Leslie's 'Short Method with the Deists.' Never but one Infidel attempted to answer it, and he gave up the task in despair.

This work is bound firm and strong, because we wish Universalists to lend it freely among their opponents.

DAVIS' IMPROVED OXYGENATED SOAP. The Oxygenated Soap, as a Cosmetic and for Shaving, stands unrivalled. It is a composition in which pure Caustic Alkali is exhibited in its mildest form, united with a large portion of oxygen—a substance so well known to be essential to life, that it has obtained, in its gaseous forms, the name of Vital Air.

In external applications, especially when aided by the cleansing virtues of soap, it has a beneficial effect. It renders the skin soft and pliable, and preserves it in a healthy state; it gives it the bloom and purity of youth, and by its invigorating and strengthening qualities, enables the skin to perform its functions, known to be so necessary in the economy of nature for the preservation of beauty and the enjoyment of health. It removes all cutaneous eruptions, and is recommended as the best remedy for roughness of hands, Freckles, &c. that has ever been offered to the public.

This celebrated article is for sale in any quantity, on reasonable terms, at Messrs. THOMAS WHITTEMORE, 37 Cornhill; W. C. Stimson & Co's. south side Faneuil Hall; J. P. Hall Union street; Brewster, Stephens & Cushing, Washington st; A. G. Peck & Co, cor. of Kilby and Water st; Lowe & Read, Merchants-Row; J. Kidder, Court st; Lewis & Co Trott & Bigelow, State street. Also, retailed by Druggists generally in this city and throughout the United States.

JOB PRINTING
NEATLY DONE AT THIS OFFICE.

MILLER'S THEORY REFUTED. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted.

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

DODS' SHORT SERMONS. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the new stereotype edition of 'DODS' SHORT SERMONS,' with addition of several important articles. These Sermons have been regarded by the Universalist public with great favor. The first edition was taken up with avidity.—At the request of many friends, the author was induced to revise the work, and add many important essays on deeply interesting subjects; in which the author has thrown much light on subjects that have been regarded as very difficult to be understood. 'Mr. Dods,' says a distinguished correspondent, 'has done much to throw light on the sacred volume. Many of his expositions have struck us with great force. He has given us great light. Difficult subjects are explained clearly by him.'

Price of the work 75 cents. Wholesale dealers will find it to their interest to call at 37 Cornhill.

ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM, SECOND EDITION. Just received and for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'The Ancient History of Universalism, from the commencement of the Christian Era to the time of the Reformation.' By HOSEA BALLOU 2d., of Medford. Price $1 per copy. A suitable discount to those who buy to sell again. It is a highly valuable work.

LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

THAYER'S BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT. THIRD EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT, OR SCRIPTURAL GUIDE FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, being sketches of the Antiquities, Customs and Manners of the Jews, in illustration of Scripture, designed for the use of Teachers, Bible Classes, and the Higher Classes in Sunday Schools.' By Rev. THOMAS B. THAYER, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Lowell, Mass. This book is on a new plan, suggested to its author by his experience in conducting Sunday Schools and Bible Classes. It is not a book of questions merely; but each chapter consists of two parts,—1st. The history to which the questions refer is succinctly given, which is to be faithfully studied, and 2d. The Questions. We have examined this work, and commend it; but any formal commendation is rendered quite unnecessary by the well known reputation of its author.

Price 25 cents single, $2,50 per dozen.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LIBRARY BOOKS. An assortment of SUNDAY SCHOOL LIBRARY BOOKS, is kept constantly for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill. All the CLASS BOOKS used in our Schools, are also kept for the accommodation of customers. These Books will be sold at the lowest cash prices. Purchasers are invited to call.—Schools in the country, wishing for Books, can send to Mr. Whittemore, the age and number of scholars, and the amount of money to be expended, and he will select the Books, and forward them by the safest and earliest conveyance.

BALFOUR'S INQUIRIES. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office, 27 Cornhill, Boston, 'THREE INQUIRIES—1st. Into the Scriptural Doctrine concerning the Devil and Satan. 2d. The Extent and Duration expressed by the terms Olim, Aion, and Aionios, rendered Everlasting, &c. &c. in the Bible, and especially when applied to punishment. 3d. The New-Testament doctrine concerning the Possession of Devils. By WALTER BALFOUR, of Charlestown. Price $1.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE PARABLES. TENTH EDITION. For sale at this Office, the work entitled 'NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PARABLES OF THE NEW-TESTAMENT, arranged according to the time in which they were spoken. By THOMAS WHITTEMORE.' 382 pages large 12mo at the low price of 75 cents per copy. Twenty per cent discount by the dozen. All the parables of the New Testament are explained at length in this work, and illustrated by appeals to the sacred Scriptures. Particular attention has been paid to those parables which have been used to prove the doctrine of future endless misery; and extracts are given from Orthodox Commentators, of great respectability, to show that they have explained them as Universalists now do.

BOOK OF PROMISES. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. BULFINCH EMMONS. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

TERMS OF PUBLICATION.

Two dollars per annum payable in ADVANCE; which fifty cents will be ADDED, if not paid within six months from the time of subscribing.

Agents who become RESPONSIBLE for six subscribers, shall, each year, receive a volume therefor, as long as they retain their responsibility, and the same proportion, for a less or greater number.

All papers will be forwarded, until an explicit order for a discontinuance is received; and whether taken up by the subscriber or not from the place where they are deposited, he will be held accountable for the pay until he orders a discontinuance, and pays up all that is due.

☞All communications concerning the paper must be addressed to Thomas Whittemore, 'Trumpet Office,' Boston—and those forwarded by mail must be post paid.

LIABILITIES OF THOSE WHO TAKE PERIODICALS.

The laws declare that any person to whom a periodical is sent is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office, or person with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a post office, store, tavern, or other place of deposite, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the postmaster, store or tavern keeper, &c. is responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or gives notice to the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

Post Office Regulations. Extract from the 'instructions to postmasters,' p. 50, sec. 118. 'In every instance in which papers that come to your office are not taken out by the person to whom they are sent, you will give immediate notice of it to the publishers, anning the reason, if known, why the papers are not taken out.

In all cases where Postmasters render themselves liable for the subscription money for a paper, by a neglect to notify the publisher that it remains dead in the Post Office, the Postmaster General reserves the right to admonish the Postmaster for his neglect, and requires him to pay for the paper, or reform him out of office.

The Spirituality of True Worship.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

'But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth.'—John iv. 23.

It is a trite and well known fact, that the principle of religious worship is of all ages and countries. At least, so ancient and wide-spread is it, that the remark of Lord Kaimes may be well considered, and the question arise, whether it is not innate and universal.—Says he—'That there exist beings, one or many, powerful above the human race, is a proposition universally admitted as true in all ages and among all nations. I boldly call it universal, notwithstanding what is reported of some gross savages; for reports that contradict what is acknowledged to be general among men, require able vouchers. Among many savage tribes there are no words but for objects of external sense; is it surprising that such people are incapable of expressing their religious perceptions, or any perceptions of internal sense? The conviction that men have of superior powers, in every country where there are words to express it, is so well vouched, that, in fair reasoning, it ought to be taken for granted among the few tribes where learning is deficient.'

True, my hearers, this religious spirit has been manifested in monstrous forms, and attended with horrid and disgusting rites. The attributes of ONE have been distributed among many, and the heart's adoration has been wasted at the altar of an hundred gods.—Blind to the pure and proper characteristics of Deity, men have formed their notions of them after the similitude of gross and imperfect humanity, and have bestowed upon them the qualities of brutal and unholy passions.—Still, I say, in all these exhibitions, you have evidences of the existence of a principle of religious worship—a principle stirring in the heart of man, and prompting him to bow the knee and pour the prayer. It is the spirit of religious worship that operates wherever you turn your eyes back upon those old superstitions. It is the spirit of religious worship that manifests itself where the Sabean adores the animated stars, or where the northern Thor sits and thunders—where flames the sacred fire the Gheber honors, or where stands the temple of the Olympian Jupiter.

Nor, dark and degrading as these forms may be, does there appear to be an entire absence of something loftier and brighter than humanity—something more congenial than the mere existences of this earth to the infinite longings and capacities of the soul. There is certainly an idea of vast power in that arm that hurled the Titans from their battlements—that drove the chariot of the golden sun across the sky—that swayed a kingly sceptre over the waters of the heaving deep. There is an idea of prescience—of something beyond the knowledge of the soul in its mortal bonds, when we speak of questioning the oracle, and of reading the stars, to know the solemn destinies of the future. There is not a want of the beautiful, in that mythology that peopled different portions of earth with divinities—that gave to Ceres the ripe harvest, and to Pomona the blushing fruitage—that gave a dryad to the bowering tree and a naiad to the crystal fountain. I say, there is something gleaming through all this darkness, beyond the mere outward and material matters of earthly existence. It has not been enough for man that the earth should be spread out green, and the mountains lift their tall heads to heaven—that the streams should be poured out around him, and that, day after day, over the vast blue arc the sun should glide, lighting up these mountains and this earth; and that, night after night, the sweet moon and the stars, with their silver pomp, should move over and picture their forms and their brightness in those outspread and slumbering waters. It has not been enough for man, that he has put forth and plucked bright flowers, and sat down by the wild-wood, and listened to music from a thousand voices; it has not been enough that the cattle have been given to graze for him upon the hills, and that the golden seed has shot up into abundant harvests. It is not enough for man, my hearers, to stand up amid all the glory and grandeur of this visible universe, and let his soul take cognizance of what he has seen and felt. But, soaring beyond the limitless and ever heaving ocean, and above the awful mountain-tops with their robes of thunder, and above the bright ten-thousand worlds that burn afar, he has sought objects to worship—beings of divinity—whose high natures these infinite and lofty things have shadowed forth, and for whom his hands have built altars that his heart might bow down and adore.

Such are the manifestations of the religious spirit, and it is idle and useless to tell me that it is an exotic spirit—a spirit that has no adaptation to, or foundation in, our nature—that has been engendered among the principles of the soul, by wild and ghastly shapes of superstition, and cunningly fostered and strengthened by artifices of the magistrate and the priest. Root out every proof of innate ideas if you can—shew me, as you can shew, that crafty policy and unholy ambition have worked deeply and darkly in the human mind—still I ask you, if the mind of man has not an adaptation to religious worship as naturally, if it does not apprehend it as easily and as voluntarily, as the hand uses the implements of labor, or the brain performs its functions of thought? Does this principle of religious worship jar with those universal harmonies to which the soul responds?—does the soul follow strangely its impulses? Does it not acknowledge its sway as naturally as it does the principle of human love, as the high and ardent desire for intellectual knowledge? The immortal mind soars up and measures the stars, and wonders at their beauty, and measures the way of their courses—does it not just as naturally tread in the courts above these stars, and spread 'its shining wings' to the light of a spiritual world, and bow in solemn worship? You may build your cunning hypotheses as to the origin of religious worship; but you must go farther for me than that—you must account for the adaptation and harmony of the mind with this spirit; and until you can shew whence sprung the sources of thought—the deep capacity for intellectual inquisition—with all your scepticism and your boasted triumph, you have not resolved the mysteries of man's moral nature, or shown that the universe has no God!

But, again—point me to a time, in all the long lapse of history, when there was no religious worship—when earth had no altar and the winds heard no prayer! You can point, perhaps, to the time when Palmyra was not—when Thebes had none of its hundred gates. You may tell me when Cecrops laid the foundations of Greece, and what was the origin of the seven-hilled City of empires. You may tell me of the birth of Kings who have dazzled earth with splendor, of warriors who have shaken it with battle. You may point to the childhood of the Lydian Croesus, and the cradle of the all-victorious Macedonian. But, brush away the sands from the ruined shrines of Isis, and uncover the ashes of Indian priests, and tell me—when was the religious spirit first developed? Who was the cunning hierarch that first started the idea? who was the mighty monarch that first said—'Let it prevail?' Earth's mountains are as old as the creation, and they stand up hoary with the breath of ages. Earth's oceans have rolled as they now roll, in storm and sunshine and limitless grandeur, six thousand years. Earth's green forests, that wave in beauty, were germs long years ago, and those germs sprung up where other forests had stood that grew in successive generations through slow-moving centuries. But when, when was it, that man has looked upon these tall mountains, that heaving deep, those ancients and primeval forests, and not had a thought of Deity—of worship? And now, when empires have passed away, and kings and warriors have died, and tombs and trophies have crumbled down—now, over the wide earth, in all its far corners and its distant islands of the sea, are the movings of this religious spirit, and you would as soon expect to see nature pause in her work, and the great heart of Time cease its pulsations, as to see that spirit depart from among men, and its temples topple to the earth!

But this spirit, in all ages, has been manifested in modes darkened and deformed.—And, as we go back from the present period—as we draw near to those limits in which truth and fiction are inextricably blended—where the shadows lie heavy and the dim light of tradition falls—we find an almost universal corruption in religious worship.—We find strange idols, and unhallowed sacrifices, and red and reeking altars. We find, from the earliest ages, the great mass of humanity wandering astray, blind to the true idea of Deity, and oppressed with monstrous and gross superstitions. In the midst of all this arises, isolated and sublime, the Jewish Theology. In the midst of all this error and sin, we find the old patriarch of Ur—the pious father of Israel—Abraham, rejecting the abominations of idol-worship and clinging to the altars of the One True God. We see a people standing among the nations—solitary—holding up the Ark of the Lord amid the dark rushing waters of idolatry, and recognizing the One eternal Spirit as the Great Creator of all things. We see them taught through trumpet-blasts and thunderings—guided by inspired Teachers, surrounded by solemn miracles and infallible prophecies; themselves lapsing into false worship, yet swayed, as it were, by the evil influence but for a moment—returning again to their peculiar and glorious faith, and handing it from father to son, down through dark ages; until the brightness of the promised Advent burst upon them—until the Shiloh came, to abolish their symbols and put aside their types, and to pour the full light of the doctrine of the One God abroad upon the blinded nations of the earth.

My hearers, we, at the present day, are so accustomed to find people worshipping One Supreme and Infinite Spirit, who is the Maker and Ruler of all things, that we may not, at first, comprehend the sublime spectacle which the Jewish nation presents in its history. We must look back to those dim, star-light ages, when, among a thousand altars, and amid specious and shifting systems, one people alone, confined to a narrow strip of earth, held to this high doctrine—one people alone, whose priests went into a temple where rested the glory of the Most High—one people alone, who, gazing upon the light and beauty and wonder of this earth and seeing the splendid mechanism of the world moving and shining above them, strung their harps to the praises of Him, whose 'Glory the heavens declare and whose handy-work the firmament showeth forth'—one people alone, whose prophets on their solemn mountain-tops, saw the distant shining of future destinies, and hailed the coming of that Sun that should arise 'with healing in his wings'—one people alone of all the vast millions of the 'peopled earth,' through ages, unshaken, unchanged, holding to the sublime doctrine of One God, and worshipping Him without statue or likeness, as the heathen worshipped their gods of gold, and ivory, and marble.

True, we may well believe that their ideas at first were narrow—that their God was, to their ideas, like those of the nations around them, a sectional Deity, a national God; and that they cherished contracted views until the empowered and annointed messenger came. Still, their's was 'One God and none other but He.' He was acknolwedged and adored in all things. To His praise the sound of the song and the timbrels rolled over 'the dark sea.' To His praise went up the psalm before the Ark, to which all the people said, 'Amen, and praised the Lord.' To Him went up the solemn prayer at that great dedication, when the Saints 'arrayed in white linen, having cymbals and psalteries and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets'—when the house was filled with a cloud, when the glory of the Lord filled the house. To Him went up that solemn prayer, when 'the fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt offerings and the sacrifices,' and all the children of Israel bowed down upon the pavement 'and worshipped and praised.....saying for He is good; for his mercy endureth forever.'

How pointless and irrelevant are the attacks of the unbeliever upon the Jewish Theocracy! Assuming that which should not be assumed, that the government and circumstances of that people, coming from God, should harmonize with the present state of things, and possess all the excellence and spirituality of religion as known at the present day, you find them carping at this act, contemning and abhorring this Law—as unworthy of a Theocracy—a government whose immediate dispenser was God. But, let the infidel consider—let him remember the circumstances of the time—and his contempt and abhorrence should be changed into wonder and conviction. The Jews were selected from among the tribes of men, adopted peculiarly, and especially educated by Jehovah.—He employed miracles calculated to convince them of this adoption, to shew them that He was God over all the gods of surrounding nations—the only God. But it is not in accordance with His plan to force the human mind, supernaturally and independently of its own workings, up to perfection. That was, as it is now, to be a gradual work; and, therefore, unless He had superseded the very laws which He established, and counteracted the very scheme which it seems to be His great purpose to carry out, He would not make the Jews a perfect people—He would not give them a perfect conception of the spirituality of religion, which was to be revealed through Christ; He would not, therefore, give them at first, the most spiritual and exalted system.—He treated them as children, and He adapted his laws & acts among them to their capacities—with reference to their gradual knowledge and improvement. I say, then, how idle and futile these objections to the Mosaic economy! Do you expect to see men in the twilight of the world, treated like men at its noon-tide? Do you see this principle going on in anything around you? Do the productions of young genius bear the same excellence when he wanders wild among the mountains, as when he has learned the measures of the Stagyrite? Do you see the same beauty and glory, when the hills and vallies and lakes sleep in the grey light of the dawn, as when the full sunbeams burst upon them, displaying the green forests and uncurtaining the dwellings of men, and revealing the dew-drops and the flowers? In short, my hearers, do you take a child and learn him the largest philosophy first, or its elements? We all know your answer. Would it not be an absurd objection, then, if, when that child became a man, and thought and spoke and understood as a man, forgetting his former condition and applying them to his present state, he should hold up those elements in scorn, and say, because they were of such a nature you never could have been his teacher? Apply this illustration to the Jews, and you have the answer to witty skepticism and profound unbelief. As I said before, our feelings may well be those of wonder and conviction, when we consider the sublime spectacle that the Jewish people presents among the nations of the earth, and its superiority to them in its mode of religious worship.

But the notions of the Jews were imperfect. The universality and spirituality of religious worship appear not to have been known to him in its full extent. It yet needed a system to rise in the earth more glorious and beautiful than any that had preceded it. The Gospel was this system, and the spirituality of true worship is one of its prime and essential teachings. We will mention two instances in which its beauty and excellence in this respect, are set forth. The one was among the heathen at Athens. Upon that proud Areopagus, amid the marble statutes and wreathed altars of many gods, to the ears of the mass and to the arrogant and haughty teachers of philosophy, Paul preached that 'God that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands;—neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needeth anything, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us: for in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring. Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone graven by art and man's device. And the times of this ignorance God winked at;—but now commandeth all men every where to repent; because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.'

And, despite their mockery and unbelief, their systems vanished before that faith—their altars crumbled and passed away—and in the columned streets of Athens, and on the crowned heights of Olympus, and amid all the monuments and trophies of idolatry, the prayer and the praise went up to the One True God.

The other instance which I would present, is that recorded in our text. Sitting by the well of Jacob and conversing with a woman of Samaria, in answer to her remark—'Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship'—Jesus says—'Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father.—Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth.'

And that mount of Gerizim was not long the disputed place of worship, and that temple at Jerusalem was soon swept before the flame of the Roman—but away on, through the wide earth, on a thousand hills, and in ten thousand vallies, in hamlet and in palace, in forest and desert, and on the lone sea, there are shrines erected to the Father, and He is worshipped as a Spirit, in spirit and in truth.

Thus, my hearers, I have dwelt upon the topics, of the prevalence of the Religious Principle, of the superiority and comparative purity of the Jewish theology, and shewn the perfection and beauty of the Christian system. That 'God is a spirit' is one of its grand truths, and, acknowledging and cherishing that religious principle which dwells so widely in the hearts of men, it points out the proper mode in which that principle is employed, by directing us to worship him 'in spirit and in truth.'

Let us, ere we close, make a few special remarks.

In the first place, then—let us see to it that we rightly apprehend and cultivate this spirit of true worship. Let us see to it, that we do not exalt tenets and articles of faith, in point of consideration over the religious spirit.—Remember, the condition of the true worshipper is, that he 'worship the Father in spirit and in truth.' Now when you see such an one, whose conduct and whose teachings show that he does so worship, are you going to say to him—because he differs from you upon some minor points of faith—are you going to say to him, you are no true worshipper, you must come within the pale of our creed; you must worship here in our Gerizim, or there in our Jerusalem, or else your worship is nought or worse than nought?—Go and sit by the well in Samaria, and hear these local differences—these narrow sectarisms—rebuked. God's presence is not confined to this mountain or to that temple—that Being whose spirit is in the universal air, and whose glory brightens all the hosts of heaven, is not limited to reared temples—is not communed with by the mere intellectual operation of a belief in a tenet more or a tenet less. The heart is his shrine. 'Our hearts,' to use the beautiful expression of Hooker, 'are those golden censers from which the fume of this sacred incense must ascend.' The heart pure in its intent, and humble and sincere and grateful in its prayer—when its passions are all subdued to the will of God, and when this holy spirit has gone down and soothed and satisfied its troubled waters, the heart is the adytum—the innermost shrine—where the spirit of pure worship dwells. And when thy brother cherishes this spirit within and worships fervently and pure, because poor reason—because the head has erred—because he differs somewhat with the ipse dixits of your man-framed creed, and the great volumes which learned men have written, and from the popular doctrines of the multitude—is he, therefore, no true worshipper? Is there no place on all the mountain-tops, and beneath all the holy stars, except just here or exactly there, where the prayers of the sincere man will go up like angels, or the answers of heaven come down like dews from its crystal gates? Is there no place of worship but Gerizim—no temple but that of Jerusalem?—Beware of exalting tenets above inward principles!

Secondly. Let us see to it, that we do not deceive ourselves in our own acts of religious worship. The great truth of the text, shews us, my hearers, that we must worship with pure hearts—with hearts whose secret motives are right. Now, this is a truth which we all acknowledge, at once; but, after all, we may not practice upon it. It is so natural for us to hide much that is in our hearts, from our fellow-men—we have so many thoughts moving there that they cannot see, and that we would not will them to see—that I fear, when we come to the footstool of the eternal Throne, we bring this principle of concealment there, and worship God as though some of our thoughts were curtained even from his great eye; forgetting that no corner or atom in all His vast universe, is hidden from Him. How hollow the words which flow on the lip but gush not from the heart, to Him, who looks upon the springs and fountains of that heart! Shall we worship Him with mere lip service? Shall we stand and swing silver censers, or read from gilded books, or kneel on velvet cushions, or stand in the attitude of prayerful devotion, and consider these forms as all that is necessary, forgetting that it is the spirit—the 'spirit' and the 'truth'—that is essential? Shall we worship in a formal and heartless manner, when before Him are the bright ranks of blessed angels in fervent adoration, and the saints cast down their crowns and bow their heads? Shall we annul all the worship of heaven above, of the earth beneath—of the universe—shall we assume only the manner of worship, while we have no pulses within that answer to its spirit? 'God is a spirit,' my hearers, 'and they that worship Him, must worship Him in spirit and in truth.' We must come before Him, feeling that He knows all our wants and all our weaknesses. We must come with a sincere and child-like trust in Him. We must feel that it is a Father to whom we pray—an infinite parent, who is more ready to give good gifts to them that ask Him, than earthly parents are to give good gifts unto their children—who is able to heal our wounds, dry our tears and calm our sorrows—and with whom it is a privilege and a blessing to commune. We should cultivate this sense of a nearness between us and the Deity. We should realize that He 'is nearer to us than the air we breathe,' and not, as it were, throned at a distance, and unapproachable by our spirits. We are not to regard His 'exaltation above us as a distance'—'His greatness as a separation' from us. Such a mistake, in the language of another, 'lies at the very threshold of devotion.' It causes us to have wrong ideas in the commencement of our religious service; and 'when we enter the temple of our worship, how many are there that darken its light and disfigure its beauty.'—We are to get right ideas of God and of the nature of religious duty, and we shall be guarded from many errors in our worship.—We shall not only feel that formality and outward appearances are far worse than nothing if the heart goes not with our prayer; but we shall wish for something more than this formality—we shall feel in our hearts as we contemplate the nature of God and the relation which he bears to us, a desire to worship Him, to commune with Him, to pour out our sorrows and our wants before Him as before a good and omnipotent Father; and the bended knee and the bowed head will be but the expression of the true worship of the soul, and the words that gush from our lips, will flow warmly and deeply from our hearts.—Then we 'shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth.'

Finally. What a source of joy and consolation is the truth contained in the text! We are confined to no particular spot in our acts of religious worship—we are obliged to make no pilgrimages to distant shrines. We may worship God everywhere. We may praise Him in our closets or in the mart—in the lone silence of the desert or in the midst of 'the great congregation.' We may pray to Him beneath the lofty dome and the groined arches of the magnificent temple—or out in the depths of the forest, with nothing but its leafy canopy and the blue sky above us, and the verdant and mossy earth beneath. Out upon the deep sea we may praise him—when the silence of night is around us and we are far from our home. We may kneel upon the deck of the heaving ship, with the wide waste of waters all around us, and the bright stars beaming upon us from their blue homes above—and there we may worship God. The high and the low, the rich and the poor—all may worship him. There is not a peculiar form to be observed—there is no costly sacrifice to be given, God is everywhere with us, and we may everywhere commune with him. And I say this is a source of joy and consolation. It causes us to feel that we have a friend to whom we can apply, whatever may be our condition or our location. And this has consoled the crushed, and the sorrowing, and the desolate; and it is a cause of joy to all who have felt its truth—to all who profess the spirit of true worship. Let us cultivate this spirit—living not only here in the enjoyment of religion and of blessed communion with God, but preparing for that sphere where no earthly passions taint—where no human frailty wars—but where the motives of every heart are seen as through crystal—where they will surround the throne and sing the song of redemption, and as the bright immortal ages glide through the cycle of eternity, will worship God 'in spirit and in truth.'

Hero of Truth.

RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED TO REV. H. BALLOU.

Nobly the warrior stood,
Strong in his battle might;
And his voice rang clear thro' the solemn wood,
Where the watch-fire flashed its light.
The startled panther sprang up and fled,
And the serpent crept away,
For he feared a bruise on his venomed head
From a weapon strong to slay.

But the birds sang wild and sweet
And the wild flowers clustered around his feet,
And bowed at his lordly tread.
And far in the wilderness sang the streams,
With ominous tones and deep;
They had wakened his soul from the fitful dreams
That haunted its morning sleep.

And nobly now he stood,
Strong in his battle might,
For the cause that nerved him was human good,
The Noble, the True, the Right!
At the frown of the haughty he trembled not,
Nor shrunk from the eye of scorn;
For his soul was girded to meet the lot
For which he was nobly born.

With a weapon dyed in blood,
Old giant Error rose;
He had fought and conquered before the flood,
And who dared now oppose?
As Apollyon fought in the lonely vale,
With the Pilgrim worn and weak,
With the youth of the beardless cheek.

As the Philistine giant strove,
With his sword and spear and shield,
'Gainst the youth who came in the name of Jove,
To battle in Elah's field;
So Error, the giant of centuries' growth,
With scorn on his lip at play,
Came out 'gainst the stripling whose sling was truth,
And vowed him to death a prey!

But the battle was still the Lord's!
And the hosts of the giant fled,
Leaving behind, with their broken swords,
Their champion, Error, dead!
While the army of Israel, firm and strong,
Shout 'Victory!' loud and high;
And the valleys ring with the triumph-song,
'Thus Error shall ever die!'

And now the warrior rests;
Peace on his reverend head!
Peace mid the tumult of waving crests,
And an army's thundering tread!
Peace while he gazes in proud delight
On the youthful champions round!
He hath run the race—he hath fought the fight—
Let the HERO OF TRUTH be CROWNED!

Which of all the different Sects is to be prefered?

I said to the Sun, thou bright luminary of day, may a humble tenant of the earth, on which thou hast for nearly six thousand years poured an overwhelming flood of thy blessed light and heat, be allowed to ask thee, which of all the different sects of religionists in this little world thou holdest in highest regard? And the Sun said unto me, though thou art but an humble tenant of this little spec of a world, and art very small in thine own sight, as it becometh thee to be, thou art not beneath my notice, as thou must know from the blessings thou hast enjoyed from my favors. And as to the question which thou hast, in thy simplicity, asked of me, I must counsel thee to judge of me by what I do, and entertain no scruples in regard to my sincerity. Then I said to the Sun, I have for many years enjoyed the sweets and delights of thy marvelous light, and I have carefully observed that people of all ranks, conditions, characters, and sects have been equally favored with the same; and if I judge of thee by what thou doest, then must I conclude that thou art, in sincerity, equally kind to all. The Sun then said to me, thou hast judged rightly.

Then said I to the Sun, I would humbly ask of thee to tell me, if thou knowest, whether all the bright stars, which sparkle throughout, and beautify the heavens, are in agreement with thee, in thy equal regard toward mankind? And the Sun replied; thou must learn the true answer to this question by the same rule which I gave thee by which to solve the former. Then I said to the Sun, my little weak heart is glad; and though I am so very small, I am full of joy, that all the host of heaven, above and around me, are in unison, and in perfect communion, on this great subject of my queries.

In my joy and gladness of heart I paused a moment, and said to the Sun, may I still ask, if all the elements of nature, of which this world is composed, and of which I myself consist, are in accordance with the heavens, in regard to the subject of my queries? Then said the Sun unto me, thou needest not to have asked this question, for the counsel I gave thee before will enable thee to solve this query as well as the former. Then did I say to the Sun, I am thankful for thy instructions, and thy admonitions; but I humbly desire to ask, whether that almighty Being, who rules over all worlds, and on whom all depend, is pleased with this impartial favor which I see in the heavens and in all the elements of nature? Then did the Sun say unto me, I am but a creature of the great Being of whom thou speakest, and so are all the hosts of heaven and earth; and we being subject to his divine control, are, in all our operations, but an expression of his mind and will; and if thou wouldst know his disposition towards his creatures, thou must judge of that by what he does.

Then did I raise my thoughts beyond all creatures, which my eyes beheld; and as a drop of dew glows with the beams of the Sun, so did my heart feel a transporting joy in the light of God. H. B.

The Bible.

Who can measure the amount of good, gathered by mankind on earth, from this blessed Book? Meditation may fly, as on the wings of the wind, but its value extends beyond the utmost stretch of thought. What could we know of the love of our Father in heaven, without it? Nature, it is true, reveals his goodness throughout all her works; but she also reveals his power. She teaches most plainly, that he is a God of power and a God love. But this Book tells us he 'is love.' Without this assurance, it is believed, we should learn to fear and dread the power, rather than love and adore the goodness, displayed in Nature. The Bible is Nature's mirror. Looking at her through this glass, we discover that love governs all her movements—in the dreadful hurricane as in the gentle shower—in the bursting volcano, as in the life-giving rays of the sun. In a word it informs us, that love itself—love all-knowing—love all-powerful, sits at the helm of universal government, and directs with equal care, the largest and most minute events, connected with this world, and all who inhabit it. It teaches us of him who made us, and the purpose for which we were made—of him also, 'whom to know aright, is (not shall be) life eternal.' It is the source of all true knowledge, holiness and happiness.

'It is the Book of God. What if I could Say God of books;
Let him who looks
Angry at this expression, as too bold,
His thoughts in silence smother,
Till he find such another.'

The number of books now extant exceed computation, and they are daily increasing, some of them are bad, some very good. But where, among them all, is there one volume, the study of which, has power to cheer the disconsolate, to raise up the bowed down, to heal the broken-hearted, to break the fetters of unbelief and sin, and let the captive go free? The Bible alone has a balm for every wound. It will enable us to exult in our God as a God of love; even while he causes the billows of affliction to overflow us, we can look up as it were from between the waves, and say, 'It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good.' And why? Because we have learned from this book that he 'is God and there is none else;' he 'makes peace and creates evil,' and still he is love, and does all in love. This silences all our murmurings, and presents a strong foundation on which we may rest, and all the waves of life or the billows of death cannot move us. Here is the true source of all real submission or reconciliation to the will of God. Here we may triumph in an assurance that every enemy to the Redeemer's kingdom, sin not excepted, shall be destroyed; that a ransomed universe shall be redeemed from the power of the grave, and be clothed in the image of the heavenly, and all sorrow and sighing flee away. O, then, let us prize this precious book more and more, and do all in our power by precept and example, to spread its heavenly teachings, till all shall come to a knowledge of that truth that maketh free.

While blest with such a heavenly guide,
Its rich instructions let us hide,
As treasure in the soul;
From thence may they emit a light,
In unbelief and error's night,
Till they dispel the whole. H. O. P.

Nature.

Though natue employs an infinity of means, she permits man only the end which she purposes. Her works are subjected to rapid destruction; but proofs always exist of the immortal constancy of her designs. It is on that she wishes to fix his heart and his mind. She wishes to render man good and happy, rather than ingenious and great. Everywhere she weakens necessary evils, and everywhere she multiplies even superfluous blessings. Life endures for an whole age: death only an instant. She causes man to behold, during their whole period, the agreeable developements and growth of life; but conceals from him with tender, with maternal precaution, the hasty progress of dissolution.

Nature drives us far from the spectacles and ministers of destruction, and invites us to her harmonies. She has multiplied these harmonies wherever they might be useful to us; and she considers that as useful which delight us. In this benevolent attention to us, she has gone far beyond the laws which she seems to have prescribed to herself, and far beyond what our study of those laws could lead us to expect as necessary circumstances. It is thus that dry and barren rocks repeat, by their echoes, the murmurs of the waters and the forests; and the smooth surface of the waters, which have neither hills or forests of their own, represent these, by reflection, in all their forms.

First of January.

This is an important period to us. It is the close of the first half year, and consequently the time when many of our subscribers make payment for the volume and save the sum of fifty cents. Our terms are

'Two dollars per annum payable IN ADVANCE; to which FIFTY CENTS will be ADDED, if not paid within six months from the time of subscribing.' See Terms, published in every paper.

We desire to return our thanks most sincerely o those who have paid us. The Legislature of Massachusetts meets on the first Wednesday in January, when the Representatives will come to Boston from almost every town in the State.—Doubtless every Representative, unless prevented by sickness, will be here at the opening of the Legislature. They have always been willing to bring us any thing our subscribers may have to send. Our office is in the central part of the city (37 Cornhill) and it will be but little trouble to them to call.

Such as prefer, can hand the money to the Postmaster, who will doubtless send it without expence. This will be the best for those out of the State. Such as owe for several years, if they cannot send the whole, are requested to send a part.

There is no fact appertaining to the religious opinions we hold of which we are more firmly persuaded, than that the morality of Universalism is of a pure and elevated character. All that is necessary to make every Universalist a good man, in the true and proper acceptation of those words, is to make him in practice what he is in profession. The practical Universalist must be a good man. There is nothing visionary or fanciful here. All those who carry out the principles of the doctrine we profess, in their practice, will be what the gospel requires men to be, lovers of God, and lovers of their kind. We are well aware that this doctrine has been charged with exerting an immoral tendency. We have been told, times without number, that it encourages wickedness. Now we meet this objection with facts. Of two professed Universalists, one of them striving to illustrate the principles of his faith in his walk and conversation, the other being a Universalist merely by profession, but giving no particular heed to the system as a rule of practice, which will be the better man? Which will be more likely to love God as a Father, and to regard and serve men as brethren? There can be but one answer to this question. That this doctrine is congenial to enlightened piety, is evident from the daily prayers which ascend to the throne of grace, that all men may be saved. A doctrine so congenial to piety and benevolence, as to engage all good men to pray that it may be true, cannot have a bad influence. We allow that it may be misunderstood and perverted, and then the good influence of it would be lost. The grace of God of old was turned into lasciviousness; but who would argue from this that the natural tendency of divine grace was evil? A New England divine, who made himself quite eminent by his opposition to Universalism twenty-five years ago, allowed that the tendency of that doctrine on a good man was salutary. After stating that the effect of this doctrine on a bad man was unfavorable, he is very particular to add, 'But that the belief of Universalism would have the same effect upon those who are born of God, we have never said; much less that if we believed it, we would by all means live in all manner of sin in this life.' The same divine, in a published discourse, that came out in 1818, after a most fallacious argument, designed to show that the wicked would encourage themselves in sin by this sentiment, says, (and let all observe his words) 'I speak not the language of the pious soul, who knows the comforts of religion, and rejoices in his liberty as a child of God, being set free from sin, and the power of Satan; but of those who know nothing of that comfort and liberty, and who delight in the drudgery of sin, and hug their chains.' Unfortunately for his argument he adds, 'These are the people who mistake in every thing. They call evil good, and good evil; they put darkness for light, and light for darkness, bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter.' We should expect that Universalism would be misunderstood by such people. How can it be otherwise? If they call good evil, how can we expect they would make a proper use of so good a doctrine? It would of course be the contrary doctrine that they would consider good, on the Rev. gentleman's own rule. He acknowledges, just what we have always asserted, that Universalism is a doctrine congenial to piety. How necessary is it, under this view of the subject, that the preachers of this doctrine should be careful to enforce its moral influences upon their hearers. Have we been sufficiently careful in this respect? We fear that there has been a coldness and indifference to practical preaching, and too little attention to the nature of the doctrine we profess. A correct practice as naturally grows out of a right understanding of divine grace, as the fruit succeeds the blossom upon the tree. Every doctrinal sermon should be preached with a view to the moral advantage of our hearers; and we should never fail to let them see and know and feel that object. All preachers of this doctrine should be careful to show the image of it in their own lives; and they will then have no reluctance to make a practical application of every sentiment they advance. There are too many persons hanging about the skirts of our societies, who know nothing of the doctrine we profess, except a mere abstract proposition that all men are to be happy at last. They reason but little upon the subject. They feel no filial relation to God, nor fraternal interest in the welfare of their fellow creatures; they 'must be born again.' Would to God there could be a revival of pure religion among persons of this description. We do not wish to change their natures; but we wish to break through the barrier of selfishness in which they are encased, and let the light and influence of divine grace in upon their souls. O may the time not be far distant when this shall be done. Come, Lord Jesus, come, and breath upon the slain, that these dry bones may live.

What a moral power would the order of christians to which we belong exert, if every professed believer of Universalism was a practical Universalist. An unbelieving world would again be constrained to say, 'Behold how these christians love one another.' We should be 'a peculiar people, zealous of good works.' Our prosperity hitherto would be but a type, a mere shadow of what would come, if this happy consummation would appear. Let us then give more diligence to this matter.

Unfounded Claims.

It has several times been asserted that Elder Knapp, (the same who slandered the widow in Providence, and who paid $200 for the offence,) was the cause of the beginning of the Washingtonian movement at Baltimore. We learn, that Mr. Knapp himself has recently made this assertion in Salem, in the course of a Temperance lecture delivered there. Now we have the fullest confidence that this statement is utterly false. It is mere gasconade; and being put forth in the sacred desk, or what should be the sacred desk, it is wicked. Who ever heard of Knapp, as being one of the originators of that enterprise, except from his own lips, or the lips of his lackies? Who ever heard John Hawkins mention Knapp's name in connection with it? Who ever knew any person from Baltimore, connected with the rise of the Washingtonian movement, ascribe it in any degree to Knapp. We have heard Hawkins describe the rise of that movement with great particularity; and it was not possible, according to the account he gave, for Knapp to have had any participation in it whatsoever. We put down the revivalist's declaration, therefore, that he originated this movement, as mere chaff, which he scatters in the hope of catching the unwary birds.

If, as we verily believe, Knapp had nothing whatever to do with the rise of the Washingtonian reformation in Baltimore, how are we to regard his statement referred to above? Is it true? St. Peter's advice is very applicable to Mr. K.'s case. 'Add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, TEMPERANCE; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, BROTHERLY KINDNESS; and to brotherly kindness, CHARITY.'—We have not much confidence in the success of Mr. Knapp as a lecturer on temperance; but we beseech him to add to his temperance, brotherly kindness and charity. Our beloved Br. Paul says, 'Whatsoever things are true; whatsoever things are honest, &c. &c. if there be any virtue, any praise, think on these things.' We commend that passage most particularly to Mr. K.'s attention. If he has any virtue, and any thing worthy of praise, let him inquire what is honest, what is just? what is lovely, what is of good report? Was it honest for him to represent himself as the originator of the Washingtonian movement? was it pure? was it lovely? was it of good report? Candor asks the question; let candor answer it.

We doubt the expediency of inviting this man to deliver Temperance lectures. He avails himself of those occasions to spit out his venom upon those sects which differ from him. His Temperance lectures, so called, are not Temperance lectures; there is nothing temperate about them; they are mere sectarian harrangues; and always harm the Temperance cause.

The Profession of our Faith.

'Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering,' said the apostle Paul. Heb. x. 23. What faith did he refer to here? Answer. The very faith which Paul himself cherished, viz. the faith in Jesus as the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world. Whatever faith Paul cherished, that was the faith which he desired others to hold fast. Now, what faith did he cherish?—Did he not believe that Jesus is the Saviour of the world, in the fullest sense of that term?—Hear him, 'For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of them who believe.' Now this gives us an insight into Paul's faith. He believed that God is the Saviour of all men, and in a special sense, the Saviour of believers. For this he labored, for this he suffered reproach. If his faith had not been dear to him, he would not have endured so much trial and pain on account of it. All the world could not make him abandon it. He held it fast. He held fast the profession of it. He did not content himself with merely holding the faith; he professed it; and he held fast the profession of it without wavering.

We might quote a large number of texts to show that we have defined Paul's faith correctly, but we forbear. The greater part of our readers must be familiar with Paul's epistles. If they are not, they ought to be. Let them read, and then they will see what faith to hold fast.

Baptising in Warm Water.

A new Baptist church-edifice has just been dedicated upon the lands of the South Cove Corporation, for the use of the Society and Church under the charge of Rev. Mr. Turnbull. Our Baptist friends claim that it is their duty to follow most particularly the example of our Saviour, in the matter of Baptism. They will not allow that sprinkling is baptism, because as they say, Jesus did not sprinkle. They will not allow that pouring is baptism, because Jesus did not pour. They must have it precisely as Jesus did, and nothing but immersion will do at any rate; and all who have been baptized in any other form, although they may have been wet all over, are not worthy, even if qualified in every other respect, to sit down at the table of Lord. The Baptists refuse to commune with such.

But these dear Baptist brethren seem to 'strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.' Of late they have made many departures from primitive customs. Jesus baptized in the river Jordan and other streams; but the Baptists now baptize in the Meeting-House. They have a huge box constructed in the broad-aisle, covered over with trap doors upon a level with the floor. When baptism is administered, the trap-doors are removed, and the candidates are led down into this box, and immersed. Is not this a wide departure from the ancient customs? Our Baptist friends have also departed from an ancient custom in another respect. We find in the arrangements of the new Meeting-House, which we mentioned at the beginning of this article, that 'there is a room for heating the water for the baptistry.' Whoever heard of the apostles baptising people in heated water? It seems very strange, that a class of christians who profess to be so punctilious that they must observe the very form of a form, should be so ready to depart from it. We cannot imagine how these things agree. We used to hear the Baptists preach altogether in favor of baptising in rivers, or at the sea-side. How accustomed were they to quote the words, 'And John also was baptising in Enon, because there was much water there.' They rung the changes on these words until every Baptist child five years old could repeat them. But now they must dispense with this passage altogether, or else re-translate it, in their new Bible as follows: 'And John also was baptising in the broad aisle because the box of heated water was there.' There is one advantage in this kind of baptism,—the Baptists may bring out their converts, like biscuit from a baker's oven, piping hot!

Revivals, Temperance, Charity.

Not revivals of pure and undefiled religion,—they are not opposed to Temperance: but revivals in the usual sense, meaning those excitements which are produced by the preaching of endless damnation, are, beyond all doubt, unfavorable to the cause of Temperance, and charity also. In the midst of these excitements, the Temperance and Charity lectures and assemblies are deserted by those engaged in the excitement. We recollect very well, when Mr. Knapp was in Boston, and Mr. Kirk, and Mr. Maffit, and we know not how many other revivalists; and we were told that there was a GREAT revival in Boston, and all the vestries were full; and there were morning, noon and night meetings in great abundance; and thousands had got religion, and thousands were getting religion, and thousands were hoping they should get religion; in this wonderful time, when, if we could have believed the reports, our very city was overflowing with grace, how were the charity lectures attended? Did the collections for the poor increase in proportion as it was asserted religion increased? Did brotherly love abound? Were the poor better fed? better clothed? better sheltered?—Alas, no; the people left these matters that they might get religion. They were told their eternal salvation depended on their getting religion, and do you suppose they could waste their time in attending charity lectures, and looking after the wants of the poor? There was a great zeal for sending Orthodoxy, (viz. the trio of errors,—the trinity, vicarious suffering, and eternal damnation,) to the heathen, or to any body else foolish enough to receive them; but no zeal for sending food to the hungry. We recollect that in the very midst of the great revival in Boston, a charity lecture was appointed at the Old South.—Who went? Was Mr. Knapp there? or Mr. Kirk? or Mr. Maffit? No. Did they put by their sectarian meetings, that their people might go? Far from it; the revival blast was to be kept up.—How was the charity lecture attended? By almost nobody. The preacher had a beggarly account of empty pews, and the collectors a beggarly account of empty boxes. Such are the fruits of Partialist revivals. There remains not the shadow of a doubt in our mind, that these excitements do more hurt than good. Gainsay it who can. Our columns are open to any respectable opponent. A Baptist professor was urged, at the time spoken of, to go to the charity lecture. He answered very pettishly, 'I can't.—We are engaged in a revival of religion. Let the Unitarians and Universalists take care of the poor—they have nothing else to do.'

We extract from the 'Balm of Gilead,' published at Concord, N. H. the following article, which confirms, very forcibly, the general tenor of our remarks:

REVIVALS versus TEMPERANCE. It is a fact, an undeniable, palpable fact, that the cause of Temperance is suffering more at the present moment, from so called 'revivals of religion,' than from all other causes combined. Wherever go Knapp, or Miller, or one of their satellites—wherever they can get up an 'excitement,' there goes down Temperance, and there thrive most the traffickers in the deadly poison. We appeal to the active agents in the cause, to say if we speak not the truth.

Look at Boston, at Lowell, at Concord, or at any other place where Knapp has been, and mark what has followed—how Temperance has struggled, faintly at last, and almost died. In Boston and Lowell the cause has recovered; but in other places, and among them our own, it has not yet, and never will, till the paralyzing cause is removed—till the 'excitement' is clean gone.

A Temperance Convention was held in our town last Saturday. But with all the exertions that were made to prevent a failure, but about fifty persons were in attendance! Mr. Fitzgibbon, a highly talented speaker, lectured the same evening, and one or two other evenings the same week, in each instance to only a handful of hearers; and one evening, an appointed lecture, by the same gentleman, was postponed, because the people could not be got out to hear. Meetings had been appointed for Monday and Tuesday evenings of this week, but the people were too much engaged with the 'excitement,' and so nothing was done. And, finally, the most foremost, zealous, and sanguine amongst the friends of the cause concluded that very little, if any thing, could be done for Temperance till the excitement should be over—in other words, till Knappism and Millerism are dead!

These are facts, plain and unvarnished; and they accord with hundreds of others which might be gleaned from a history of these excitements for the last two years. The writer of this, in a two years' war against intemperance, has met with enemies in various forms, but never, he solemnly assures the reader, in any more to be dreaded, than a Knapp or Miller revival.

Rev. E. Dow.

The Rev. E. Dow held a lecture on Sunday evening before last, at the Orthodox Meeting-House in Concord, N. H. for the avowed purpose of giving his reasons for the renunciation of Universalism. It happened very unluckily for the Rev. gentleman, that when he got into the pulpit he had no reasons to give, and the sermon was very generally regarded as a milk and water concern. It pleased nobody. If we may believe the 'Congregational Journal,' published in Concord, Mr. Dow has applied for admission to the Orthodox Church in that place, before which he has passed a satisfactory examination, and is now prosecuting theological studies with Rev. Mr. Bouton. Mr. Dow will by and bye look back on this farce as a most humiliating spectacle.

As to the Universalist Society in Concord, it rises in the midst of this excitement. It remains firmly devoted to the truth. It is in no more danger of being overthrown than was Christianity, when Judas deserted his Lord, or the cause of the American Revolution, when Benedict Arnold was discovered to be a traitor.

We have no further news in regard to the failure of the Free-Will Baptist Corporation in Lowell. Things remain as bad as ever — the worst fears of the poor widows and orphans, and others who have invested their money, will be realized. But it is said to be, a glorious time for religion in Elder Thurston's church.

Br. Edwin Davis, of Westmoreland, N. H. has lately commenced preaching the Gospel of Salvation. He is a young man of good talents and fair promise.

Affairs at Concord, N. H.

The following articles are from the pen of Br. L. C. Browne, of Nashua, N. H. who has recently visited Concord. Br. Browne looks at Mr. Dow's case somewhat differently from ourselves. We do not, we cannot attribute his somerset to a faithful investigation of the word of God; and we do not therefore speak in the style of extenuation when we approach this subject. We thank Br. B. for the communications he has sent us, and we invoke for them the careful attention of the reader.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—It was my good fortune to visit, for the first time, and spend the Sabbath with the brethren in Concord, on the 4th inst.—They have a beautiful Church, eligibly located, well lighted, with an elegant desk, and containing 58 pews. Br. Witherell is supplying for the present, to good acceptance, and our friends are in good spirits. There prospects are now better than at any previous time. Since Br. Witherell commenced supplying, their congregations have much increased, and the influence of the desk is now unambiguously in favor of Universalism.—The people know what they are hearing and supporting, and are therefore the more ready to listen and contribute. Their audience is about two hundred.

They intend to settle a pastor as soon as they can obtain an efficient man who can give his whole attention to their wants. And if their real strength were known abroad, I apprehend they would find little difficulty in procuring one.—Their prospects are certainly better than those of the Society in Nashua, three years since, and the population of Concord about as large as that of Nashua and less fluctuating. May they soon find a shepherd who shall enter with heart into the work, and be blessed with an abundant growth. On Monday afternoon I had

AN INTERVIEW WITH BR. E. DOW.

My object in calling on this Br. was twofold. First, to get his own account of his own case;—and secondly, to see if he had authorized the first of those statements in the 'Congregational Journal' which you copied in your paper of 17th inst.

Br. Dow states that he has ever been Orthodox in his views, except on the point of punishment. Up to the 4th of October last, he had no doubts, as he supposed, of the final salvation of all men. On that day, (or evening,) he was led to doubt this doctrine from certain reflections which arose in his mind, on reviewing a sermon he had recently delivered on 'Eternal Life.'

He strove to banish these doubts. Supposing they might arise from some neglect of duty, he determined to be more faithful. Feeling baptism (by immersion) to be a duty, he came to Nashua and received that ordinance, on the 14th of Oct. When here, he was in feeble health and low spirits. He attended a Conference Meeting, at my house, in the evening, and took part. Yet he said he did not feel in the spirit. He however said nothing to me concerning his doubts; and, as I understood him, intimated a desire for a future exchange. In this, however, he thinks I misunderstood him.

He says he communicated his doubts to some of our brethren, who advised him to continue preaching, notwithstanding, hoping his mind would eventually become more settled. Among those brethren were Br. S. C. Hewitt and some of the Society at Concord. These facts seem to exonerate Br. Dow from any charge of duplicity in continuing to preach, after he began to doubt; and I am happy therefore to state them.

The report finally became general in Concord that he was going to renounce his faith and join the Orthodox. Our brethren requested him either to contradict these rumors or resign his place. He proposed to continue till the first of January, the close of his engagement; but this did not meet the views of the brethren, and he resigned.

He has now no lingering remains of faith in Universalism, nor sympathy with the order;—is inclined, in his views and sympathies, towards the Congregationalists;—thinks he may unite with them in the course of six months, but does not intend to be in haste. He is also pursuing a course of theological reading, with a view to the ministry, if he should feel inclined and find encouragement.

When he resigned his letter of fellowship, he was yet undecided as to his future course; but is now more clear, and leans strongly to the Congregationalists. He denies being influenced by the efforts of Rev. Mr. Knapp,—deprecates being ranked with our Nashua renouncer, and does not intend to tread in his footsteps, whose character he admits to have been very questionable and his movements very rapid, in his final change of positions. He thinks he experienced religion eleven years ago, has lived in the enjoyment of it ever since, but his enjoyment is now increased.

Such, as nearly as I can recollect, is Br. Dow's view of his own case. And now I wish to give my own impressions, not as infallable, but as arising from a candid view of the circumstances, with my feeble ability for judging. I believe Br. Dow to have been excited, highly excited, by the excitements then raging in Concord, though he is unconscious of the fact. Certain connections which he formed with Orthodox families, together with the many sympathies he has ever had with that order, I think tended to shake what faith he had in our views. I do not doubt his honesty in his movements. But as to the deliberation and calm investigation, which the 'Journal' mentions, no candid man who saw Br. Dow when he was baptized in Nashua, or when I called on him in Concord, would decide that he was in a frame of mind for any such exercises. He appears very nervous and unhappy. And if more happy now than when a Universalist, he must have been a miserable man.

While a believer in the Restitution and under the influence of Universalist associates and Universalist worship, I believe his moral character and deportment were upright. This connection ceased on the second Sunday in December. For his movements since then, whatever they have been or may be, Universalists and Universalism are not responsible. If he has done amiss, I believe it has been from the influence of bad advisers, who were actuated by sectarian motives,—still, I cannot learn that any thing very criminal has been laid to his charge; and I sincerely hope there never may be. His parting letter was kindly; and I hope our papers will refrain from censure, and from reiterating certain gossip in regard to his motives, in which those of our friends in Concord who have the best opportunity for judging, have but little confidence. Go in peace, Br. Dow; and may you soon find enjoyment in some settled faith and be blessed in doing good.

Nashua, Dec. 16, 1842. L. C. B.

The following is another article from the pen of Br. Browne, of Nashua, N. H. in regard to the renunciation of Rev. E. Dow, of Concord:

Br. Dow's Reasons for Renouncing.

The course of reasoning which led Br. Dow to doubt the doctrine of the Restitution, as he stated to me, was this. 'Eternal life,' or the indwelling enjoyments of religion, is the fruit of faith. 'He that believeth on me hath everlasting life,' &c. Faith is the cause, 'eternal life' the effect. Faith ceases at death and is exchanged for knowledge, for sight. But the enjoyment which flowed from faith, or 'eternal life,' continues. The cause ceases, but the effect remains and continues endlessly.

Such was the reasoning of Br. Dow while a Universalist. On the memorable 4th of October, while reviewing a sermon, in which this vein of thought had been put forth, the following train of reasoning occurred, which shook his faith.

Unbelief, the counterpart of faith, produces misery, the counterpart of 'eternal life.' Unbelief ceases at death. But, to reason analogically, the misery, which flowed from unbelief must remain and continue endlessly.

The fallacy in this reasoning, to my mind, lies in the unsoundness of the premises. The cause of eternal life does not cease at death, but is enhanced. What is that cause? Br. D. says, faith or belief. Belief in what? In the gospel, which reveals the love of God. The view of God which the gospel reveals, causes rich enjoyment—'eternal life.' This view is the cause—faith only the medium through which God is thus seen. Does this view cease at death? Do we cease to view God as 'altogether lovely,' in the future world? 'But faith ceases, being lost in knowledge,' says Br. Dow. But is knowledge of God's character less efficacious in producing 'eternal life' than mere faith or belief in that goodness? 'And this is life eternal, that they might KNOW thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.' John xvii. 3. And yet Br. Dow argues that when we cease to believe, and come to KNOW God, the cause of eternal life ceases! The truth is, 'God hath given to us eternal life and this life is in his Son.' (1 John v. 11—13. And the belief of this truth, does not create the truth, but enables us to rejoice in view of it, and thus gives a foretaste of 'eternal life.' But when we come to know, this enjoyment will be infinitely enhanced. The mists that now cloud the vision of our Br. will then be dissipated, as fog before the sunbeams. Belief and unbelief both cease at death, and knowledge ensues. We shall then all know even as we are known, and to know God 'is life eternal.' L. C. B.

It is well known, that the Catholic church is reputed to believe in the doctrine of endless damnation for all heretics—for all who die out of the pale of the church. There have been wanting instances however, of illustrious men, attached to that communion, who have defended the final happiness of all men. The Chevalier Ramsay is a case in point. Who can suppose, that the pious and benevolent Fenelon, encouraged the thought of endless damnation? There have been many excellent men in the Catholic church, to whom the tidings of endless damnation would be exceedingly ungrateful; nay, there are many such now in the world. Our excellent friend and brother, the editor of the 'Star in West,' in Cincinnati, Ohio, gives us the following article touching this subject, in a late number of his journal.

A very intelligent physician of this city, himself a Catholic, informed me a short time since, that all educated men in Germany, belonging to the Catholic church, believe in the final salvation of all mankind. At least all were of that belief in the region of country where he resided; and he supposes that it is the general sentiment of that class of people in Germany. The doctrine of an endless hell they have not the least faith in, although it is one of the principal doctrines of the Romish Church as all well know. Like the old creed of Calvinism with the Presbyterians which is generally understood to be the ground-work of their faith, not one in twenty have any belief in many parts of it—the same appears to be the fact with Catholicism and the intelligent portion of its professors in Germany.

Our informant is a gentleman of the highest respectability—a man proverbially good—and certainly he could have no possible motive to deceive us. Such is our confidence in him for intelligence candor and truth, that we must believe that multitudes, if not all educated men of the Catholic church in Germany, enjoy the faith of Universalism.

This shows the inefficiency of creeds to confine the operations of the mind. Creeds! what are they? They have no more power to arrest thought, than the moon beams have to prevent the current of a river. Man is a thinking being; he will think. There may be, it is true, some unfavorable influence attending creeds; but they cannot bind the mind. Men may not renounce the creed formally and by name, but the current of thought will flow on, and bear away the errors, the refuse of former ages. Universalism will finally triumph over all the earth.

Persecution of Dr. Clowes.

We copy the following from the 'Banner' of last Saturday. We do not recollect to have seen the number of the 'Nazarene,' containing the original publication; if we received it, the article escaped our attention. Dr. Clowes is well known as a profound scholar, and a highly prudent and exemplary man. The hypocrites for once had the honesty to say, they had nothing against him, except that he is a Universalist. We join heartily in the sentiments of the article below:

We learn from the 'Nazarene,' that on the 3d inst. Rev. T. Clowes, D. D. LL. D. was unanimously elected by the Board, Principal Teacher of the S. E. Public School of the city of Philadelphia. He was examined for the situation in company with twenty-eight other candidates, and pronounced superior to them all. Accordingly he was engaged to commence the work of instruction on the 6th inst; but on proceeding to the building, he received a note from the Chairman of the Board virtually revoking the engagement, and the reason finally assigned was that he was a Universalist! Was ever such intolerance known? Has Orthodoxy no regard for its own deliberately assumed obligations? What, pray, are the Philadelphians made of? Are they such bigots as to allow of such intolerance and injustice? We hope to hear of some proceedings in that city on this subject.

The case of Colt once more.

The Orthodox papers, for the want of something better with which to assail Universalism, have made frequent reference to the case of John C. Colt, the murderer of Adams, in the city of New York. If there ever was a case which proved that 'there is a God who judgeth in the earth,' as Universalists believe, this case of Colt's is of that description. Truly, he found that 'the way of the transgressor is hard;' that there 'is no peace to the wicked;' that 'though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished.'—Let these facts, stated in the language of the scriptures, sink deep into the reader's soul. The last article we have seen in regard to Colt is the following. It has had a general run in the partialist papers.

COLT'S RELIGIOUS OPINIONS. The manner of life and of the death of this individual, illustrate the influence of that doctrine which denies the future eternal punishment of the wicked.—One account of an interview with him on the last day of his life, thus represents his religious views: He continued to speak of the cheering hopes he entertained of a happy hereafter—of his trust in the efficacy of the divine atonement—and his disbelief in endless punishment. He could not so understand the Scriptures. His religious opinions were fixed. In one of his letters he says, 'Agreeably to my views, it is as absurd to suppose that the Creator would inflict an infinite punishment upon one of his creatures for a finite action, as it is to suppose in the first place, that he created man as sin. Man is doubtless punished according to the deeds done in the body.'

Like many other bold blasphemers, he regarded the doctrine of future endless misery absurd! He did not believe that man could earn everlasting damnation in this life! In this belief he no doubt committed the murder. And, strengthened by this belief, which he also expressed to Dr. Anthon, on the very day appointed for his execution, he was even then secretly planning self-murder! Encouraged, or rather brutalized, and demonized, by this belief, he grasped the bloody knife, and rushed unbidden into the presence of his Maker, as if impatient to defy his power, or challenge his right to punish him forever! Fit doctrine for the man—fit man and doctrine for the occasion!

This is exactly the kind of dainties on which those love to feed, who are always on the watch to find a little bit of scandal against Universalism.

Colt a Universalist! We put his whole life forward as contradiction. Was he ever known as a Universalist? Did he ever attend a Universalist church? Was he ever connected with Universalism in any way? Did he know any Universalists in the city of New York? Did he call a Universalist clergyman to visit him during his confinement? All these questions must be answered in the negative. What proof is there then that he was a Universalist?

Whether he was the author of the language attributed to him, we know not. The most of it is furnished by anonymous writers. Even if he uttered the language, it only proves him to have had doubts in regard to the strict eternity of punishment; but that he had any sense of the gospel system of salvation as held by Universalists, we have not the slightest belief. There can be no doubt that Colt held to the Calvinistic doctrine of atonement even to the last hour of his life. Suppose we should exclaim, in the language of the above extract, 'Fit doctrine for the man—fit man and doctrine for the occasion.'

But suppose we surmount all the difficulties we have stated, and allow that Colt was a Universalist, what then? Why then we prove, to be sure, that Universalism leads to murder and suicide. But if this be good reasoning, then we will look at the fact, that probably nineteen-twentieths of those who have died on the gallows have believed unhesitatingly in the doctrine of endless misery. What will this fact prove? It will prove with a force equal to 19 to 1, that the doctrine of endless misery leads to murder and other capital offences.

In the estimation of our opponents, every bad man is a Universalist. We protest against such an assumption. We are willing to allow all those to be Universalists who believe and truly realize the great truth, that 'God is Love;' that it is our duty to love and serve him; and that all, in the fulness of time, shall partake of his salvation.

Another Explosion in Lowell.

While the story of Elder Thurston's operations and the failure of the Free-Will Baptist Corporation is yet ringing in our ears, we are astounded with another explosion of a similar character.—The editors of the 'Vox Populi' say,

It does seem as though the High Priest of Iniquity was in our very midst. Our community had not half recovered from the shock produced by the explosion of Elder Thurston's shaving mill, when crash, crash comes another of a similar character, though it is hoped not quite so disastrous.

The Second Baptist Church of this city has been doing business in much the same way as the Free-Will concern. Their Treasurer was made a sort of banker, and received deposits from all those factory girls and others who could be induced by the influence of clanish feelings to lend.

Well, things were managed easily till recently. When Elder Thurston burst his boiler the depositors in this Church Bank began to feel a little alarmed—not knowing but their funds might be in the same jeopardy. They began to call for their money and soon found that the Treasurer could not pay. The alarm was given; a meeting called to examine. The Treasurer attended, but when he learned the object of the meeting he made an excuse to absent himself.

There are certain startling reports in connexion with this matter, which we forbear, for the present to publish. It is hinted, that the church, learning there was a deficiency, took measures to secure themselves, and throw the loss wholly upon the world's people. We have seen cases in the course of life, which have led us to think, that people who make ardent professions of piety, sometimes seem to care but little what are the means by which they obtain property, if so be they can get it; and they appear to relish the more, if they can grasp it from the hands of those whom they regard as heretics. We shall refer to this subject again, when facts are more fully developed.

The Love of God.

A boundless theme! Who that has studied the sacred writers, can have failed to see, that they employ every means in their power, to strike the mind of man with the fact, that the love of God is past all comprehension. It has no limits—neither beginning, nor end, nor change. It is higher than the highest heaven, deeper than the lowest abyss. Length and breadth are lost in the contemplation. 'Neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God.' So says an inspired writer.

'God is love.' God always was love, always will be love. Every thing that proceeds from God, proceeds from pure, ardent, and unadulterated love. Man was created in love, he is sustained in love. What led God to send a Saviour into the world? Love. 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son.' God loves men while they are dead in sins, if we can believe his word. He most solemnly assures us, that 'for the great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, he quickened us together with Christ.' This love of God is the cause of man's love to him. 'We love him,' says John, 'because he first loved us.'

How ungrateful are those who accuse God of hating his intellectual creation. This is a sin of the deepest dye—the most criminal of all ingratitude. How injudicious are those, who refuse to preach the love of God to sinful men, because they are fearful it will increase men's sins. Are such wiser than God? Has he not told them, that men are induced to love him by a knowledge of the love he hath to them? Do let us apply ourselves closely to God's word, to learn what he has said on this highly interesting subject.

Peruse the following, reader,—it is worthy of your attention:

In a late number of the 'New York Evangelist,' the editor of that organ of popular Orthodoxy holds the following language, with respect to the views advanced by Stuart and Bush: 'The tendency of these views is to destroy the Scripture evidence of the doctrine of any real end of the world, any day of final general judgment, or general resurrection of the body. The style of interpretation, we assert, TENDS FEARFULLY TO UNIVERSALISM. THIS TENDENCY WE ARE PREPARED TO PROVE.'

The 'New York Evangelist' is the leading Orthodox journal in the United States. That paper denounces the expositions of Stuart and Bush as 'tending fearfully to Universalism.' The truth is, Professors Stuart and Bush cannot explain the Scriptures, so as to take them out of the hands of the Millerites, without adopting the Universalist interpretations. Universalists have studied the Scriptures with great attention; and they are persuaded, beyond doubt, that their expositions are true. Let this matter go on. Things will come out right. The world will come to a knowledge of the truth.

We published a few weeks since, an account, from the 'Christian Register,' of the treatment experienced by the Unitarians in the western section of New York, at the hands of the self-styled Orthodox. We expressed our decided condemnation of such conduct. But Br. Grosh, of the 'Magazine and Advocate,' has been led by our article to express his opinion upon the same subject. While he condemns the conduct of those who persecute Unitarians, he thinks the Unitarians themselves guilty of a similar course towards Universalists. We think as he does. The treatment we receive from them, is altogether unjustifiable. Br. G. speaks as follows:

No doubt, all this is mean, ungenerous, and unchristian conduct. We would not palliate it, if we could; and no one can justify it with any degree of plausibility. But, it cannot be denied, that such conduct would be still worse, its bigotry more dark, its malice more cruel, and its intolerance more damning, if it were performed by a clergyman who professed to be liberal, and who condemned such conduct in the Orthodox.—Now, let us ask, how have some Unitarian clergymen treated Universalists and their clergymen? One has opposed the Trustees when they would have opened a Unitarian church for an amiable and estimable Universalist clergyman to preach a lecture, at a time when the Unitarians did not want to use it! And afterwards, this same man used his influence, and boasted that he succeeded, in getting Trustees elected who would not grant the house for a Universalist to preach in! I have heard of a case which occurred not long since in this very city, in which a Unitarian clergyman manifested some feeling, on being told that the greater part of his 'very respectable and intelligent looking congregation,' (as he termed them,) were Universalists; and said with some warmth, 'we don't want any thing to do with that class of people! I have no fellowship with Universalists, and none for them!' A few other instances of similar liberal specimens of liberal Christianity might be added; but these will suffice. No doubt these gentlemen are treated with great bigotry and unchristian rudeness by the 'Orthodox'—but is there no bigotry, no unchristian intolerance in thus treating Universalists?—Thank God all Unitarian clergymen are not such men as above noticed.

Phrenology---Universalism.

The Phrenologists have almost invariably declared, that they find a very large developement of benevolence in Universalists. A Western paper, 'The Genius of Truth,' contains the following important statement:

Rev. J. P. Stuart, a gentleman of high intellectual attainments, and who has had extensive experience in the science of Phrenology, having lectured and traveled through the country for the last three or four years, stated to his class here in this place that he had observed that all good, sentimental, and pious Universalists, so far as he had the opportunity of knowing, were possessed of a large organ of benevolence, and the region of destructiveness and of the animal propensities of medium size, or small; while on the other hand their most bitter opposers were deficient in the benevolent and friendly sentiments or organs, and large in the animal, and those organs that were less valuable in the social relations of life. This is the substance of the statement, but perhaps not word for word.

We apprehend it will be found correct as a general rule, that in Universalists benevolence is largely developed. The doctrine of Universalism is very attractive to the benevolent heart; and it is the benevolent heart which is won by the kind nature of Universalism, by the reasons by which that doctrine is sustained. Men of strong reasoning power generally incline to this doctrine; and we almost always find that it effects a very favorable change in their hearts. It softens them; it leads them to purposes and deeds of kindness; while, on the other hand, the doctrine of endless misery has an awful tendency to harden the heart. Continually contemplating such a scene as the orthodox hell presents, and striving to become reconciled to it, will harden any man's heart.

The editor of the 'Magazine and Advocate,' at Utica, N. Y. speaking of the late settlement of the slander case, against Elder Knapp, at Providence, R. I. gives the following:

If the Elder paid $200 for every Knappism he utters, one week would eat up his house and land, horses, bonds, mortgages, presents and cash. The fellow should have been made to sweat a little more, to make his lesson more impressive to him. However, if he does not exhibit fruits meet for his professed repentance, he can easily be caught Knapping again, and a heavier Knapp be carried off of him the next time. He is now in Salem, Mass., where the brethren and sisters will probably make up his costs to him, out of sympathy with him in his persecutions! We will give his 'libel' soon.

This reference to house, lands, bonds, mortgagees, &c. &c. seems to hint quite directly, that the Elder knows how to feather his nest. He don't get up revivals without pay, and large pay too.

A Beautiful Hymn Book.

Our neighbor, Mr. B. B. Mussey, 29 Cornhill, has sent us (for a New Year's present, we suppose,) the most beautifully bound copy of the Universalist Collection of Hymns, that we have ever seen. The truth is, he has a kind of pride about that book, and he is determined that nothing of the kind shall exceed it in beauty. This work is now generally used throughout New England in the Universalist Societies, and we suppose not far from 20,000 copies have been sold. Indeed, we know not but twice that number have been disposed of. Mr. Mussey is a true hearted Universalist; and we hope the Lord will bless his efforts for the recovery of the Bulfinch Street Meeting-House to the purposes to which it was dedicated.

Mr. M. keeps not only the Universalist Collection for sale, but the largest assortment of books, on all subjects, that are to be found in this city.

The nature of Pharisaical Opposition.

There have been Pharisees in all ages of the world. The spirit of a Pharisee may be known in a moment. It is the spirit of pride and self-righteousness, mingled with sectarian bitterness. Our blessed Lord had much of this to contend with. His enemies, the Pharisees, declared that he HAD A DEVIL. Is not this in effect the same charge which is now brought against Universalists? Jesus was accused of being 'the friend of publicans and sinners;' he ate and drank with them, and they loved to hear him preach. For this the Pharisees reproached him, and for this our enemies reproach us. The truth is, Partialism is the aristocracy of religion—there is no democracy in it. It is partial in its very nature, as well as vindictive. It does not go for the good of the whole, but a part. Like the aristocracy of state, this aristocracy of the Church has its favorites; on them it confers all its favors, and curses every body else. Such is the nature of Pharisaical opposition.

Normal School.

The next Term of the Normal School at Lexington, for the preparation of Female Teachers, will commence on Wednesday next, Jan. 4th; and it is important that all who intend to join the School next Term, should do so on that day, or, at furthest, before the close of the week.

Elder Knapp's famous sermon at Salem, which he declared would 'break the back bone of Universalism,' has been published verbatim and literatim, by a Universalist of that city, with copious notes by a competent gentleman.

'Barnes' of the 'Banner.'

Br. DREW,—I wish you would have the kindness to republish in your 'Banner' father Streeter's occasional sermon preached before the Rockingham Association, at Nottingham, N. H. in 1833. I think it would be well for your respected correspondent 'Barnes' to read it, and especially as he uses father Streeter's name in his communication in the 'Banner' of Dec. 17. I wish all our papers would republish that sermon. There are many good old things which we forget, in our eagerness for something new and strange. It will be a long day before we shall have a discourse preached better adapted to these times than the one here alluded to. Pardon my interference. Yours truly, J. G. A.

General Intelligence.

The Happy little Black Boy.

The following interesting paragraph is taken from a paper published in New York by Mrs. Child. The young hero of the account, had a very cheerful and confiding disposition, and of course he was very happy. Every body was good to him, and he liked every body.

Doctor H—— of Boston, coming home to dine one day, found a very bright looking handsome mullatto on the steps, apparently about seven or eight years old. As he opened the door, the boy glided in, as if it were his home. 'What do you want?' said the doctor. The child looked up with a smiling confidence, and answered, 'I am a little boy that ran away from Providence; and I want some dinner; and I thought may be you would give me some.' His radiant face and child-like freedom operated like a charm. He had a good dinner and remained several days; becoming more and more the pet of the whole household. He said he had been cruelly treated by somebody in Providence, and had run away; but the people he described could not be found. The doctor thought it would not do to have him growing up in idleness, and he tried to find him a place where he could run of errands, clean knives, &c. for his living. An hour after this was mentioned, the boy was missing. In a few weeks they heard of him in the opposite part of the city, sitting on a doorstep, at dinner time. When the door opened, he walked in, smiling, and said, 'I am a little boy that ran away from Providence; and I want some dinner; and I thought maybe you would give me some.' He was not mistaken this time either. The heart that trusted so completely received a cordial welcome. After a time it was again proposed to find some place of service; and straight way this human butterfly was off, no one knew whither.

For several months no more was heard of him; but one bright winter day, his first benefactor found him seated on the steps of a house in Beacon street. 'Why, Tom, where did you come from?' said he. 'I came from Philadelphia.'—'How upon earth did you get there?' 'I heard folks talk about New York, and I thought I should like to see it. So I went on board a steamboat; and when it put off the captain asked me who I was, and I told him I was a little boy that ran away from Providence, and I wanted to go to New York; but I ha'nt any money. 'You little black rascal,' says he, 'I'll throw you overboard.' I do'nt believe you will, said I; and he di'dnt. I told him I was hungry; and he gave me something to eat, and made up a nice little bed for me. When I got to New York, I went and sat down on a door step; and when the gentleman came home to dinner, I went in and told him that I was a little boy that ran away from Providence, and I was hungry. So they gave me something to eat, and made up a nice little bed for me, and let me stay there. But I wanted to see Philadelphia; so I went into a steamboat; and when they asked who I was, I told them that I was a little boy that ran away from Providence, and I thought perhaps they would give me something to eat. So they gave me a good dinner, and made me up a nice little bed. Then I wanted to come back to Boston; and every body gave me something to eat, and made me a nice little bed. And I sat down on this door step, and when the lady asked me what I wanted, I told her I was a little boy that ran away from Providence, and I was hungry. So she gave me something to eat, and made me up a nice little bed; and I stay here, and do her errands, sometimes. Everybody is good to me and I like everybody.'

He looked up with the most sunny gaiety, and striking his hoop as he spoke, went down the st. like an arrow. He disappeared soon after, probably in quest of new adventures.

Arrival of the Britannia. The steamer Britannia arrived at this port, last week, after a boisterous passage of 17 days.

She brings important intelligence from China and Central Asia. A Treaty of submission, peace and commerce had been assented to by the Chineso Emperor. Cabul had been retaken by the English, and many of the British prisoners released from captivity. The London journals express themselves highly gratified at the terms of the terms of the Treaty and consider the indemnity of twenty-one millions of dollars as ample; and their commerce much benefitted by the opening of the ports stipulated in the Treaty. In a military and naval point of view it affords Great Britain vast facilities for strengthening her power in that quarter.

Shocking Casuality. The Hartford Courier says that the house of Deacon Holmes at West Cornwall, was consumed by fire on the night of the 15th inst., and his wife and three daughters of the ages of nine, six and three respectively, were consumed in the flames.

Fire in Canton. We learn from Col. Hatch, that a fire broke out at 12 o'clock last night, in the large manufactory and machine shop of E. Kingsley Esq., which was entirely consumed.—Loss from 4000 to $5000, partially insured at Dedham. It was first discovered by the watchmen of the Revere Copper Company, and supposed to have originated in the stack on the roof.—The two engines of the Revere Company and the town engine were promptly on hand, and confined the fire to the factory, and this prevented an extensive conflagration. Some 40 or 50 hands have been thrown out of work at this inclement season, by this calamity.—Transcript.

Providential Escape of Capt. Hewitt. We learn that on the late passage of the Britannia, from Liverpool to this port, as Capt Hewitt was standing near the wheel, the steamer was struck by a tremendous sea which stove in her wheelhouse and bulwarks. Capt Hewitt, in endeavoring to grasp the mizzen rigging, missed his hold and was carried by the force of the sea over the stern of the ship; most providentially he seized hold of the iron railing at the stern of the boat, which saved his being washed overboard and almost miraculously saved his life, but not without some severe bruises.

Fire. Last evening, about half past 8 o'clock a fire broke out in Mr. E. F. Whittredge's tailoring establishment, on the second story of the building corner of Wilson's Lane and Washington street. It had burnt through the third floor, into the job printing office of James E. Farwell, before the engines began to play, but the windows remaining entire, it did not spread rapidly, and was quickly extinguished.

Lost in the Woods. A young woman, named Elizabeth Thomas, left Halifax on the 16th ult. to visit at Sambro, 20 miles distant. On her journey, she strayed into the woods, where she sustained life for seven days, by sucking ice. She was at last discoved by two boys, to whom she made known her sufferings; but, boy-like, they paid no attention to her. They informed their parents of the affair at bed time. Next morning, Mr. Brunt, father of the boys, went in search of her, when she was discovered in the large crevice of a rock, scarcely alive. She was shortly after removed to Mr. Brunt's, while he went to obtain his horse, to convey her to the house of her parents. During the time of Mr. Brunt's absence, obtaining a horse, the father of the unfortunate girl arrived in search of her. She was taken home from Mr. Brunt's, where she remains under the doctor's hands. Amputation of one foot, will be necessary, as it is so severely frost bitten.—She is 17 years of age.

Lucky Vessel. The brig Cordelia, Capt Clapp, cleared today for Trinidad de Cuba, for her 72d voyage, and her 32d in the last six years. The 62 passages out and home, for the last six years average nineteen days and a half. She has never lost a top-mast, nor sustained any damage sufficient for claim on the underwriters. For the last 8 years she has lost but one man by sickness, and none by accident, and has never had a man sick at Trinidad. Of the last 37 voyages, she has had but one passage from Trinidad to Boston over 24 days.

Singular Occurrence—A Horse starved to death in Woburn Woods. The Bunker Hill Aurora says:—A very remarkable and distressing case happened this week, of which we gather the following particulars: A single horse and sleigh, hired of Mr. Seward in School street, was driven out in company with other sleighs, on Monday evening. On returning from Horn Pond, Messrs. L. and C. being ahead in the single sleigh, turned a wrong corner in West Cambridge, when their friends called to them to take a different road.—Mr. L. suddenly checked his horse, and giving him a turn to the left, the sleigh slewed round, and both gentlemen were thrown out. Unfortunately, they lost their hold of the reins, and the horse ran with the sleigh in the direction from whence they came. Search was immediately made for the horse and sleigh, which continued in all directions, between West Cambridge and Lowell, on Tuesday and Wednesday; and on Thursday afternoon the poor animal was discovered in the woods, in Woburn, with the sleigh still attached to him. He was chilled and starved, having been there three days and nights, exposed to the storm and cold—and he expired in about ten minutes after he was found. He had pawed up the earth for a considerable distance around him and must have suffered the acutest agonies of a horrible death.

He was one of Mr. Seward's most valuable horses, well known by the name of 'Rob Roy,' and was highly prized by him and his customers. —Mail.

Brilliant Meteor. A meteor of uncommon splendor, says the New Haven Palladium of Tuesday', was seen here on Sunday evening last, the 18th of December, about 16 minutes before 8 o'clock. The moon was then shining with great brilliancy, and the reflection of her light from the snow which covered the earth, contributed to render the general illumination powerful. In these circumstances the attention of the observer was arrested by a ray of light before him, and on looking up he saw a meteoric fire ball, equal in splendor to planet Venus, sailing towards the Northwestern horizon.

We learn from the Barnstable Patriot, that George B. Nickerson of Chatham, was killed on Tuesday last, by the accidental discharge of his gun, while out shooting ducks. Mr. N. was 35 years old and left a wife and three children.

A Man. The Cincinnati Republican says:—'One of the principal householders in our city, instead of oppressing the poor amongst his tenants for rents which they cannot pay, is, from his abundance, distributing amongst them, at this inclement season, such necessaries of life as are needful to keep them from freezing and starving.'

Narrow Escape. Seldon C. Warner, mate of the ship Montreal, of the London line of packets, laying at the foot of Wall street, and John Ashall cabin boy, were found in their births early yesterday morning nearly suffocated and entirely insensible, caused by inhaling the fumes of charcoal which had been placed on board to destroy rats. By prompt and efficient treatment, Dr. Caldwell succeeded in restoring them both in a few hours, He is of opinion that they could not have survived many minutes longer, as they were nearly exhausted and pulseless. A cat was also found in the same room entirely dead and still.—N. Y. Express.

Strange Mortality. The National Intelligencer says, it is a remarkable circumstance that of a committee of the House of Representatives, (to revise the rules of the House,) consisting of nine members appointed at the last session of the present Congress, five already sleep in the tomb, viz. Lewis Williams, Lynn Banks, Joseph Lawrence, James W. Habersham. Such a fatality is of rare occurrence.

Copper and Iron Mines of New Hampshire.—A friend writes to us, says the Post, from Concord, N. H., that Dr. Jackson's geological survey of that State has resulted in the discovery of various mines of copper and iron. 'One of the copper mines in Coos county,' the correspondent says, 'is destined soon to be a great source of wealth to the enterprising people of that section of the State. The mine is inexhaustible, yielding 33 per cent pure copper of a superior quality, which, with the expense of one cent the pound for transportation, can be brought to Boston in any quantity.

Belfast (Me.) Academy burnt. On Saturday night, the 17th inst., the well finished and finely located building the Belfast Academy, was entirely consumed by fire. It seems that ashes had been taken up and deposited in the second story, and hence the cause of the fire. The loss to the beauty of the village is considerable, as it was an attractive feature and delightfully located. The Signal says that with good fire apparatus it might have been saved. It is quite certain that suitable caution in disposing of the ashes would have prevented this sad disaster.

Robbery of the Mail—Arrest. We learn from the Winchester Virginian, that a great excitement was created in that place on Tuesday in consequence of the arrest of a young gentleman, (whose name is not given, but who has heretofore been employed as a clerk in the Winchester post office,) upon the warrant of some of the officers of the banks, charged with committing several mail robberies, said to have been traced to the Winchester post office. These robberies were perpetrated at different intervals during the year, and they amount to several thousand dollars.—The money lost has chiefly been remittances from the east, and agents from the banks and commercial houses concerned have been engaged for months in ferreting out the villains.

Accident. On Saturday afternoon, as a chaise with a lady and gentleman in it, was passing down Tremont street, it came in contact, at the corner of Winter street, with a large wagon drawn by three horses. Both shafts of the chaise were broken short off near the cross bars; the body immediately dropped down, and as the boot was buckled up, the lady and gentleman found it impossible to escape. The horse started to run, but fortunately was stopped at once by some persons passing. No serious injury was done to either person in the chaise, though they were both much frightened, as they had just cause to be.—Whether the teamster or the gentleman in the chaise was to blame, we know not—but there must have been some careless driving with one of the parties, or the accident would not have happened.

Moral Means. At a recent Temperance meeting held at Plymouth, it was resolved, 'that none but moral means should be employed in the removal of the evils of intemperance—and that these are found in the laws of our social existence in the laws of our Commonwealth, and the laws of God.' This resolution was unanimously adopted.

A Man frozen to death on a Prairie. A most affecting account appears in the Cincinnati Gazette, of the death of a man named William Wells who perished in a snow storm while returning home from a mill, across the Grand Prairie, Illinois. It appears that he was overtaken by a blinding storm of snow and lost his way, and having unharnessed his horses from the wagon, he attempted to reach some settlement on horseback, but he got off, or perhaps was thrown off, after getting nearly helpless with cold. When found he was lying upon his face, as though he had pitched forward while walking, he had wandered many miles from his route, and at what time he perished is uncertain. He was a sober man, in the prime of life.

On Friday night last, some villain, or villains, broke into the store of Stephen Sibley, No. 29 Washington street, Joy's buildings, affecting their entrance, by breaking a pane of glass in the window opening from a small room in the rear of the store, into the lower entry of the interior of the arcade. They wrenched off several bolts and bars, broke and slipped one or two locks, and when they left, only carried off some small change in the drawer, leaving the goods untouched.—There were traces of blood near the window, showing that they must have received some pretty severe cuts. They got small booty for so much trouble.

An important surgical operation was performed by Dr. W. Van Deursen, one day last week, on a child of Mr Smith Dunn, of this city. It had swallowed a grain of corn two days previous, which but for its extraction would soon have proved its death. This was done by opening the windpipe, and so successful was the operation that the child is in a fair way of recovery.—New Brunswick Times.

Making Preparation. Some wag in Bangor, Me. advertises, at great length, that he is preparing an immense balloon to carry the people of that city out of harm's way when Miller's conflagration happens in April. He says he has sent to Europe for an immense amount of silk, and the car is to be 450 feet long and 90 wide. Seats in the balloon $200 each. The books are to be opened on the first of April, and a great body of constables are to be on hand to prevent a rush.

Sheep. Quite a large number of sheep have been slaughtered for their pelts and tallow.—Some 1200 have been slaughtered by one firm a few miles from the city. The process we learn is this. The sheep after being stripped of their skins are hung up before large fires in rows of 20 or 25, and roasted untill the tallow begins to run freely. They then put them into large presses, where all the tallow is expelled. The pelts fetch 38 cents on an average, and the tallow sells at 5 cents per pound. The remains of the sheep are fed to swine.—Rochester Democrat.

The Head of a Family. The New York Sun says- 'In this city there is a physician who had four wives. The first bore him 12 children at 5 births—the second 15 at 5 births—the third 11 at 4 births—the fourth a mere girl, to whom he has been married but three years, has already had 5 and from present appearances will increase the number, making in all 38 children at 17 births.—But 12 of them, however, are alive.'

The wife of Mr. Sylvester Lyon, of Hanover Neck, Morris county, N. J., aged 44 years, on the 27th ult., expired, a week after giving birth to a pair of twins, which were a great natural curiosity. They are daughters, each one entirely perfect in its form, except that both are connected together. From the centre of the breast to the bottom of the abdomen, they are united together into one, the whole breadth of the body; the two faces lying side by side together in close contact; and the arm of each, crossing the other on either side, as if in very affectionate embrace. They survived their birth but a short time.—N. Y. Sun.

Light House at St. Jago de Cuba. The following official description of a Light House, erected at the entrance of the harbor of St. Jago de Cuba, has been published by order of the Secretary of State:

It is a cast iron tower, of the octagon form, 17 feet in height, and may be seen in a clear night at the distance of twenty-one miles, performing its revolutions, and will be one minute visible, and the other invisible.

The light is two hundred and forty-four feet above the level of the sea, and standing nealy six hundre Spanish varas to the eastward of the centre of the channel, which forms the entrance of the harbor.

Diabolical. The St Louis Era states that on the night of the 1st inst. a fire arm of some kind, loaded with fifteen to twenty bullets, was discharged into a sleeping chamber, no doubt with the intention of killing John M. Elger, Esq., Circuit Attorney, who was engaged in trying the murderers of Major Floyd. The perpetrators of this act mistook the position of Mr. E.'s chamber, and thus his life was saved.

Middlesex Quarterly Conference.

This Conference will meet in Malden, on the second Wednesday of January, 11th day.

G. G. STRICKLAND, Stand. Clerk.

An Important Meeting at Exeter, N. H.

Each auxiliary society which I have recently formed on my visits in the county of Rockingham, in New-Hampshire, and our friends in every town, who have not as yet been visited, but are desirous of coming into the arrangement, and learning more respecting our method of proceedure, are urgently requested to send one or more delegates to Exeter, on Monday, Jan. 2, 1843, with full instructions how they wish their funds expended; and prepared to attend to such other business as may come before them. At which time and place, the Directors are also expected to meet, that more systematic arrangements may be made for future operations.

☞This meeting is absolutely necessary, for the good of our 'Missionary Enterprise,' and therefore, each brother who reads this notice, will proceed at once to confer with his brethren upon the subject. Let there be no delay, and no negligence. Stormy or not, the meeting must be held.

☞The brethren will meet at the Universalist meeting-house, at 10 o'clock, A. M,

Of consumption, at her father's residence in Newton, Dec. 20th, Mrs. MARTHA ANN, wife of Rev. John Nichols, of Claremont, N. H. aged 27. This amiable lady has for several years past, been the subject of that wasting disease which destroys so many of the beloved of earth. Last May, she was induced to leave her family and friends in Claremont, with the pleasing hope that in a few weeks she might be able to return again to her home, to scenes of domestic enjoyment, where her virtues have ever been exhibited in a quiet, peaceable and unostentatious manner. She came to her father's house, (Mr. S. Adams') where beneath the ever-watchful care of kind and provident parents, every means were used for her recovery, but in vain; death has at last done his work; at a moment too, when anxious friends began to take courage—the destroyer came and closed the scene. When it was told her that there was no hope of her recovery, she expressed but one wish—that she might live to see her husband once more; and if she were not permitted, she requested the writer of this to tell him from her, to preach the doctrine which he advocated with more zeal and faithfulness than ever—because that alone could sustain the mind in the hour of dissolving nature. She was made acquainted with her situation on Wednesday; she continued until the following Tuesday, when without a struggle or a groan she fell sweetly asleep in Jesus. To recount all that transpired from the time she gave up all hope of recovery, until the closing scene, would occupy too large a space. After the arrival of her husband, on Saturday night, she expressed great joy that her prayer was answered. She besought him to be resigned—to preach the everlasting gospel with more earnestness than ever—and to train up his children under its influence. On the Sunday following, after suffering great bodily distress, she called her husband to her bed-side, and disposed of her wearing apparel, in a calm manner—then gave parting counsel to all her relatives present. On Monday, when it was thought the lamp of life had become almost extinguished, she was heard to say something which led her attendants to suppose had reference to an Accordion; it was shown her by her father, when she expressed a wish that some one should play it understandingly.—Her sister commenced playing the tune of Hamburg, when, to the utter astonishment of all present, she commenced singing with a clear and strong voice, the following words: 'Come all you weary fainting souls.'—After this she continued to sing a number of the Conference Hymns—'The morning light is breaking'—'The Happy Convert'—and closing with 'Heavenly Canaan.' Her strength continued to fail until Tuesday morning at 4 o'clock, when her sight failed. Her husband and father standing by her, she exclaimed,

'Love is the strongest tie,
That can our souls unite.'

Immediately her husband commenced singing, in a low tone, the 'Happy Convert.' While singing the first verse, she seemed to brighten, and with a sweet voice united and sung with her husband the second verse:

'That sweet comfort was mine,
When the favor divine,

This was the last which was heard from that sweet voice, which is now silent in death. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the spirit took its flight from its earthly tabernacle, to that house not made with hands, eternal and in the heavens. Thus has passed away from earth the sympathizing wife, the dutiful daughter, the kind sister, and the firm and steadfast friend. And thus have we witnessed another exhibition of the most triumphant power of the faith in a world's salvation to sustain the mind in the hour of dissolving nature.

Fanned by some angel's purple wing,
O grave, where is thy victory now;
O death! where is thy sting.'

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY. THIRD EDITION. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by THOMAS WHITTEMORE, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of SHORT ANTHEMS, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Lang, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the LESSONS or RUDIMENTS, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

DEAR SIR,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

JOTHAM S. FRENCH.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

''GOSPEL HARMONIST.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

JOHN SIMMONS & SON would inform their friends and the public, that they are now opening, and have on hand, one of the most extensive assortments of Cloths, Cassimeres, Vestings, and Ready Made Clothing, that can be found in any Establishment in the city. Garments made to order in the best manner and at the shortest notice; and they trust their facilities for doing business will enable them to offer their Goods at prices that will please their customers. ☞Call and examine before making your selections.—Terms CASH, and no deduction from prices.

Poetry.

The following is from the pen of the Editor of the 'Saco Democrat,' Mr. M. W. Beck. It was written after a very severe attack of pulmonary disease—when death seemed evidently near. It breathes a pure spirit. The last four lines are beautiful. J. G. A.

The Soul.

Whence came the intellectual ray,
That lights the eye with fire?
That earthward will not bide its stay,
But heavenward, bids aspire?
Is it a spark from God's high throne,
Given with our earliest breath!
And will he claim it as his own,
When we are chilled in death?

Oh, precious faith! cling to my breast,
Be hallowed, pilgrim, there
When to my bosom thou art prest,
How free am I from care.
Let sickness rage—let pain invade
My vitals for its food,
No doubt my faith shall make afraid,
Nor aught be mine but good.

Through death's dark valley I must tread,
E're youth's fair sun is set,
Calmly, resigned, I bow my head,
And earth's vain joys forget.
The spark that gleams—the jewelled soul,
The casket thrown away,
Shall mingle with that perfect whole
That forms God's brightest day!

Miscellany.

A Sermon for Saturday Evening.

The whole book of Ecclesiastes is a sermon on the vanity of all things human. The Preacher is eloquent in discoursing on the vanity of human life, with its pleasures, riches, honors, labors and emoluments. He refers to many other topics, ever and anon, exclaiming, 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.'

By a review of the past week, whether we have been basking in the sunshine of prosperity, or shivering beneath the cold frosts of adversity, we shall find that our own experience will accord with that of the wise man in his meditations. The evening twilight invites us to retire from the cares of a busy world, and haste to our quiet homes. O, these quiet homes! 'There's no place like home.' Here we are to enjoy the stillness of another Saturday evening, preparatory to the rest of another sweet Sabbath. 'All is here—husband, wife and the little ones'—not one is missing. The quiet cheerfulness of every heart is beaming on each one's countenance. How changed would be these scenes without the benign influences, directly or indirectly, that our quiet homes are so blest with contentment and cheerfulness, and all the other sweets of social life. It is on this account that our experience accords with the text, which tells us that the conclusion of the whole matter is to fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man.

We are so to love the God to whom we are indebted for the sweet enjoyments of the social circle this evening, that we shall fear to wrong him or ourselves by ingratitude, or in any other way. The little birds raise their sweet voices in notes of praise; then should we be wanting in expressions of gratitude?

We are to understand and keep the commandments, because they are just and good, and "in keeping them there is great reward;" because they commend themselves to reason and conscience, and are suited to increase and perpetuate the rich enjoyments with which our social and spiritual natures are blest in the scenes of this evening.

That we may hear more about the whole duty of man, let us on the morrow repair to our respective places of worship,—there to be instructed by our spiritual guides, who are always the most eloquent when we are the most attentive to the words of wisdom which drop from their lips.—Evening Bulletin.

Conversation.

The celebrated Franklin laid down a rule for his own guidance on this subject, which might generally be observed by every one with great benefit. It was never to speak unless upon some matter either instructive or entertaining. But the generality of mankind seem to think that, in the first place, whenever they meet their friends or acquaintances, it is absolutely necessary for them to talk, and that, so long as words flow easy on either side, there is no occasion to be particular about the ideas. Thus it is that we can never enter into a coffee-house or other place of public resort, but we hear people wasting their breath upon idle remarks on the weather, accidents and offences, long stories about matters that possess no sort of interest, and which generally amount to mere twattle. This very common absurdity really takes its origin in a positive want of mind, although the parties themselves are guilty of the weakness, because they think it would appear foolish to sit still and say nothing. Even the members of a family cannot meet together at meals without talking, though they really have nothing to say that can either amuse or instruct; but surely it would be much more rational, and a great deal less irksome, to amuse themselves with their own thoughts. Are they so empty headed, and so utterly destitute of mental resources that this is impossible? If not, we beg leave to suggest that they are inflicting a great injury upon themselves, by such a foolish habit of chattering. Their mental powers become weakened, their attention is always occupied by subjects of the most frivulous nature, and, when circumstances require them to think upon any intricate point of interest to their own immediate welfare, they are utterly incompetent to form a correct judgement. Thus it is that so many ideas and opinions pass current for a time as undeniable and orthodox truths, which afterward turn out to be the most egregious fallacies.—Thus some people are always unfortunate in every thing they undertake, and thus arises a very considerable portion of that misery which ought not to exist in civilized society.

It has been said that 'conduct is fate,' and if, as we believe, the assertion be a correct one, it requires no superhuman aid to foretell the probable fate of those who either act without thought or are incapable of thinking deeply. There is too much idle talk—falsely called conversation—about every thing.—What instruction or amusement can people find in the mere statement of the fact that it is a fine or wet day? and yet this is almost the first thing they feel bound to tell one another. Surely it would be just as reasonable to state the day of the month or week, or any other fact equally undeniable. This, however might be excused if it lead on any thing better, but the conversation still goes on in the same strain, and two people who have been conversing together for hours seldom find themselves any wiser or better when they part than they were on first meeting. It seems to us that this arises from a paucity of ideas, resulting from a total neglect of the faculty of thinking, and yet there is surely no want of subjects on which the mind might be beneficially and pleasantly occupied. Very ignorant people can, of course, have nothing to converse upon except their own affairs and common place every day occurrences; but the middling class of society can have no excuse for such idle gossip; and at a time when education is so much in fashion and literary institutions abound in almost every street, it may be reasonably expected that people should exhibit something like mind in their daily intercourse. Rather let their conversation be 'yea and nay,' than waste their time and weaken their minds by paying attention to vulgar subjects. Let them follow Franklin's advice, if only for a few weeks, and they will be astonished at the improvement they have affected in their mental powers, and the knowledge they have thus acquired; continue the system and they must inevitably become wiser, better and happier beings.—N. Y. Mirror.

Reading with the Lips.

But the most touching anecdote communicated was relative to a blind girl, who had received a copy of the gospel of St. Mark, in raised type, provided by this Society. This interesting person is extremely poor, and quite blind. She has to support herself by her labor, which consists of all kinds of work, and in addition to this she is obliged to cultivate a little piece of ground from which she procures a few vegetables. Her hands and fingers are, of course, much more callous than those of most blind persons. When she heard that the Society had published a gospel for the blind, she was very desirous of obtaining it. Her pastor procured her a copy with an accompanying alphabet. She is very intelligent and adroit, and notwithstanding the difficulty in her fingers she began with eagerness to learn the characters. To the surprise of her friend, within a few days, she could decypher alone a page of the gospel, but this was far from satisfying her ardent spirit. She was discouraged at the slowness of her progress. One day she thought if she could but remove the hard skin from her fingers the touch would become more delicate. She took a penknife and skinned the ends of her fingers. What was not now her regret? The pain became exquisite, and the touch was not improved. On the contrary, a skin was formed more obdurate than the first, which rendered it impossible for the poor girl to continue her attempt. After many vain efforts, she fell into despair. In one of these moments, she seized the volume and with sobs and tears held it to her mouth to embrace it for the last time, saying, "Farewell! farewell! good words of my heavenly Father! support of my soul! I must part from thee!"

O, surprise! the lips, more delicate than the fingers, have discovered the form of the letters. She reflected. She could no longer doubt.—Her soul was filled with joy and gratitude unspeakable. It was night. She went to bed but not to sleep; the whole night she employed in passing and repassing the pages across her lips, and every where and every time she could not only distinguish the letters, but phrases and sentences. She has since committed the whole gospel to memory. —Letter from Mrs. Wilks, Paris.

The Crisis.

There never has been a time, when the enemies of the doctrine which teaches the universal paternity of God—the universal brotherhood of man, and the ultimate salvation of the world, have been more bitter, inveterate and active than at present. The rapid spread of our faith, and the hold it has taken upon the feelings and affections of multitudes of the wisest and best of our race, has alarmed and aroused the powers of darkness, and a combination appears to have been entered into by all the partialist sects to overthrow the truth, and crush its advocates and adherents. Every art and device, and expedient which the ingenuity of man can devise is put in requision for the accomplishment of their purpose. We are slandered, persecuted and abused; our characters are assailed, our motives impeached, our families insulted and our children seduced from the paths of truth and duty, and led into error and disobedience. The crisis has come! Our denomination is being sifted. Those who have united with us for "the loaves and fishes," and "the stony ground hearers" of the word, are leaving us, and are becoming the tools of our opposers. The prince of darkness has marshalled his forces—consisting of Calvinists and Arminians, Infidels and Apostates, in hostile array, against the cause, and friends of truth, and no expedient will be left untried, which promises the least success in the accomplishment of their unhallowed purpose. It behooves the friends of truth, therefore, to manifest a corresponding zeal and engagedness. They should be fully prepared for the contest. They should put on the whole armor of God, and be fully prepared, qualified and ready, at all proper times, and on all proper occasions, to defend "the faith which was once delivered to the saints." But more especially, should the believers in the "great salvation," be careful to maintain good works, and to exemplify in their lives and conduct the principles and tendency of their faith.—Let us but do this, and we may rest assured that we shall come off conquerors and more than conquerors, through him that loved us, and died to redeem us.—Balm of Gilead.

Amount of Salt of the Ocean.

Bakewell estimates the amount of salt in the ocean at two and a half per cent. From computations based upon the amount of the tides, it is highly probable that the Atlantic and Pacific oceans are, in their central parts, not less than 9 or 10 miles in depth. Were we to place the average depth of the ocean at 5 miles, it would doubtless be a moderate estimate. In superficial extent it covers full three fifths of the earths surface. Assuming then 5 miles as the average depth of the ocean, and two and a half per cent as the average amount of salt contained in it, were the waters entirely evaporated, the saline or residue would form a stratum of salt more than five hundred feet in thickness, covering three fifths of the surface of the globe. If then this mass of salt were evenly spread over the entire amount of land on the earth's surface, it would cover it to the depth of 750 feet. But no more than one fifth of the earth's surface is habitable.—Were, then, the salt contained in the ocean spread over all the habitable parts of the globe, it would cover them to the deprh of 1500 feet, or something more than a quarter of a mile.

Let us try another illustration. The superfices of our planet are calculated to contain about 190 millions of square miles. The territory of the United States may be estimated in round numbers at two millions of square miles, or one-nineteenth of the habitable surface of the globe; say in round numbers one-twentieth. Were the salt of the ocean, therefore, evenly spread over the entire surface of the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Gulf of Mexico to British America, it would cover it to the depth of 80,000 feet, or between 5 and 6 miles. But were only that part which is now laid out into States and reduced to cultivation, thus covered, the depth would be nearly 12 miles.

Once more. The State of Ohio contains about 40,000 square miles, or one-fiftieth of the entire territory of the United States. Let us, then, suppose all this salt collected into a pyramid covering the entire State of Ohio, or its equivalent, that is, an extent of territory 200 miles square; the pyramid of salt would shoot its crystal head 855 miles into the blue expanse, leaving the clouds about its very base glittering in eternal sunshine, and visible at a distance of 2790 miles.—Ohio Observer.

The Shepherd's Dog.

Notwithstanding his wild and melancholy looks he is patient, persevering, and most faithfully attached to his master. It is curious to see how carefully in this country he will gather and drive a flock of sheep, with more skill than any other man or boy could do it. But in the highlands of Scotland, where the winters are long and severe, and the snow-drifts are very deep among the mountains, these dogs are still more useful; and wonderful stories are told of their sense and faithfulness. The following is known to be a true one.

The valleys, or glens as they are there called, among the Grampian mountains are chiefly inhabited by shepherds. There are no fences or boundaries in these wild parts, but every shepherd has his own range, which reaches so far that he never sees the whole of his flock together, except when they are collected for shearing. Every day he has to go to the distant parts of his range and with his faithful dog to turn back any straggling sheep that might wander beyond his own bounds into his neighbor's land. In one of these rambles a shepherd took his little boy about three years old, as is the custom with the highlanders, to season them to the cold of the climate. After going about the pastures for some time, the shepherd with his dog climbed a very steep hill that he might gain a wider view of his scattered flock. But fearing to tire the child, he left him in a sheltered spot, charging him not to stir till he came back. But hardly had he reached the top of the hill, when the sky suddenly darkened by one of the very thick mists which often comes down suddenly on these mountains, and shut out every object from the eye. The father, feeling anxious for his child, hastened down; but owing to the darkness and his own fright, he lost his way. He wandered long among the dangerous bogs and waterfalls which abound in those desert places, till night came on; still he went on and on till he came to the edge of the mist, and then he saw by the light of the moon, that he had reached his own valley, and was within a short distance of his cottage. It was impossible to renew the search for the poor child that night; but as soon as morning began to dawn he set out with a party of his neighbors. All that day he crossed the mountains to and fro, looking into every dark hollow and cleft; but to no purpose. The dog however, had returned home, and after receiving his usual allowance of cake, had run off, and was still absent. Day after day the heart broken father renewed his search, and the neighboring shepherds left their flocks to seek for the lost child in every part of their different ranges;—but still in vain. There was not the least mark of a small footstep on the damp grass. The father strained his ear to listen; but there was no feeble cry mixed with the loud roar of the waterfalls and the bleating of the flocks. Yet still, when he came back to the cottage at night, he found that the dog had been for his allowance of food, and then had gone off again. Being struck with this, he stayed at home till the dog set off again with his cake, and followed him. The faithful creature led him to a wild waterfall at some distance from the spot where the child had been left. It was a dreadful place. The high cliffs on each side almost meet together at the top, but below it was a fearful dark hollow. The dog instantly began to make his way down one of these steep cliffs, and at last, went into a cave nearly close to the roaring waterfall. The shepherd followed with difficulty. You may guess what he felt when he saw his boy there safe, eating the cake which the dog had brought, while the faithful animal stood by watching him with looks of pleasure.

From the child's own account, and the place in which he was found, it appeared that he had wandered to the edge of the cliff, and then either fallen or scrambled down till he reached the cave—when there, the fear of the waterfalls prevented his leaving it. The dog by means of his scent, had tracked him to the spot, and then had hindered him from starving by giving up to him his daily allowance. He seemed never to have left the child night or day, except when he went home for his food, and then he was seen running at full speed to and from the cottage.

Two men were at work one day in a shipyard. They were hewing a stick of timber to put into a ship. It was a small stick, and not worth much. As they cut off the chips they found a worm, a little worm, about half an inch long.

'This stick is wormy,' said one, 'shall we put it in?'

'I do not know; yes, I think it may go in. It will not be seen, of course.'

'Yes, but there may be other worms in it; and these may increase and injure the ship.'

'No; I think not. To be sure the stick is not worth much, yet I do not wish to lose it. But come, never mind the worm; we have seen but one; put it in.'

The stick was accordingly put in; the ship was finished, and she was launched off into the waters, all ready for the seas; she looked beautiful as the swan when the breeze ruffles his white feathered bosom, as he sits on the waters. She went to sea, and for a number of years did well. But it was found, on a distant voyage, that she grew weak and rotten. Her timbers were found all eaten away by the worms. But the Captain thought he would try to get her home. He had a very costly load of goods in the ship, such as silks, crapes, and the like, and a great many passengers. On their way home, a storm gathered. The ship for a while climbed up the high waves, and then plunged down, creaking and rolling finely. But she then sprung a leak.—They had two pumps, and the men worked at them day and night; but the water came in faster than they could pump it out. She filled with water and went down under the dark blue waves of the ocean, with all the goods and all the people on board. Every one perished. Oh! how many wives, mothers and children mourned over husbands, sons and brothers, for whose return they were waiting, and who never returned! And all this, probably, because that little stick of timber, with the worm in it, was put in when the ship was built! How much property, and how many lives, may be destroyed by a little worm! And how much evil may a man do, when he does a small wrong, as that man did when he put the wormy timber in the ship!

Dignified conduct of a young Lady.

Eliza, a young Parisian, resolutely discarded a gentleman to whom she was to have been married the next day, because he ridiculed religion. Having given him a gentle reproof, he replied, 'That a man of the world would not be so old fashioned, as to regard God and religion.' Eliza started! but quickly recovering herself, said, 'From this moment, then, sir, I cease to be yours. He who does not love and honor God, can never love his wife constantly and sincerely.' The match was broken off.

The following extract from a letter dated eighth month 23d, 1842, from a friend residing among the Shawnee Indians who are under the care of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, to a member of that meeting, it was thought would be interesting to the readers of "The Friend," as illustrative of some of the peculiar customs and ceremonies of that poor despised, and downtrodden people.

"On the 10th of last month, several of our family attended the funeral of a young Indian, son of a chief, who lives about three miles from our establishment. We started about ten o'clock in the morning, and on our arrival at the house of mourning, found a pretty large collection of men, women and children, seated in groups round the house and yards; with their long black hair hanging loosely down their backs, (a badge of mourning,) and a kettle of bean soup before each group. The corpse was laid on a board in the yard, near the house, under a muslin canopy, dressed in his grave-clothes, viz., the usual dress he wore, with one or more pieces of calico, a shawl, good new warm blanket, and muslin winding-sheet; all of which were wrapped so closely round the body that no part was to be seen, save the shroud. Previous to its being conveyed to the grave, the head was uncovered, and the face washed and painted in the Indian style, and the body sprinkled with tobacco powder. On the right side of the corpse lay a gun, and sundry articles belonging to the deceased; and on his left sat his sister with a fly-brush in her hand; and round the head lay a variety of articles, such as remnants of calico and ribbon, handkerchiefs, tobacco boxes, &c., presents from his friends: also, not less than a bushel basket of corn and wheat bread, and about the same quantity of meat, and several large kettles of soup. About two o'clock, P. M., six rough-sawed boards, two inches thick, were brought and laid softly by the side of the corpse; and the men who brought them repaired to the spot of interment, which had been previously selected, a few rods from the house and the sod removed by his sister and another female relation with a hoe. After the men had dug about three feet deep, the boards were brought and laid in the grave, and after they were fitted together, formed quite a snug coffin. The body, suspended on three saddle girths was conveyed to the grave by six men; and the undertakers had a ribbon of red, blue, and green round their necks. (It is the business of the undertaker to prepare the coffin, grave, &c.) After the corpse was laid in the grave, an old chief walked round it, sprinkled the body with tobacco, as he uttered over it a few words. One of the undertakers cut a corner of every covering that was wrapped round the body and handed to the deceased's sister as a memento of her departed brother. The mourners walked in procession; the men first, and only one abreast; and as soon as they reached the grave, each one received at the hands of the old chief, a little of the tobacco, and as they walked silently round the grave, sprinkled it over the body; and in this manner they took their last farewell of their departed friend, continuing their walk until they reached the house again. The coffin was then closed and the grave filled up. The whole was performed in a solemn manner, and many tears were shed.

"After the interment the company partakes of the provisions. The remnants of calico, &c. are given to the undertakers for their labor; and the property of the deceased is divided among the relations."—The Friend.

The Corrupting Influence of Trade.

But the peril of business specifically considered; and I ask if there is not good ground for the admonitions on this point, of every moral and holy teacher of every age? What means if there is not, that eternal disingenuity of trade, that is ever putting on fair appearances and false pretences—of 'the buyer that says it is naught, it is naught, but when he is gone his way, then boasteth'—of the seller, who is always exhibiting the best samples, not fair but false samples, of what he has to sell; of the seller, I say, who, to use the language of another, 'if he is tying up a bundle of quills, will place several in the centre of not half the value of the rest, and thus sends forth a hundred liars, with a fair outside to proclaim as many falsehoods to the world!' These practices, alas! have fallen into the regular business course of many. All men expect them, and therefore you may say that nobody is deceived. But deception is intended; else why are these things done? What if nobody is deceived? The seller himself is corrupted. He may stand acquitted of dishonesty in the moral code of moral traffic; no man may charge him with dishonesty; and yet to himself he is a dishonest man. Did I say that nobody is deceived? Nay but somebody is deceived! This man, the seller, is grossly, wofully deceived. He thinks to make a little profit by his contrivance; and he is selling by penyworths', the very integrity of his soul.—Yes, the worthiest shop where these things are done, may be to the spiritual vision a place of more than tragical interest. It is the stage on which the great action of life is performed.—There stands a man who in the sharp collision of daily traffic, might have polished his mind to the bright and beautiful image of truth, who might have put on the noble brow of candor, and cherished the very soul of uprightness. I have known such a man. I have looked into his humble shop. I have seen the mean and soiled article with which he is dealing, and yet the process of things going on there, was as beautiful as if it had been done in heaven! But now what is this man—the man who always turns up to you the best side of every thing he sells—The man of unceasing contrivances and expedients, his life long, to make things appear better than they are? Be he the greatest merchant or the poorest huckster, he is a mean, a knavish—and were I not awed by the thoughts of his immortality, I should say—a contemtible creature whom nobody that knows him can love, whom nobody can trust, whom nobody can reverence. Not one thing in the dusty repository of things, great or small, which he deals with is so vile as he. What is the thing then, which is done or may be done in the house of traffic? I tell you though you may have thought not so of it—that there even, there, a man may be lost! that the very structure, built for the gain of earth, may be the gate of hell! Say not, that this fearful appellation should be applied to worse places than that. A man may as certainly corrupt all the integrity and virtue of his soul in a warehouse or a shop, as in a gambling house or a brothel.

False to himself, then, may a man become, while he is walking through the perilous course of traffic; false, also, to his neighbor. I cannot dwell much upon this topic; but I will put one question; not for reproach, but for your sober consideration. Must it not render a man extremely liable to be selfish, that he is engaged in pursuits whose immediate and palpable end, is his own interest? I wish to draw your attention to this peculiarity of trade. I do not say, that the motives which originally induce a man to enter into this sphere of life, may not be as benevolent as those of any other man; but this is the point which I wish to have considered—that while the learned professions have knowledge for their immediate object, and the artist and artisan have the perfection of their work as the thing that directly engages attention, the merchant and the trader have for their immediate object, profit. Does not this circumstance greatly expose a man to be selfish? Full well I know that many are not so; that many resist and overcome this influence; but I think, that it is to be resisted. And a wise man, who more deeply dreads the taint of inward selfishness, than of outward dishonor, will take care to set up counter influences.—Dr. Dewy.

Dollars and Cents.

It is rather curious what singular ideas folks will get hold of sometimes, and think every body their enemies. The fact is, this mistake arises from their own limited ideas of men and things. A man who goes into his counting-room in the morning, counts and takes money, writes letters and keeps his mind engaged in the pursuits to get rich, holding no intercourse with men only so far as dollars and cents are concerned, narrows his mind down to imagine all men as himself, enemies to each other—and he'll never have friends, nor can he be respected only as he has respect with his money. We have many such in the world and we pity them. Man was made for a more noble purpose than to be the plaything of dollars and cents. If those individuals who think that the world does not pay them proper respect, would respect themselves, and do good with their means, they would soon find that all men are not their enemies. A free, honorable intercourse with the world, as it jogs, will make a man feel that he has friends who will hang about him for his real worth. Friends, bought with dollars, last no longer than dollars last.

The wild Horses.

The herds of wild horses present a beautiful spectacle when they are alarmed in their native wilds by the intrusion of an army. Instead of flying, as the deer and other timid animals, they gallop round in compact masses of many thousands, apparently for the purpose of reconnoitering the strangers; and frequently advance boldly to within a few yards of the line of march, where they halt to gaze at the troops, tossing their manes, and showing every sign of astonishment and displeasure, especially at the sight of the cavalry.—These droves are always headed by some fine looking old bashaws, whose flowing manes and tails plainly show that they have never been subject to man's control; and in the rear the mares and colts follow.

Musick (said Luther) is one of the fairest and most glorious gifts of God to which Satan is a bitter enemie, therewith many tribulations and evil cogitations are hunted away. It is one of the best Arts, the Notes give life to the text, it expelleth melancholic as wee see on King Saul. Kings and Princes ought to preserv and maintain Musick, for great Potentates and Rulers ought to protect good and liberal Arts and Laws, and although private people have lust thereunto and love the same, yet their abilitie cannot preserv and maintain it. Wee read in the Bible, that the good and godly kings maintained and paid singers. Musick (said Luther) is the best Solace for a sad and sorrowful minde, through which the heart is refreshed and settled again in peace, as said by Virgil; Tu calamos inflare leues, ego dicere versus: Sing thou the Notes, I will sing the Text. Musick is an half Discipline and Schol-mistress, that maketh people more gentle and meek minded, more modest and understanding. The base and evil fidlers and minstrels serv thereto, that wee see and hear, how fine an Art Musick is for white can never bee better known, then when black is held against it. Anno 1538, the 17th, of December, Luther invited the singers and musitians to a supper, where they sing fair and sweet muteteæ, then hee said with admiration, Seeing that our Lord God in this life (which is but a meer Cloaca) shaketh out and presenteth unto us such precious gifts, and what then will bee don in the life everlasting, when every thing shall bee made in the most compleat and delightfullest manner, here is onely materia prima, the beginning. I alwaies loved Musick (said Luther) whoso hath skill in this Art, the same is of good kinde, fitted for all things, we must of necessitie maintain musick in Schools, a School-master ought to have skill in musick, otherwise I would not regard him, neither should wee ordain young fellows to the office of preaching, except, before they have been well exercised and practised in the School of Musick. Musick is a fair gift of God, and near allied to Divinitie, I would not for a great matter (said Luther) bee destitute of the small skill in Musick which I have. The youth ought to bee brought up and accustomed to this Art, for it maketh fine and expert people.

Every threatening explained. Universalists all know the importance of a right understanding of those parts of Scripture, commonly designated by the term threatenings. Although such passages are relied on by many to disprove the doctrine of Universalism, it is well known, that, when understood according to their original intent, they furnish not the slightest evidence against that doctrine, but rather the contrary. All that is necessary to do, to convince men of this, is to persuade them to examine, without prejudice, the arguments which have been advanced on these subjects. There are two works which are particularly designed to throw light on this class of passages.

THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM, after having given a very brief history of Universalism, —and stated the opinions entertained by Universalists, and the Scriptural arguments adduced by them to support those opinions, takes up and explains the passages which have been used to sustain the doctrine of endless misery.— In the course of the examination of these texts, the following subjects are explained:

Lowest hell.	Worm dieth not.
Perish forever.	Damned.
Day of wrath.	All likewise perish.
Wicked turned into hell.	Rich Man and Lazarus.
Fire and brimstone.	Cannot see God.
Everlasting burnings.	Shall not see life.
Everlasting contempt.	Wrath of God.
Burned, root and branch.	Resurrection of damnation.
Wrath to come.	Die in your sins.
Unquenchable fire.	Pray not for the world.
Hell fire.	Son of perdition.
Strait and narrow way.	What must I do to be saved?
Outer darkness.	Judgment to come.
Day of judgment.	Anathema Maranatha.
Destroy soul and body.	Judgment seat of Christ.
Sin against Holy Ghost.	Everlasting destruction.
Furnace of fire.	Fearful judgment.
Lose his own soul.	Better resurrection.
Shall not enter heaven.	God is a consuming fire.
Without wed. garment.	Sin unto death.
Ten virgins.	Vengeance of eternal fire.
Sheep and Goats.	Second death.
Everlasting punishment.	Lake of fire and brimstone.
Judas.	Smoke ascendeth forever.
Eternal damnation.	Unjust be unjust still.
Fire never quenched.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS, takes up all these subjects from the New Testament, and explains them in the language of the Orthodox Commentators themselves.— That work consists of 'selectione' from the most learned of the Orthodox Commentators, which show that they in their wisdom and honesty, in former times, explained the most of these subjects, almost precisely as Universalists now do.

In this view, the 'Plain Guide' and 'Paige's Selections, are companions to each other; they furnish a large amount of valuable criticism on the subjects above named.

Rose of Sharon. The Rose of Sharon for 1843, a beautiful annual, by writers of the Universalist denomination, edited by Miss S. C. Edgarton, is for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, at the lowest cash price. Ladies will please call and examine it.

Book of Promises. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. Bulfinch Emmons. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of distinguished theologians, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

Paige's Questions. Fifth Edition. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'Questions on Select Portions of the Gospels; designed for the use of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. By Lucius R. Paige, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Cambridge.' Price 25 cents single; $2,50 per dozen.

Miller's Theory Refuted. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelation, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradictory.

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'end of the world,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

Paige's Selections. 'Selections from Eminent Commentators who have believed in punishment after death; wherein they have agreed with Universalists in the interpretation of Scriptures relating to Punishment. By Rev. Lucius R. Paige. Second Edition, with revisions and additions. 358 pages.—Price $1.

This is a highly valuable work to all Universalists.—It proves by the most respectable orthodox authority, that the interpretations which Universalists have given of the passages of Scripture which relate to punishment, are correct. It is a refutation of endless misery by the testimony of the most learned writers who have believed that doctrine. The threatenings of punishment, occuring in the New Testament, which have been supposed to refer to endless misery, are explained in this work, in the very language of the Partialist Commentators. It is fatal to the doctrine of endless misery.

Dods' Short Sermons. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the new stereotype edition of 'DODS' SHORT SERMONS,' with addition of several important articles. These Sermons have been regarded by the Universalist public with great favor. The first edition was taken up with avidity.—At the request of many friends, the author was induced to revise the work, and add many important essays on deeply interesting subjects; in which the author has thrown much light on subjects that have been regarded as very difficult to be understood. 'Mr. Dods,' says a distinguished correspondent, 'has done much to throw light on the sacred volume. Many of his expositions have struck us with great force. He has given us great light. Difficult subjects are explained clearly by him.'

Price of the work 75 cents. Wholesale dealers will find it to their interest to call at 37 Cornhill.

Ancient History of Universalism. Second Edition. Just received and for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'The Ancient History of Universalism, from the commencement of the Christian Era to the time of the Reformation.' By Hosea Ballou 2d., of Medford. Price $1 per copy. A suitable discount to those who buy to sell again. It is a highly valuable work.

Life of Rev. John Murray. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by Thomas Whittemore.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

Thayer's Bible Class Assistant. Third Edition. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT, or Scriptural Guide for Sabbaq Schools, being sketches of the Antiquities, Customs and Manners of the Jews, in illustration of Scripture, designed for the use of Teachers, Bible Classes, and the Higher Classes in Sunday Schools.' By Rev Thomas B. Thayer, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Lowell, Mass. This book is on a new plan, suggested to its author by his experience in conducting Sunday Schools and Bible Classes. It is not a book of questions merely; but each chapter consists of two parts,—1st. The history to which the questions refer is succinctly given, which is to be faithfully studied, and 2d. The Questions. We have examined this work, and commend it; but any formal commendation is rendered quite unnecessary by the well known reputation of its author.

Price 25 cents single, $2,50 per dozen.

Balfour's Inquiries. Just published and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, Boston, 'THREE INQUIRIES—1st. Into the Scriptural Doctrine concerning the Devil and Satan. 2d. The Extent and Duration expressed by the terms Olim Aion, and Aionios, rendered Everlasting, &c. &c. in the Bible, and especially when applied to punishment. 3d. The New-Testament doctrine concerning the Possession of Devils. By Walter Balfour, of Charlestown. Price $1.

Agents who become responsible for six subscribers, shall, each year, receive a volume therefor, as long as they retain their responsibility, and the same proportion, for a less or greater number.

All papers will be forwarded, until an explicit order for a discontinuance is received; and whether taken up by the subscriber or not, from the place where they are deposited, he will be held accountable for the pay until he orders a discontinuance, and pays up all that is due.

☞ All communications concerning the paper must be addressed to Thomas Whittemore, 'Trumpet Office,' Boston—and those forwarded by mail must be post paid.

LIABILITIES OF THOSE WHO TAKE PERIODICALS.

The laws declare that any person to whom a periodical is sent is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office, or person with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a post office, store, tavern, or other place of deposite, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the postmaster, store or tavern keeper, &c. is responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or gives notice to the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

Post Office Regulations. Extract from the 'instructions to postmasters,' p. 50, sec. 118. 'In every instance in which papers that come to your office are not taken out by the person to whom they are sent, you will give immediate notice of it to the publishers, anning the reason, if known, why the papers are not taken out.

In all cases where Postmasters render themselves liable for the subscription money for a paper, by a neglect to notify the publisher that it remains dead in the Post Office, the Postmaster General reserves the right to admonish the Postmaster for his neglect, and require him to pay for the paper, or reform him out of office.

Boston:

Examination of Future Punishment.

There is an association of Universalist clergymen in Boston and vicinity, known by the name of the Winchester Ministerial Circle. They meet once in a month at each others' houses. Some one is appointed at the previous meeting to write an Essay. The last meeting was holden at the house of Rev. Sebastian Streeter, in Boston, on Monday of last week, when Rev. Hosea Ballou, of this city, delivered the following Essay:

'What effect will the conduct of men, in this mortal state, produce in relation to their portion of enjoyment in the future, immortal state?'

However various and conflicting may have been the opinions of Christian doctors on this question, they have generally agreed in using about the same language in reference to it; and have been quite uniform in their application of certain passages of Scripture as divine authority on this momentous subject.—But although our clergy, who believe in the doctrine of particular election and reprobation, hold the same language, in reference to man's final state, as do those of the Arminian school, and apply the same Scriptures to that subject as do the last mentioned, it seems utterly impossible to reconcile either their manner of speaking, or their Scripture quotations equally and rationally to their widely different sentiments. The doctors of the first mentioned class believe, and profess to believe, that the final, eternal destiny of all men was fixed and decreed, in the counsels of divine wisdom from all eternity, without any reference to faith or good works. But the last mentioned doctors contend that man's final state depends on the condition of faith in Christ, and obedience to his precepts. Yet have these schools of doctors made the same use of 2 Cor. v. 10, where the apostle says, 'For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.' If we could find any way to reconcile this declaration of the apostle to the meaning which the Arminian attaches to it, is there any possible way to understand how that meaning agrees with the sentiment of the predestinarian? That this passage agrees, in substance, with all those numerous passages which speak of rewarding men according to their works, perhaps, will not be doubted by any.

It is, unquestionably, a fact, that neither of the before mentioned classes of divines understandingly believe either the passage in 2 Cor. v. 10, or any of those like passages, which evidently belong to the same general subject. What they all believe and teach concerning this subject of rewards and punishments in the immortal state, amounts simply to this, viz. some men will be eternally rewarded for their good deeds, but not punished for their deeds which are evil; and some men will be endlessly punished for their evil deeds, but receive no reward for their good deeds. To understand the Scriptures thus, and so to explain them, is, evidently, to do them great injustice; and to modify the moral government of God, by the wisdom of man, contrary to man's sense of moral justice. All which is written in the volume of divine inspiration on the subject of rewards and punishments is, unquestionably, in agreement with Eccl. xii. 13, 14: 'Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter; fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.'

Our Creator has given us no evidence for believing that some of his moral beings are so privileged, that their transgressions will yield them no bitterness; and that others are not entitled to the happy effects of obedience to his parental requirements. Nor does such doctrine find any support in the experience of man. 'He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong he hath done, and there is no respect of persons with God.'

In relation to our remarks thus far, there appears no danger of meeting with any opposition.

We come then to another important query, and that is, are the rewards and punishments, of which we have assurance in the divine word, administered in this mortal state, or are they to be experienced in the future, immortal state? In the old schools, as we have seen, these rewards and punishments have been carried into the immortal world; though so managed that some are there to receive an infinite reward for their good deeds, but no retribution for their deeds which are evil;—while others are to be forever punished for every evil work, but are to meet with no reward for doing well. But as we are compelled to reject this theory, on account of its utter and manifest impropriety; we may ask whether all men will not be rewarded and punished in the immortal state according to their good and evil deeds in this mortal life? If we take the affirmative of this question, meaning thereby that all rewards and punishments are to be administered in the immortal state, and that no such administration is known in this state, then surely we throw away all proof from man's experience here, that there is, in the divine government, any such thing as rewards and punishments. One might conjecture, that as there are no rewards nor punishments in this world, there must be in the future. So another may surmise, that as God does not, in this world, render to men according to their works, we may reasonably suppose he will not in the world to come. And this surmise, to say the least, is as plausible as that conjecture.

But is it said that we are not left to our speculations in regard to this weighty subject, and that God's written word must decide the matter? To this we shall not demur.—We are in favor of using this rule, and no other. If it be asked whether our experience should not be allowed to bear testimony in the case, the right answer is, our experience can be of no authority in the matter only as it obtains its force from the divine word.—That for which we here contend is made clear by the following Scripture: Gen. xv. 13, 14: 'And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance.' Here we learn that God judged that nation which afflicted the seed of Abram, before he brought them out of their bondage. Now if the Scriptures had informed us that God brought the oppressed Hebrews out of Egypt, and had given no account of any judgments having been sent on their oppressors, then, in this instance, human experience would not have borne witness. But look at Exod. ix. 13, 14: 'And the Lord said unto Moses, Rise up early in the morning, and stand before Pharaoh, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may serve me. For I will at this time send all my plagues upon thy heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people: that thou mayest know that there is none like me in all the earth.' By following the Scripture account, we find that all God's plagues were sent on Pharaoh and his people in judgment; and afterward the oppressed were delivered. If the Scriptures no where give us any account that Pharaoh and his people are to be judged and punished in the immortal state, do we render them that deference which is due to their authority by contending that the divine retribution on Pharaoh and his people, was not administered in this mortal state, but is in reserve for the immortal? We have an instance of divine retribution recorded in the 9th chapter of Judges, which we may consider as another example of Scripture doctrine on our subject. See verses 56, 57: 'Thus God rendered the wickedness of Abimelech, which he did unto his father, in slaying his seventy brethren: And all the evil of the men of Shechem did God render upon their heads: and upon them came the curse of Jotham, the son of Jerubbaal.' In agreement with these examples we find the doctrine of rewards and punishments laid down in Levit. xxvi. and Deut. xxviii., in which account we are certified that justice should be duly administered, both in relation to obedience and disobedience. But in all these specified rewards and punishments we find all to relate to good and evil in this mortal state; and no allusion to the future. St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, when endeavoring to guard Christians against a neglect of the duties of their vocation, says, chap. ii. 1—3,—'Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip. For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation.'—The apostle here assures us that, as under the former dispensation the people were justly punished for every fault, so would it be under the gospel dispensation; but neither Paul, nor any other inspired writer, has furnished authority for carrying the divine rewards and punishments under the gospel dispensation, into the immortal state, any more than such rewards and punishments were carried into that state by the law of Moses.—When Jesus, to whom all judgment was committed, set up and established his kingdom in this world, his judgment-seat was erected, before which, as St. Paul says, all must appear, that every one may receive according to his deeds, whether good or bad.

But in all we have said what have we done in relation to our question? Perhaps it will be said we have done but a very little. And yet this little may be of even important service while we attend to further discussion; as we are instructed by it not to look to the Scriptures for any information respecting rewards and punishments in the immortal world.

What are we now to do? We are to try to settle the question, What effect will the conduct of men, in this mortal state, produce in relation to their portion of enjoyment in the future, immortal state? But by what rule, and by what means are we to arrive at the solution sought? Is it said that we must reason from analogy? It is true many learned divines strenuously contend for this; and are confident that by this mode of reasoning they correctly arrive at the conclusion, that the virtuous in this world will be rewarded in the future state; and that the vicious here will be punished there. But such a conclusion is no honor to their learning, nor is it any evidence of their extraordinary powers of reasoning. All we have seen on this subject strongly indicates the fact, that these divines assume, without any proper process of reasoning from analogy, that some of the human family will be happy hereafter, and that some will be miserable; and as they have no Scripture proofs in the premises, they say that analogy sustains them in their conclusion.—What is meant by analogy? Analogy is a resemblance between things with regard to some circumstance or effects. If this reasoning from analogy on our present subject be fully authorized, what difference shall we find between this mortal state and the immortal? We are brought to a full stop at our first setting out. This state of our existence is mortal; and all who live here must see death. What follows from analogy? The next state of man's existence will be mortal; and all who live in that state must see death. Immortality is now out of the question; and our subject changes its aspect, having lost one of its principal elements.

As we are now entirely free from all authority but analogy, we have just as wide a field, in which to range, as we please to make it. We will then take the assumption that virtue in this state is to be rewarded in the next; and that vice here is to be punished there, for granted, and then reason from analogy. This will bring us to the conclusion, that retribution will forever be one state of man's existence in arrear, and if men suffer for sin in this present state, or here enjoys in consequence of virtue, both this sin and this virtue belonged to a former state. Again, our analogical reasoning brings us to the wise conclusion, that as we have here no recollection of having existed in a former state, we shall, in the future world, have no recollection of this. Keeping to our analogy, we may be satisfied that in the future world some will die in infancy, some in youth, some in middle age, and some in old age; all will sin and come short in duty; some will be more virtuous than others; the most virtuous will endure great afflictions; be persecuted by bigots, and in short, all things there will analogically agree with all things here.

Perhaps we shall be told that we carry this analogy too far, and make it too particular; and that by so doing we wrong our wise and learned divines. Well, this we have no disposition or wish to do. Will they inform us just how far they would extend this mode of reasoning? They have never done it. No doubt the extent to which they are willing to go must be determined by their own imaginations, each carefully accommodating his own particular views. Let them do so, and there are not more points in the wide heavens around us, than there will be of their widely different and conflicting opinions.

Some may say, we believe in the doctrine of immortality, as it is brought to light thro' the gospel; and do not admit that the imperfections of this mortal state will exist in that; but are strongly inclined to the opinion that our conduct in this world will be attended with good and evil consequences hereafter, and will render us more or less happy, according to its moral character; and we wish to have the question duly considered on these admitted premises. Well we will do all we can. But before we begin, we want to be furnished with some acknowledged authority. Are the Scriptures to direct our inquiry, and decide the question? If so, what shall we do if on examination we find them silent on the subject? We do not remember that Moses, or the Prophets, or Jesus, or any of his disciples have given us any information concerning what effect our conduct in this world will produce, affecting our enjoyments in the immortal state. It is true that Jesus taught his disciples, in the parable of the laborers in the vineyard, that some murmured because they received no more wages than others, who had not labored so long as they had; and that the first should be last and the last should be first; but we have no authority for applying this parable to the immortal state. And it would by no means, well agree with the opinion that the most virtuous here will receive more happiness in the immortal world, than those who come short; for, according to the parable, those who bore the burden and heat of the day, and those who wrought but one hour, received alike. If this parable is allowed to establish a principle, it would seem that our inquiry is at an end; and that the amount of happiness allotted to the children of our heavenly Father is determined by his own gracious will, and not by the amount of their good works. To whatever this parable specially belongs, one thing is obvious, and that is, if those who bore the burden and heat of the day, had loved those who wrought but one hour as they loved themselves, there would have been no murmuring.

If it be said, even allowing that the Scriptures are silent, in regard to our question, reason teaches that our conduct in this world must affect our enjoyments in the immortal state, or we must loose our recollection of what we here do, we reply: When we undertake to determine important questions, relating to the immortal state, by our reason, without the aid of God's word, we imply thereby that He has not revealed so much of the future state as is necessary for us; and that it becomes us to make the best shift we can to supply the deficiency. It is true that the blessed Jesus told the Sadducees that in the resurrection men will be equal unto the angels, and shall die no more; and St. Paul informs us, that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive; but this is not enough to satisfy our curiosity. We want—what do we want? We want to know who are to be greatest in the immortal world! Well, who are they who shall be greatest there? Of course, WE who are the greatest, the wisest, and the best here on earth. If reason does not teach this our pride and our vanity are all put to confusion, and our marvellous attainments are of no value! This, be sure is intolerable. It must not be so.—Let us go to work now in earnest, and make reasonable calculations. But as it is not modest to be talking about ourselves, we will make our calculations in regard to others, having ourselves in mind all the time.—Which will enjoy the most happiness in the immortal state, St. Peter, or Ananias? The latter lied to the Holy Ghost and then died; the former denied Jesus, and cursed and swore that he knew not the man, and was rebuked by his Master, and by him called Satan; and was withstood to his face by Saint Paul, for his dissimulation. Will not Peter remember, in the immortal world, his base conduct here? and will not Ananias remember his foul lie? Well, if they both remember these things, will not such recollection render them both less blessed than they would have been had they never done those things? If this be granted, it does not determine which of the two will enjoy the most. Let us try another case. Take those wicked enemies of Jesus, who maliciously procured his crucifixion, and his disciples who preached his gospel, and suffered death for his cause. Which of these classes will enjoy the most in the immortal state? Is it said, that reason, without a moment's pause, answers; the disciples will enjoy far the most happiness in that state? If this be said, we have some important queries to suggest. 1st. Does reason, enlightened by the Scriptures, allow that divine wisdom had no design in the crucifixion of Jesus? 2d. If it be allowed that God designed this event, does not reason teach us that He also designed all the means by which it was accomplished? If our reason will not consent to this, it is of no use to us, and the least we have to do with it the better. But the fact, is reason, enlightened by the Scriptures, does fully assent to the fact. However humiliating it may be to allow this, allow it we must. 3d. Did God design the crucifixion of Jesus, and design that the enemies of Jesus should do this act, and did He design all this for good? Reason, now having got into the divine light, answers in the affirmative. Now suppose, that in the eternal, immortal state, it should please the Father of the spirits of all flesh, to open this whole plan to the clear vision of all concerned in it, what does reason say will be the effect on those who were the enemies of Jesus? Will such a discovery, if such be ever made, cause those who crucified the Son of God, to hide their faces with shame, and forever to lament the deed? or will it cause them to be sensible of their entire dependence on God, and to be wholly swallowed up in the bright glory of divine wisdom, and the ocean of God's mercy?

Should such a scene as above suggested, be exhibited in the immortal state, does reason lead us to suppose that the enjoyments of those who crucified Jesus will be less on account of their having done this deed? Will they, to all eternity enjoy less than they would have enjoyed had they not done it? Will those disciples of Jesus, who published his gospel, and suffered in his cause, feel that they are entitled to more enjoyment than those who persecuted them? How are we to dispose of this subject? These disciples love those who were, in this world, their enemies; and they love them as they love themselves; yet claim for themselves more than they are willing those whom they love as themselves, should enjoy. O, not so. This would be open hypocrisy. No, these disciples must be sincere; they must love those who persecuted them as they love themselves, and, of course, must wish them as much happiness as they themselves enjoy. This is the right spirit; this is the very image of Jesus. In the light of this spirit of love we see that if what the enemies of Jesus did in this world affects them in the immortal state to their disadvantage, it will equally affect the disciples, to their disadvantage. There is no way to avoid this argument, but by ridding ourselves of this spirit of love and meekness. Once get rid of this and nothing remains to obstruct our onward course. We may be loud and even clamorous about distinctions in the immortal state, and therewith nourish that vanity and pride, which now love to feed on such air. And we may build our highest hopes of heaven hereafter, on that which shuts us out of heaven here.

But it is time to draw to a conclusion. But first let us take one general survey of the whole subject. Does Christianity teach us that all men, who have sinned and come short of the glory of God, will be, on account of sin, less happy in the immortal state, than they would have been if sin had never existed? Here we have the whole subject before us. If we answer the question in the affirmative, we impeach both the wisdom and goodness of God. If we answer the question, as we ought, in the negative, we, necessarily, repudiate the belief that sin committed in this mortal state will lessen the enjoyments of the immortal.

The following article is from the pen of Br. W. Balfour, of Charlestown. He does not believe in the natural immortality of the human soul, nor in the doctrine of punishment after death. He believes that men will be made alive hereafter by the resurrection of the dead, and not because they have naturally, immortal souls. By the power of God, he thinks men will be raised from the dead; he does not believe in any intermediate state between death and the resurrection, nor in any misery beyond the grave.

Origin of Future Torment.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I am very much pleased with Br. Montgomery's Sermon, given in the Trumpet of Decem. 17th. So much so, that not to be pleased with his views, I must first be displeased with my own. He says—'the doctrine of endless misery must have had an origin somewhere, at some particular time, and among a particular people.' Who can deny this? He then informs us, 'Our object at the present time, is to trace out that origin.' A noble object, and traced out in a noble manner. He states generally, that 'the Bible will be searched in vain for any language which proves that doctrine.' But to be more particular, he says—'it will be necessary to commence with the creation of human beings, and to trace out every instance of punishment found in the sacred records, down to a certain period of time, at which period we shall discover clear light breaking upon our subject.' The 'instances of punishment,' he adverts to, are, 1st. That of Adam and Eve. 2d. That of Cain. 3d. That of the antediluvians. 4th. The punishment of the crime of murder, Gen. ix. 6. 5th. The punishment of the Sodomites, Gen. xix. 24, 25. These are all the instances of punishment referred to. It is then added—'We have now traced every instance of revealed punishment, from the sin of Adam to the destruction of Gomorrah, which took place in the time of Abram; and we find not the least proof that the doctrine of endless wo, has an origin in the Bible during that period of time. I might go on and show, that no part of the Old-Testament gives the least countenance to unending sorrow—but such a work is foreign from my purpose.' He confirms these statements, by quotations from Jahn, Paley, and Dr. Campbell. To all the above statements, we cordially subscribe; but must say, this is not going far enough; it saves from censure an unscriptural doctrine among Universalists. Do not some, yea, many of them believe, the souls of men are immortal, and after death live in an intermediate state, between death and the resurrection, enjoying happiness or suffering a limited punishment. This will not be denied or disputed. I then ask, where is this ending sorrow taught in the Bible?

1. Where do we find this doctrine taught in Scripture, during the period of time between Adam and Abram? No intimation is given of this doctrine, any more than of endless misery, in the punishment of Adam and Eve, Cain, the antediluvians, the punishment of murder, or that of the Sodomites. If the silence of Scripture is proof against the doctrine of endless punishment, is it not proof also against the doctrine of limited future punishment? To deny this, I must cease to be an honest, candid, and consistent man. It is said, the immortality of the soul, and limited punishment, were taught in revelations which are now lost; the same thing can be as easily said respecting endless punishment, which balances this account. But who has got in his possession God's revelation respecting the lost revelation?

2. To use Br. Montgomery's language, 'I might go on, and show that no part of the Old-Testament gives the least countenance to the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and its limited punishment in an intermediate state, any more than to the doctrine of endless misery; but such a work is foreign from my purpose.' If the one doctrine is to be rejected on the silence of the Old-Testament, so must the other; and when I believe one, I will be consistent, and believe both. Who has ever proved, that endless misery ought to be rejected on the authority of the silence of the Old-Testament, and on this same silent authority, the immortality of the soul, and its limited punishment after death, ought to be received? I have never seen this done, nor do I ever expect to see it done. I am compelled to reject both doctrines on this ground.

3. Jahn, Paley, and Campbell are quoted, to confirm what? To confirm Br. Montgomery's views, that endless misery is not taught in the Old-Testament, but that all the punishments mentioned there, are confined to the present life. But do any of the quotations prove, or confirm the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, or its limited punishment in an intermediate state? We do not think that this will be asserted. On the contrary, look at the quotations again, and see if they do not teach something very different. What does Dr. Campbell intimate, when he says—'It is plain that in the Old-Testament the most profound silence is observed, in regard to the state of the deceased, their joys or sorrows, happiness or misery.' Can it be believed, 'that in the Old-Testament, the most profound silence is observed, in regard to the state of the deceased,' if the writers knew that they had immortal souls which were either in a state of happiness or misery? Can this be believed? And if it is, on what Scripture authority is it believed? On the profound silence of Scripture! If not, on what else is it believed? And where are we to stop in believing doctrines, if it is right to believe such as the Bible does not teach? And why blame the Catholics for believing what the Church believes, merely on the Church's authority? If it can be proved from Scripture, let it be done. But who has ever done this?

Br. Montgomery goes on to say—'We have then come down to the age of Abram. Here a new light breaks in upon us, leading us away from the Scriptures, to new sources of information concerning the main object of this discourse. Between the time of Noah and Abram, who lived nearly two thousand years before Christ, the various forms of idolatrous religions sprang up.' He then quotes from Prideaux—'All the idolatry of the world was divided between two sects, that is, the worshippers of images, who were called the Sabeans, and the worshippers of fire, who were called the Magians.' After shewing that these two sects existed previous to the days of Abram, he adds—'The question to which our minds should be directed, is this, as in the Bible, from Adam to Abram, we find no language which shows that endless misery had its origin there, will it not be evident, that it must have had its origin in one of the idolatrous sects mentioned, if either of these sects, rising as they did, previous to the time of Abram, entertained such an opinion.' Br. M. puts these words in italic, and they are worthy of it: but they prove just as much against the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and a limited punishment after death, as they do against the doctrine of endless misery. I have only to use his own words, thus—'As in the Bible from Adam to Abram, we find no language which shows', that the immortality of the soul and its limited punishment after death, 'had its origin there, will it not be evident, that it must have had its origin in one of the idolatrous sects mentioned, if either of those sects, rising as they did, previous to the time of Abram, entertained such an opinion.'

Br. M. clearly traces the doctrine of endless misery to heathenism as its origin. And he makes the same quotations from Prideaux and Campbell, which I did in my books in proof of it, a number of years ago. But I did not stop at the half way house, ☞ LIMITED PUNISHMENT AFTER DEATH; I went on and shewed, that this and the immortality of the soul, were of heathen origin, as well as endless misery. See particularly my 'Essays' and 'Letters to Hudson.' May I not then ask, if orthodox people are in the mud of endless misery, are not Universalists in the mire of limited punishment, for both doctrines had their origin in heathenism?

Is it very fair then, or honorable in us, to be constantly exposing their error to the world, yet, as constantly winking at our own, and smoothing it over, as if was of no consequence? If we scourge them with a whip, ought they not to scourge us with scorpions, for our inconsistency? And who could very feelingly sympathise with us under our flagellation?

But I must think from the Sermon, that Br. M. does not believe in a limited punishment after death. He says, 'Be it remembered, that while endless misery is not true, yet it is true that vice cannot go unpunished.' But not the slightest intimation is given, that it is to be punished after death. On the contrary, the whole sermon intimates, the punishment is confined to this world, is in the earth. I cannot let myself suppose, that he believed it was in another world; yet, let such a fine opportunity slip, to warn men lest they should come into that place of torment. Or, that he is like some, who say they believe this doctrine, yet never preach it faithfully to their hearers. If I supposed any thing, it would be, that Br. M. perceived, that endless misery and limited punishment, were both of heathen origin; the one doctrine a modification of the other; but deemed it best to say nothing about this. But the day is anticipated, although I may not live to see it, when Universalists will have to say something about it, or stand charged with believing a heathen doctrine, as much as our orthodox brethren. They can now retaliate on us, 'physician heal thyself.'

Br. M. justly remarks—'I see a broad under-current, silent but sure, at its work among the sects, keeping them continually on the change, carrying them forward to the truth. Their creeds now save all infants—they now save all the heathen, who have not heard the name of Christ—they now save a majority of the professedly christian world—and they affirm, that the whole world may be saved if it will. They have not, they can not stop at this point—their way is onward, and will continue onward until, before they themselves are aware of it, the full blaze of truth will burst upon them with its noontide splendor.' Yes, this under-current is also at its work among Universalists. Only see what it has done within the last thirty years? Their way is onward. People will not long believe, that it is 'the full blaze of truth' to give up an endless hell, to believe in the limited hell of the Universalists. No such 'noontide splendor' could ever have made me a Universalist. Nor does it surprise me, that people made Universalists by this splendor, should return to their old, roaring, raging hell, of endless misery, for I should have returned myself. As a candid man I must say, I think this endless hell can be proved from the Bible, with as much plausibility as the limited, little hell of Universalists. The Catholics believe in both hells, the one for irreclaimable sinners, and the other for a better set of folks. But they are somewhat consistent, for they have prayers or masses for souls in purgatory, a thing wholly neglected by Universalists. When I believe in the one, I must believe in the other, for both are alike scriptural. At least, so thinks

W. BALFOUR.

What is your Faith?

This the question usually asked of those about to join a partialist Church; and if their faith is found to correspond with the creed, all is well, their names are duly recorded among the faithful. Very little attention is paid to works; the all-important essential to Church fellowship is a full profession of the creed. Common sins seem to lose their heinousness in the great zeal to promote the interest of a sect or party.

Now such a test we most seriously object to as having no countenance in the example of any Christian Church of the apostolic times. Not that a correct faith was not required, but the important requisite to Christian fellowship was good works. A man's faith then, did not save him from censure if he was guilty of wicked acts. But now things are conducted on different principles. A Church member can get in debt, ten thousand dollars or so, put his property out of his hands, fail, cheat his creditors, and by and by come out a rich man, and all the time retain his membership, particularly if he is liberal in his contributions to sustain the Church. Are not these facts well known to the community? Are not such men pointed to almost every week as examples of the fruits of Christianity, by Infidels? We do not admit them however, to be the fruits of the gospel. They are hypocrites who get into the Church by the easy method of subscribing to a creed; when if the true test had been applied to them, their conduct, and works, they would never have disgraced the christian name.

All Churches owe it to themselves and the cause of Christ, to countenance only such among them as endeavor to live as their Master lived, and to walk as he walked. Profession is nothing without possession. Faith is good, but charity is better—yea, it is much greater. The test of religious character must not be church membership even—a profession of faith, hope, long prayers or religious forms or ceremonies—but practical goodness. Let men be called when they act out religion in their lives; and not before. And let men not be received into Churches on profession merely, but on practice.—Star in the West.

Building on the Sand.

'And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell; and great was the fall of it.'—Matt. vii. 26, 27.

The fishermen of Bengal build their huts in the dry season, on the beds of sand from which the river has retired. When the rains set in, which they often do very suddenly, accompanied with violent northwest winds, the water pours down in torrents from the mountains. In one night, multitudes of these huts are frequently swept away, and the place where they stood is the next morning undiscernable. A traveller states,

'It so happened that we were to witness one of the greatest calamities that have occurred in Egypt, in the recollection of any one living. The Nile rose this season three feet and a half above the highest mark left by the former inundation, with uncommon rapidity, and carried off several villages, and some hundred of their inhabitants. I never saw any picture that could give a more correct idea of the deluge, than the valley of the Nile in this season. The Arabs had expected an extraordinary inundation this year, in consequence of the scarcity of water the preceding year; but they did not apprehend it would rise to such a height. They generally erect fences of earth and reeds round their villages, to keep the water from their houses; but the force of this inundation baffled all their efforts. Their cottages being built of earth, could not stand one instant against the current; and no sooner did the waves reach them, than it levelled them with the ground. The rapid stream carried off all that was before it; men, women, children, cattle, corn; every thing was washed away in an instant, and left the place where the village stood without anything to indicate that there had ever been a house on the spot.—Weekly Visiter.

The use of Snuff.

With that he thrust his hand into one of the large flaps of his waistcoat, drew out a ponderous gold box, extracted enough from it of a black-looking powder to have charged a musket, and crammed the dust up his left nostril. 'May I ask what that stuff is?' said the Chevalier; 'I have seen a great number of persons stopping their noses with something of the kind, as if this country was famous for bad smells, and they wanted to keep them out.' 'I will tell what it is, Chevalier,' said Mr. Longshanks, 'it is what we call snuff, the powder of a poisonous weed, which by this process is rendered very serviceable to our frailties. I have heard that you think us all mad, but this is a mistake; we are only foolish. This snuff gives a man something when he has nothing; spares many an empty head the trouble of making an answer; gives politicians, hypocrites, and knaves, time to compound a lie when they have not one ready; furnishes a wise look for a fool's face; enables men by a grimace to cover an emotion, and prevents people leading you by the nose, for fear of dirtying their fingers.—The Commissioner.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 7, 1843.

Universalism must prevail.

Listen unto us, all ye enemies of Universalism: listen unto us, all ye doubters, and weak hearted: listen unto us, ye indifferent, ye cold and frigid: we have one word to utter in your ears, and it seems to us as though we are specially commissioned from God to declare it—'The doctrine of Universalism WILL PREVAIL.' No opposition can put it down. Though all the hosts of darkness encamp around us to destroy, they cannot harm our cause. It is a citadel, a strong tower, that nothing can harm, if all be kept right within. It is built upon a rock, and 'the gates of hell cannot prevail against it.' Hear what God says to his servants. 'They shall fight against thee; but they shall not prevail against thee;—for I am with thee, saith the Lord, to deliver thee.' We must expect the enemy to fight,—not in an open and manly warfare, but in an unfair and underhand manner; but all his fighting will avail nothing. His weapons are harmless.

Or in words 'of higher authority,—'No weapon formed against thee shall prosper.' Isa. liv. 17. Universalists know all this: we feel it in our souls. We are sure, yes, we say we are SURE that Universalism cannot be put down. The creeds of men may rise and fall; but Universalism can never fall. See the outspread hosts.—They are all arrayed against us. Few only take Universalists by the hand and call them brethren. In the eyes of the world, we are poor, and miserable, and weak, and blind, and naked.—But in the spiritual sense we are not poor, we are not weak, we are not miserable: we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.' 'If God be for us, who can be against us?'

We have said that Universalism must prevail. Not by our efforts, but by the power of God. It is the doctrine of God. It is very easy to know what is God's doctrine, if you will but judge from God's rule. Hear, hear the Omnipotent. 'MY doctrine shall drop like the rain; MY speech shall distil like the dew.' Deut. xxxii. 2. Now, what doctrine is it that drops impartially, like the rain? Why, every body knows it is Universalism. And the rain refreshes; the dew is silent, but it is refreshing. Is this a good figure with which to represent eternal hell fire? No. Eternal hell fire refreshing! Who believes it?—That dreadful doctrine is not the doctrine of God, for God's doctrine refreshes like the dew. If this be not sufficient to convince, if there be any so hardened in unbelief that they can resist evidence so clear, we ask their attention to a few other considerations. God's work is to bring every thing into a blessed state. 'Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low: and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places, plain: and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed and all flesh shall see it together, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.' Isa. xl. 4, 5. This shows us what is God's doctrine. That doctrine which comes forth from his mouth is his doctrine, and must prevail. But again. The word of the Lord by the prophet is as follows: 'Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth, for I am God, and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength.' Isa. xlv. 22—24. Is not this God's doctrine? And if it is God's doctrine, it must prevail. It is like the rain not only because it is impartial, not only because it is refreshing, but because it will accomplish God's purpose; it will prosper in the thing whereto he sent it. The rain always fulfils the purpose of God; it always waters the earth, and causeth it to bring forth and bud that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater. And it is just so with God's doctrine. He says, (O hear the words,) 'So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it SHALL accomplish what I please, and it SHALL prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.' Isa. lv. 10, 11. This is what God says. And now what does he please? Is he not pleased to have men holy and happy? Is he not pleased to have all saved? Did not Paul say, 'God will have all men to be saved?' Does not God say, 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth'? Well, it shall be done, 'for the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it? and his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?' Isa. xiv. 27.

The doctrine of God must prevail. And this appears from a great variety of considerations besides those already named. This doctrine must prevail on earth, because it is congenial to the best feelings of the human soul. Benevolence can be satisfied with nothing else. The pious heart, filled with the love of God, prays for the salvation of all men,—the extinction of all sin, all unbelief, all doubt. No other doctrine can make men perfectly happy. Every contrary sentiment has a sting, and the soul that embraces it is tortured. Now the Bible speaks of 'a perfect peace,' a 'fulness of joy,' a 'joy that is unspeakable and full of glory.' Will the doctrine of endless sin and misery afford you this? No, you might as reasonably expect to 'gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles.' Nothing will give it to you but a full and free salvation. Those who believe in Partialism are not made happy by it. It is a bitter draught; bitter as hemlock, and just as fatal. All men want peace. The soul pants for it; it seeks rest. The heart that strays away from this doctrine, longs to come back again.

> Wand'ring swallows long
> To find their wonted rest.

Under these circumstances, who can doubt that Universalism will prevail? It must prevail.

We have seen this doctrine is consistent with the nature and purpose of God, and with the nature of regenerated man. The more a man is like God, the more he loves salvation; the more he is filled with love, the more he pants for the salvation of others. But the sentiment of which we speak, not only agrees with the moral nature of man in its highest state of cultivation, in its nearest approximation to the Deity, but it agrees also with his intellectual nature. His reason approves it. God encourages us to exercise our reason, when he says, 'Come now and let us reason together.' Our reason is of the same nature with his, or else we could not reason together.

Does not Universalism agree with enlightened reason? Who ever thought of answering nay to this question? It is reasonable. Men know it is reasonable. What less than the happiness of all human beings can we infer from the exalted perfections of the Highest? He is infinite in power, and can do as he please. He is infinite in wisdom, and can never err in judgment. He is infinite in love, (O this is best of all,) and can never do wrong; never inflict an unnecessary pang; never rest in pain as a result. Universalism then, and that only, is agreeable to the enlightened reason of man. Now, will men always be fighting against their own reason? Will creeds opposed to human reason always have dominion? It cannot be, and therefore Universalism must prevail. As light increases, as knowledge fills the earth, as the Bible becomes better understood, as men are delivered from the thraldom of creeds, and tyrannical ecclesiastical associations, they will turn to this doctrine,—they are turning to it every day.

What then is all the opposition of man? What will the labor of that pigmy, Luther Lee, effect? or the labors of Stuart, and Hatfield, and Parsons Cooke, and Knapp, and the whole host of the aliens? What hurt will renunciations do us? The chaff must be separated from the wheat.—Let all the Judases go. Perhaps they are not all gone yet. Let them go. Throw all the Jonahs overboard. The good old ship will outlive the storm. It is the ark of safety. Every thing else will perish, but Universalism will prevail. And at last, when death and hell have done their worst, all men shall be gathered around the throne of God to sing his deathless praise. Amen.

Christmas at Cambridgeport.

We must not forget the services in this place. Duty called us away, or we should have been present and participated in the joys of the occasion. After the very profitable exercises of the morning and afternoon by the Pastor, the Sunday School services were performed in the evening. An immense audience was present, filling the Chapel completely, even to the aisles and entries. The exercises of this school have always been popular, and they are sure to bring an overwhelming body of listeners. On this occasion the school sustained its high character, and reflected honor, not only on the speakers, but on the Superintendent, and all the young ladies and gentlemen who have the charge of the school.

> My tongue repeats her vows,
> Peace to this sacred house,
> For here my friends and kindred dwell;
> And since my glorious God,
> Makes thee his blest abode,
> My soul shall ever love thee well.

The Catholic attack upon us.

We ventured to publish an article of a dozen lines a few weeks since in regard to the secret measures which were being pursued, to induce the Legislature to make indemnification for the Convent. Our own view is, that this business ought to be done openly and above board. Let there be no manœuvring. But because we will not bow and cringe, and say all is right, the Catholic paper of this city, called the 'Pilot,' has come down upon us in great wrath. It has searched its vocabulary for offensive phrases.—The 'Trumpet' is 'eminent for its stupidity,' and for 'its crude and unchristian bigotries.' It 'twaddles;' its editor is an 'ass.' He is a 'feeble author' of 'limited capacity;' the article we published is 'very ridiculous.' We are declared to be 'unable to comprehend the higher elements of political justice;' and Universalists are stigmatized as a body.

So much for the spirit of the Catholic editor.—We would that he had been more amiable and kind, and thereby set us an example that it would have been safe and pleasant for us to follow.

For the want of room, we must defer further remarks until next week, when we will give the Catholic article in full.

Rev. Robinson Breare.

We have before noticed this excellent brother. He is a convert from Methodism, a truly intelligent and warm-hearted man. He is no evanescent, popularity-seeking professor, but a man of integrity, who will, should his life be spared, be of vast advantage to the cause of truth. He is on a visit to this country, for the purpose of asking aid of the brethren to enable the Society of Universalists, in Halifax, N. S. to erect a meeting house. They will do all they can, but they need a little aid. Universalists will do well, we think, to consider his case, or rather their case. Let us extend a helping hand to them.

Br. Breare will preach on the third Sabbath in this month in the Second Universalist Meeting-House in this city, School-street. We bespeak for him the kind attention of the Universalists of Boston, who may not yet have administered to his wants. He is a pleasing and profitable preacher.

Capital Punishment.

What a reproach to a Christian country is the unnecessary taking of human life. And is not life often taken unnecessarily? There is an anecdote of a certain traveller, who let slip a severe shaft of irony. After having visited many countries, he was at length shipwrecked upon an unknown coast, where neither the footstep nor habitation of man was to be seen. In this situation, he and his companion in distress took their course as chance directed, in search of shelter, and to obtain succor. They travelled all day, and towards night came in view of a gibbet, on which hung a couple of human beings, at the sight of which the pious traveller exclaimed,—'Thank God, we are in a Christian land! I know it by this sign well enough.'

Christmas at East-Bradford.

We had a glorious Christmas meeting at East-Bradford, Mass. on Sunday, 25th ult. The audience was very large, especially in the afternoon and evening. Services were held in the Methodist Meeting-House. There seemed to be an insatiable desire to receive the truth, and many from other sects were present in the evening.—We hope the labors of the day will result in good.

It seems to us there are Universalists enough in this parish to constitute a regular Society with regular preaching, at least half of the time.—Brethren, think of these things.

Ladies' Repository.

The 'Ladies' Repository' for January was on our table a week ago. It is a welcome visitor. The present number falls not below its predecessors. Br. H. Bacon is editor, assisted by a large number of valuable correspondents. Let the Repository be well sustained.

Rev. Luther Lee's last movement.

Rev. Luther Lee has withdrawn from the Methodist Episcopal Church. His formal renunciation appears in a paper entitled 'The True Wesleyan.' We give a few extracts. He commences by saying,—

A philosopher once said, 'It is no matter how often a man changes his opinion, if he can render a good reason for so doing.' By this article, and from this date, I withdraw from the Methodist Episcopal Church; and whether my reasons are good and sufficient to justify such a step, I cheerfully submit to the judgment of an enlightened christian public. I have been a member of her communion more than twenty-one years, rising of sixteen of which have been spent in the ministry, with what success others must judge, subject to the corrections of the last judgment in the light of eternity. But whatever success may be awarded me, I have not the least doubt that all who have known me will testify, that, at least during the most of those years, I labored for the upbuilding of the institutions of the church of my choice, with a zeal and unremitted effort worthy only of a good cause. Under such circumstances, I have no doubt that strong reasons will be required, and justly required, for such a change; and whatever may be thought of the reasons rendered, they are such as have forced the alternative upon my own mind, to take this step, or cease to be an honest man. To give my reasons in detail would require a volume, which I have disposition to impose upon the reader; I shall therefore content myself with the presentation of a mere outline of the principles and facts involved.

Mr. Lee then proceeds to allege, that the Methodist Church has made herself responsible for the system of American slavery; that one of the bishops has attempted to prove, that it is justifiable under some circumstances by the golden rule; for Bishop Hedding has said, 'The right to hold a slave is founded on this rule, 'Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them, for this is the law and prophets.' How Bishop Hedding could have made such a statement, we cannot divine. Slavery is directly opposed to the golden rule; and we do not blame Mr. Lee, for objecting to such reasoning.

He also alleges, that he withdraws from the Methodist Episcopal Church, on account of its form of government, which he declares to be aristocratical, arbitrary, partial and unjust.

I have always known that the government of the church was aristocratical in its form and principles, and the greatest 'logical wonders' with which I have ever met, have been some few efforts to prove that it is republican or democratic. I know that no church, nor any class of persons in a church, has or can have a right to legislate contrary to the law of Christ, but there are many prudential rules which may be enacted to suit times and circumstances; and that the body of the laity should have no voice in making these rules, even such of them as more immediately concern themselves, I have always viewed as extremely arbitrary in principle; and that every congregation throughout the denomination should be dependent, absolutely so, on the will of an individual for the man who shall preach to them the word of life; and that every minister in the connection should be also absolutely dependent unto the judgment or will of one man, for his field of labor, who has power to say whether he shall labor in the sigh-burdened rice swamps of the South, along the shores of the distant Sabine, or in the North, by the cold waters of the St. Lawrence, I never did believe liberal in principle. But I formerly looked upon these arbitrary principles as existing only in form, and my reply has always been, when attacked on the ground of the arbitrary character of our church polity, that there was no oppression in fact,—that though the government was arbitrary in principle, yet the piety, good sense and kind feelings of the bishops and preachers, secure a liberal administration. But I can no longer silence the arguments of others, or the voice of my own judgment, with this plea;—an occasion has arisen, those arbitrary principles have been roused from their slumber, this lion of power has roared and leaped from his lair in vindication, not only of his own claims, but also in vindication of slavery itself.

This it will be seen is a regular revolt against the government of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Lee's closing reason for withdrawing is as follows:

A third and final reason which I shall now render, for dissolving my connection with the M. E. Church, is the uncharitable and bitter spirit which is manifested on the part of the adherents of the church, and of her official organs, towards their dissenting brethren. Whenever a brother has presumed to utter an opinion on the subject of church polity, differing from the common views, instead of meeting his views with sound Christian arguments to convince him of his error, the usual method has been to denounce him at once as an enemy, and assail his moral character. It is a matter of history that the advocates of our present form of government have not relied upon the strength of their arguments, to put down more liberal views that have occasionally manifested themselves in the church, as upon the force of constitutional law vigorously administered. Even since the secession of B.s. Horton, Scott and Sunderland, it has been insisted by some that they should be treated as traitors, and be excluded from the pulpits of the church, while others are admitted who have always held views less in accordance with the common standards of the church. They have already been assailed as being 'sordid' in their purposes; as being under the influence of 'unhallowed ambition;' as making 'not an honest effort;' as being 'iniquitous' in their proceedings; and by two different papers in the interest of the church, have the words which inspiration has applied to the self-willed, cruel and murderous, been applied to these brethren, whose offence is that of withdrawing from the church after they have been long abused in it and after being often told by the same journals that, with their views, they ought to leave it.—This is an extravagance of intolerance which I cannot bear. To think of retaining my standing in the church, and at the same time honestly meet and rebuke this intolerant spirit, wherever I shall meet with it, is hopeless; and to remain in the church by silently enduring it, and thereby appearing to approve of what I abhor and detest, would not only require an entire change in my constitution and temperament, but also a sacrifice of my principles to a selfish, cowardly, worldly policy. If others are prepared to make such sacrifices, I am not; and in saying this, I intend no impeachment of the motives of others, but only a vindication of my own. I leave behind many whom I highly respect and most ardently love. With many of them I have labored and suffered; but now a sense of duty compels me, so far as church relation is concerned, to separate myself from them,—and I trust I do it in the fear of God with an eye single to his glory, and in hope of eternal life.

Providence, R. I.

There was a grand celebration by the Universalist Sabbath School in Providence, on Christmas Eve. A large auditory were in attendance, and the services took up about four hours, during the whole of which time the utmost silence and attention prevailed. The 'Messenger' says,

'Near sixty recitations were listened to, interspersed with the singing of nine hymns, and a trio, and a solo, by members of the school. The scholars who took part in the recitations, acquitted themselves very much to their own honor and the credit of the school, and the singing spoke well for the unremitting efforts bestowed in the preparation by Charles Carpenter. Every body was delighted with the services of the youthful choir. It would be decidedly wrong to try to single out and specially commend the scholars who recited best, and there is no need of it, as tastes will differ and all did well. We are perfectly satisfied. Seven of the hymns were original.'

Great Meeting at Marblehead.

There was a great meeting at Marblehead on Thursday of last week—a Conference Meeting; not a legislative assembly; no Moderator; no resolutions to divide the brethren; but a pure, holy, fervent Conference Meeting, or rather a series of Conference Meetings.

Having received a very kind and brotherly invitation to be present, we went down on Wednesday evening. The train arrived at quarter past seven, and we went immediately to the vestry of the Universalist Church, where the brethren and sisters were engaged in their regular weekly Conference Meeting. They were singing, 'The morning light is breaking,' as we entered. The large vestry was full; many were obliged to stand, especially around the door. We thought there must have been from two to three hundred present. The speaking was done principally by laymen. One sister spoke. We shall not here enter into any inquiry as to the scriptural directions in respect to females speaking in public; but we must say that the lady who for a few moments addressed this assembly, convinced us that she had a deep love of truth,—a heart warmed and purified by its power, and a clear understanding. Her words were fitly spoken.

On Thursday morning at half past ten, we proceeded to the house of God in company with Br. Atkinson the pastor, and to our surprise the Temple was filled and the services had commenced. Br. Austin, of Danvers, had arrived and was leading the meeting. The time was taken up with alternate speaking and singing. The great object of all who spoke seemed to be to discountenance every species of wickedness,—to warn men against sin and its consequences,—to show the excellency of Universalism, and urge professors thereof to live according to godliness. The incompatibility of this doctrine with a bad life was especially dwelt upon. Thus passed the morning service.

In the afternoon the Meeting-House was greatly crowded. We forgot to remark that it had been beautifully trimmed for Christmas, with spruce and evergreen. The decorations displayed great taste; and on the front of the gallery, in ornamental letters, appeared the angelic annunciation, 'FEAR NOT, FOR BEHOLD I BRING YOU GOOD TIDINGS OF GREAT JOY, WHICH SHALL BE TO ALL PEOPLE.' We know not whether the ladies or gentlemen did all this; but it was WELL done. We must speak, however, of the afternoon services. Br. Everett had arrived from Salem, and nearly four hundred persons from that town, in an extra train. The brethren and sisters came, from Lynn, Danvers, and some other towns. There was a great gathering. We cannot describe the holy joy of this meeting. It seemed as if every heart was filled with bliss.—The ministers and laymen spoke, a large proportion of the latter; the grey-haired professors spoke, and tears run down their wrinkled cheeks; the young men spoke of the goodness of God, and their obligations to love and serve him. Every eye and ear was open. The duty of self-examination was enforced; and the gospel, as exemplified in the character of Jesus, was commended to all as the rule by which we should guide our future lives. This meeting was closed by a most heart touching prayer, from the ardent lips of one of the lay brethren of that town.

The meeting in the evening was notified for six o'clock. We went fifteen minutes before the time; but although so early, what a jam! Every aisle was packed full. But still the eager crowd kept pressing, urging, entreating for entrance.—Every expedient was devised to get them in.—The people seemed to stand in pyramids in the corners of the house. The desk was crowded with young men. It was an imposing spectacle. Services began with prayer, as usual. Then came singing, and experiences and exhortation. Several who had been in the bonds of error spoke:—they had groped in darkness,—they had been filled with anguish in believing in endless damnation; but God had opened their eyes, and revealed himself, and now they were at peace. Persons who were not there cannot imagine the interest of this service. Br. Everett gave a very powerful, judicious and thorough call upon the indifferent and careless to consider the scriptural doctrine of the new birth, and to open their hearts to the influences of truth. We were much pleased with two men advanced in life, Brs. Story and Darling, hardy sons of the Ocean. They spoke with power. We shall never doubt after this that an old sailor can be a religious man. They touched us to the very heart. 'Go on,' 'go on,' they said to the young. 'Persevere in goodness. Live according to the doctrine, &c.'

We closed about nine; but the people did not get all out of the house until ten, spending the time in singing and conversation.

O Marblehead! you will always look more beautiful to us after this. Let all our societies imitate the example of our friends in this town, and they must prosper. There is a deep and abiding interest in the regular Conference Meetings there.

It is proposed to have a similar meeting at So. Danvers ere long. Should the day be fair, the crowd will be immense. We mean to be there, if possible.

In Marblehead, Salem, Danvers and Lynn, there is a powerful revival of pure religion. O may it spread every where.

Acts of the Elders, &c.

We acknowledge the reception of a work, from the pen of Br. A. Norwood, entitled 'Acts of the Elders, or Book of Abraham,' &c. &c. The 'Messenger' says, 'The work is at once doctrinal, argumentative, biographical, historical, pleasant, humorous, it is unique.' It is written in the style of the sacred Scriptures, and gives accounts of the interviews and conversations which its author had with his religious neighbors around him.

Agency.

Br. Benj. K. Hovey, is our Agent in East-Bradford, Mass. Those half a dozen persons who wish to receive the 'Trumpet,' will please call on him and subscribe. His receipt will be sufficient.

Beware.

Universalists, beware of a new publication begun in New Haven, entitled the 'New Englander.' From the name, you might be led to expect a literary and miscellaneous work, that should maintain a neutrality on the subject of religion. But, beware, it is venomous with opposition to Universalism. We have no objection you should read it; but do not subscribe for it under a misapprehension.

Hope in the hour death.

There is no fact more evident, than that the believers of endless misery, in view of approaching death, flee to the great principles of Universalism for consolation. They never derive any joy from those features of their creeds, in the belief of which they differ from Universalists; but always from the pure principles of the gospel, on which the doctrine of Universalism is based. In looking over an old paper, we found a notice of the death of Rev. Stephen Dexter, a Baptist clergyman, at Corinth, Me. The following extract shows the source from which he drew his consolation, in the view of speedy dissolution:

His last illness was long and distressing, but he bore it with christian patience and resignation. In the former part of his confinement, he seemed rather desirous to be able to preach Christ to perishing sinners; but when he became convinced that his disease was incurable, he was tranquil and happy in the prospect of departing and being with Christ. In conversation with a friend some months previous to his death, he said he had longed at times for many years, to see Jesus, but had sometimes feared that his faith would not support him in death. Said she when you die you will see Jesus, that you have so long wished to see. A few weeks subsequent to this he said, 'O the sweetness of those words, they have remained sweet to me ever since.'—'O the sweet thought to see Jesus and be with him and sin no more.' As his outward man decayed, his inner man seemed strengthening day by day, and his hopes brightening for immortality beyond the grave. A few days before his death, he said to a friend who had called on him, 'I shall not probably live more than two days longer;' and on being told that it would be far better with him, 'O,' said he, 'I long to go; I want to go to-day.' He dwelt with peculiar pleasure on the love of God. 'God is love,' seemed ever to fill him with joy unspeakable and full of glory. His spirit left its clayey tenement on the Sabbath, and thus with a song of triumph in his mouth, he entered a Sabbath of eternal rest.

Did he gain any joy from his faith in endless torment? No. This was the faith which he was afraid 'would not support him in death.' So far as his faith agreed with that of Universalists, he had comfort; but no further. 'O the sweet thought to see Jesus, and be with him, and sin no more.' Again he said, 'O! I long to go; I want to go to-day.' And mark, 'he dwelt with peculiar pleasure on THE LOVE OF GOD. GOD IS LOVE, seemed ever to fill him with joy unspeakable and full of glory.' Now, we appeal to the reader, whether this man's joy did not arise from the great principles of Universalism, viz. the love of God, and the prospect of being free from sin in eternity. It is well known that, in some points, all sects agree with Universalists; and these are always regarded by them as the precious points of their faith; and when they flee to their faith, in the hour of approaching death for hope and joy, it is only from the portion of it to which we refer, viz. the love of God and Christ, and the hope of a sinless immortality, that supports and sustains them. Reader, you need no further evidence to convince you, that Universalism is above all things to be prized in the hour of death.

The Cause in Salem, Mass.

We have intimated in another article, that the cause of universal grace is highly prosperous in Salem and vicinity. There is an increased attention to religion among all classes, among all the religious Societies, but especially among the Universalists. This interest is manifested in increased attendance upon the regular exercises of the sanctuary, in overflowing Conference meetings, in the prayers and exhortations of the brethren, in their resolutions to lead more upright and holy lives in future, and in the resolution to make a public profession of Christ and his cause. A few Sabbaths since twelve were admitted to the communion of the Universalist Church. Last Sabbath fifty-five came forward for admission, a large number of whom were baptized. It was a happy day—the scene was thrilling! It is supposed a much larger number will be admitted on the next communion day. Br. Everett has been unceasing in his efforts for the cause of truth. In the midst of the torrent of abuse poured out by Elder Knapp upon Universalists, (and they have been represented as the vilest of all creation,) they have made no unkind return; but have kept on in the way of their duty, exhorting one another to love and good works, and the Lord has blessed them. We congratulate them on their great success. Let them persevere, and they will live and prosper, when those who have opposed them in wrath and envy will be forgotten, or remembered but to be lamented.

Gloom---Endless Misery.

We looked into a paper a few days since, called the 'Christian Herald,' and we were struck with a singular fact developed there. In one column was a long article designed to prove the doctrine of endless misery. It asserted, with great vehemence, that a part of the human race will be eternally damned. In an adjoining column, was an article persuading christians not to be gloomy.—The author exhorts men to be happy, joyful, even to 'shout aloud for joy.' How men can be happy who believe in endless sin and misery, is past our comprehension. Certain preachers declare that they wish men to be happy; and yet they constantly preach a doctrine which must make men miserable. We advise them to banish that doctrine at once.

New Papers.

Several new Universalist papers have been begun lately in different parts of the United States. There are now, if we remember correctly, 2 in Maine; 1 in New-Hampshire; 1 in Vermont; 5 in Massachusetts; 1 in Rhode-Island; 1 in Connecticut; 3 in New-York; 1 in Pennsylvania; 1 in Virginia; 1 in Ohio; 1 in Indiana and 1 in Illinois; making TWENTY in all. And yet the brethren are disposed to publish new papers.—Well, we say, come on. Competition is the life of business. Every new paper we think does some good. It takes away a few subscribers from the older papers; but it goes into many a family to which the older never did go. We will not repine at the getting up of new papers. The risk of loss is not on the old proprietors, but the new; and if they suffer, they will not ask us to compensate them. So we say again,—the field is open, come on.

We have received a copy of the American Text Book for Letters, with a diagram of the Capital Script Alphabet, of twenty-six letters, invented, and written by Nath'l Dearborn. Mr. Dearborn is the publisher of this work. As a specimen of copperplate engraving, it seems to us, nothing can excel it. The title page is inimitable.—Teachers of writing will find this a very useful work.

Dr. Channing not a Universalist.

The following communication from the pen of Br. S. P. Landers, of Worcester, has reference to a subject which we think is not generally understood. It has been said by many that Dr. Channing was a Universalist. That he avowed the principles from which the doctrine of Universalism flows, there can be no doubt. Consistently with those principles he could not advocate any other doctrine than Universalism. But he did not by name avow that sentiment. He never appeared so great a man to us as he did to some, for the reason, either that he did not believe a conclusion to which his own premises led, or else he hesitated to avow what he did believe. There was no moral greatness in the manner in which he avowed Unitarianism, twenty years ago, being driven out, by opponents, after long concealment. If the Dr. had a mind, which could see the inevitable conclusions that flowed from his own premises, he must have believed Universalism. If he did believe that doctrine, and would not avow it, it was not honest. If he did not believe it, then he failed to see the results of his own reasoning. Dr. Channing was a pretty writer. His style was chaste and perspicious, but by no means nervous and forcible. In his theology he was not clear on all points. We do not mean to condemn him because he did not agree with us, but because he did not agree with himself. In reading his writings we have often felt as if the truth was about to burst out in full glory; and then we were doomed to disappointment. The following is Br. Landers' communication.

Some few weeks since there was introduced in the 'Trumpet' two extracts from a sermon on the life and character of Dr. Channing, by Rev. Mr. Hedge, pastor of the Unitarian Society, in Bangor, Me., in which we find remarks favoring the idea that the lamented Dr. believed in the final salvation of all mankind. This may have been his belief in the last years of his life, but in his writings he has certainly denied his belief in the final salvation of all, or rather he has not stated that he thus believed. In his discourse on sin, future punishment, &c. he says, 'I have spoken of the pains and penalities of moral evil, or of wrong-doing, in the world to come. How long they will endure, I know not. Whether they will issue in the reformation or happiness of the sufferer, or will terminate in the extinction of his conscious being, is a question on which scripture throws no clear light. Plausible arguments may be adduced in favor of both these doctrines. On this and other points revelation aims not to give any precise information, but to fix in us a deep impression that great suffering awaits a disobedient, wasted, immoral, irreligious life.'

Whether the Dr. ever contradicted these sentiments or not, I am unable to say, but there is one thing certain, that they are very far from Universalism. S. P. LANDERS.

Renunciations of Universalism.

There is no doubt that there is some chaff among the wheat. It is being sifted out; and the quicker it is all gone, the better. If men do not love the truth, they will renounce it. But the world knows full well, that renunciations have been almost altogether in favor of Universalism. The preponderance tends that way. So that if renunciations of a doctrine prove it false, endless misery has been proved false beyond all question. Look at the following article from the 'Gospel Banner.'

We feel disposed just to give the public a list of orthodox ministers—likely men, that were never dealt with for any immoralities,—who have within the last five years only, renounced the doctrine of endless misery, and who have embraced and now preach the glorious and heavenly Bible truth of universal redemption and salvation through Jesus Christ the Redeemer and Saviour of the world. We do not pretend to give the names of all the orthodox clergymen who have renounced their errors for our truth, as we have no means of ascertaining them all; but we give such a list as we are able to collect by a few minutes reference to the facts. Let our limitarian friends look here and see how common a thing it is for their sensible and honest preachers to embrace Universalism, and not again taunt us because once in a great while some weak minded or unworthy minister in our ranks is induced to leave the fountains of truth to drink at the muddy pools of orthodoxy.

Rev. T. Clowes, D. D., LL. D., Episcopalian, Hampstead, L. I.
J. Haskell, Baptist, Vermont.
B. Boebe, Congregationalist, Farmington.
B. Johnson, Methodist, Ohio.
J. A. Bartlett, Methodist, Portland, Me.
Joseph Smith, Methodist, Columbus, Geo.
L. Chase, Baptist, Stephentown, N. Y.
N. Holder, Baptist, Lynn, Ms.
B. F. Newhall, Methodist, Saugus, Ms.
L. C. Todd, Presbyterian, New-York.
W. Atkinson, Methodist, Cincinnati.
P. Runnells, F. W. Baptist, Macon, Geo.
H. Sample, Presbyterian, Georgia.
J. Clark, Baptist, Wilmington, O.
E. C. Rogers, Southington, Con.
R. Breare, Methodist, Halifax, N. S.
M. P. Fisher, Methodist, Brownsport, Ten.
C. Langdon, Methodist, Ohio.
J. Fisher, Baptist, Ohio.
E. Rollins, Ch. Baptist, Lebanon, Con.
J. H. Sawyer, Methodist, Falmouth.

These are but a sample of the numerous conversions to the doctrine of God's universal grace and salvation, by respectable clergymen of other denominations, within the past four or five years. We have no means of knowing the whole extent of such cases. Nor does this list embrace some three or four erratic geniuses, such as E. N. Harris, S. Turner and M. H. Smith, who have been off and on several times. We believe the above cases of conversion are gentlemen whose characters were unblemished in the denominations they have left, men who embraced our doctrine as the result of investigation, and who, consequently, now 'stand fast in the liberty,' and zealously preach the truth.

We could extend this list if we were to go behind the recent date of the above. At present we will give a few additional names of Universalist preachers, even within the State of Maine, who formerly belonged to limitarian churches:

S. Stetson, Congregationalist, Brunswick.
T. Beede, Congregationalist, Farmington.
J. Woodman, Baptist, N. Gloucester.
M. McFarland, F. W. Baptist, Montville.
S. Russell, Ch. Baptist, Cambridge.
R. Fales, Congregationalist.
G. Smith, Baptist, N. Portland.
S. Fletcher, Baptist, Orland.

And then out of Maine, how many are there not? and men of great service too.

H. Ballou, Baptist, Boston.
W. Balfour, Baptist, Charlestown.
S. Brimblecom, Unitarian, Barre.
T. G. Farnsworth, Baptist, New Bedford.
T. Jones, Methodist, Gloucester.
S. Streeter, Baptist, Boston.
A. C. Thomas, Quaker, Brooklyn.
C. F. Lefevre, Episcopalian, Hudson.
M. Rayner, Episcopalian, New York.
T. J. Sawyer, Baptist, New York.

We do not regard the fact, that a man changes his belief, as any evidence that his new opinions are true; but as far as such evidence goes, we are prepared to join issue with the Baptists or any other denomination, and as often as they will find a case of one Universalist renouncing, we will find five orthodox renouncing in favor of Universalism.

We will be very much obliged to any of our subscribers who receive their papers by carriers, to give us early notice of any failures in the distribution. It is our intention to employ faithful and competent agents for this purpose; and if they are not so, we wish to know it, that we may employ better. If it lies in our power, our subscribers shall be regularly supplied.

Ordination.

Br. James Whittier, late of Amesbury, Mass., was ordained at Union, Me., on Wednesday, the 21st of December. Br. Whittier, says in the 'Banner.'

Although the morning was dull and cloudy, and gave indications of a storm, yet at the appointed hour, a large congregation had assembled. Our church was nearly filled with devout and attentive listeners. The ordination services were attended to in the morning agreeably to appointment. The order of exercises was as follows:

Reading of the Scriptures.
Invocation, Br. H. C. Leonard.
Sermon, Br. J. T. Gilman.
Ordaining Prayer, Br. N. C. Fletcher.
Charge &c. by the same.
Right Hand of Fellowship, Br. Leonard.
Address to the Society, Br. Fletcher.
Benediction, by the Pastor.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

The new Meeting-House for the Universalists in this place is going rapidly forward. It is to stand on the corner of Fulton and Pineapple Sts. It will cost about $10,000 besides the site, which cost about $8,500. It is in the very heart of the city, so that the stores in the basement will rent at a high rate, and add greatly to the income of the Society.

Removal.

Br. E. H. Lake has removed to Middleton, Mass. where he will labor with the Universalist Society, and supply destitute places in the region round about. His friends will address him at that place, (Middleton, Mass.)

The Boston 'Atlas,' and the 'Daily Advertiser' both published an article against us on the Convent question. We copied their article in full, and asked them kindly to publish our reply. But neither of them has seen fit to do so. Is this the fair thing?

Meeting on Capital Punishment.

There will be a meeting in this city, on the fourth Wednesday in January, (the 25th) at 10 o'clock, A. M. to discuss the subject of Capital Punishment with reference to its abolition. All those who take an interest in the subject are invited to attend.

The place will be named next week.

This is an important meeting.

Dr. Clowes proposed work of Criticism.

Br. Whittemore,—In answer to a few inquiries submitted to him by Br. U. Clark, of New York, Dr. Clowes, late an Episcopalian clergyman of high standing, in the 'Companion' for 1843, says,—'I wish, however, that our friends, who feel an interest in this subject, may be apprised, that it is my intention to collect complete lists of all words in the original Scriptures, which have, or are supposed to have, the sense of duration, and to publish them with proper observations in a separate treatise.'

Now, I have made this quotation and ask you to publish it to stir up the Dr.'s mind, and to acquaint him with the sensible expectation which he has aroused in one mind at least. I rejoiced when I saw this announcement, and I know I shall rejoice still more if I am permitted to read such a work from the Doctor's gifted pen. I hope he is now busily engaged in the preparation of the work, and that we may very soon add it to our libraries. There is plenty of room for him and Father Balfour without occupying each other's ground. I feel myself greatly indebted to the last named gentleman for the information I have derived concerning the Scriptures, in studying his learned and critical works. And my feelings are such that had I silver and gold, I would use them freely in easing him and his down the declivity of life to the tomb. May a consciousness that he has contributed largely to the freedom of the mind from dreadful error, sustain and comfort him in this the evening of his days. O, God, may he be very precious in thy sight.

There, Br. Whittemore, I began with one servant of God and end with another. And while I would 'hope and quietly wait' for the 'Crown of life,' (by J. B. D.) I would kindly ask Dr. Clowes not to let there be any unnecessary delay in the before-mentioned book. H. J.

Suggested on hearing a Sermon at East-Bradford, Mass. on Sunday, Dec. 25th, from Luke ii. 14.

Fear not, ye shepherds: for behold,
Tidings of joy I bring,
To all the world the grace hath come,
Let earth hosannas sing.

In David's ancient town at length,
(Hail! hail! thou happy morn!)
Emmanuel, the Prince of Peace,
The Saviour, Christ, is born.

The angel scarce had ceased to tell
His wondrous tale of love,
When lo! a bright and numerous choir
Came from the courts above.

Glory to God, (their song began,)
Who formed this wondrous plan,
Peace and good will, and love and joy,
To all the sons of men. C**.

Lynn, Dec. 26, 1842.

Br. Whittemore,—A most interesting death having recently taken place in our midst, I send you an account thereof for insertion in the Trumpet, as I think that no one can read it and meditate upon it without being made better. It is one of those cases of the morally sublime, which the christian loves to witness. Can any thing compare with it? The weary spirit calmly waiting for the time of its flight back to its native home! O, blessed, thrice blessed scene! 'In such a frame as this, my willing soul would stay.'

In Lynn, the 14th ult. Mrs. Susan W. wife of Joseph P. Woodbury, aged 26. In the death of Mrs. W. we have another evidence of the sustaining power of a glorious trust in the precious promises of our heavenly Parent. It was feared by some of her friends that death when he came would appear to her as a king of terrors (she being naturally of a rather nervous temperament), but all their fears were most happily dispelled.—As death drew near he appeared disrobed of all his terror, and to her departing spirit he was none other than a kind messenger of love sent to bear her to her heavenly home. A few minutes before her death she called for her husband. He came to her bedside and took her extended hand in his. She looked in his face and calmly asked 'Do you think I am dying?' He intimated to her that he thought she was. She then said, 'It is what I have been expecting.' She put her arms around his neck and kissed him, and said, 'She felt happy and reconciled.' She also spoke of their soon meeting again, where separation is unknown; requested him to wear her miniature, also, to take good care of little Joseph Warren, their only remaining child, who was then feeble, and has since followed his mother, gave some directions relative the disposal of her wearing apparel, &c. Her husband and the relatives and friends were weeping around her, yet she appeared calm and resigned, and her mind clear and bright as when in health. Thus was she supported in this trying moment, by a faith in the glorious promises of God. Sweetly and gently did she fall to sleep as the mild rays of the setting sun fade in the west, to wake in His likeness who made her dying bed soft as a downy pillow. May the husband and all that now mourn her loss, be blessed with that true consolation which the gospel alone can give.

Lines

On the death of Mary E. Ellis, who died Dec. 24th. 1842, aged 9 weeks and 3 days.

And art thou gone? and is it true
Thy features I no more may view?
That placid smile was on thy brow,
E'en when in death thou wast laid low.

Thy loss thy weeping parents mourn,
Death's iron grasp has from them torn
That image which was ever dear;
Ah! it has cost them many a tear.

Short was the stay of her we mourn,
For Jesus took the angel home;
Her body rests beneath the sod,
But her pure spirit dwells with God.

Fond parents, let thine eyes be dry,
For still your loved one lives on high,
Her voice to songs of praise is given,
Amid the angelic hosts of Heaven. J.M.W.

General Intelligence.

The Mutiny Case. The Court of Inquiry in this case assembled on board the North Carolina last week. Commodore Charles Stewart, President, Com. Jacob Jones, Associate. Com. Alex. J. Dallas, do.—Hon. Ogden Hoffman, Special Judge Advocate. After administering the oath to the Judge Advocate, the Court proceeded to business, by the Judge Advocate's reading the instructions convening the Court, and under which they were to proceed—taking all the evidence and making up a final opinion and reporting the whole to the Secretary of the Navy, &c.

The Court then received from Commander Mc Kenzie, who was present, a request to have a legal friend present as his adviser, which was granted At this period of the proceedings the President of the Court stated that some important official papers had not reached him, which were required for the proceedings, and upon his suggestion the Court adjourned over one day.

Commander—McKenzie; Lieutenant—Gauesvoort; Sailing Master—M. C. Perry; Assistant Surgeon—R. W. Lincock; Midshipmen—Henry Rodgers, Egbert Thomson, C. W. Hayes; Acting Midshipmen—A. Delonde, John Tillotson; Clerk—O. H. Perry; Purser's Steward—J.W. Wales.

There were a large number present, many officers of the Navy, a full quorum of Editors, and their reporters; and as the proceedings are to be held with open doors, the public will have a full report of all that takes place.

Mr. McKenzie looked pale and care worn, but seemed very calm and collected. From the appearance of this Court, we doubt not that justice will be done alike to the memory of the dead, and to the reputation of the living.—Transcript.

Thursday, Dec. 29th. The Court assembled at the usual hour, and after a consultation in private, it was opened about 12 o'clock. Capt. Mc Kenzie wished to have it understood that he did not ask for the assistance of Mr. Hone as counsel, but merely to take a record of the proceedings, the testimony, &c.

The President stated that the papers expected from Washington had arrived, and the Court proceeded with its business.

Mr. Hoffman then proceeded to read the narrative of Capt. McKenzie, dated Dec. 19th 1842.

He stated that he had long been engaged in preparing this narrative. After making the Azores, he proceeded to Liberia, but not finding the Vandalia, to which vessel he was charged with despatches, he sailed for St. Thomas, leaving them with the American consul there. On the 27th of November, Lieut. Ganesvoort informed him of the mutiny, and that Midshipman Spencer was concerned, and that the information had come from Mr. Wales, the Purser's steward. Mr. Wales stated to Lieut. Ganesvoort that on the night before, he was called on the booms by Spencer, who asked if he was afraid of death, or if he was afraid to kill a man. Mr. Wales thinking that something was wrong, with great coolness dissembled his real opinions, and Spencer then went on with the details of his project, and which we have heretofore correctly published.—Spencer stated that he had the further details of his plan in his cravat.

Capt. McKenzie thinking that this was only some romantic freak of Spencer's, but that duty required him to be on his guard, and the 1st Lieut was directed to watch him, but without appearing to do so. He was seen in conference with Cromwell and Small, and had given money to them, and had distributed tobacco frequently to the apprentices. He had corrupted the ward-room steward, and induced him to steal brandy, which he gave out to the men and drank himself, and he was also often detected amusing the men by making music with his jaw.

The officers in the ward-room had their wine, but the steerage officers were not allowed to have spirituous liquors; but while on the coast of Africa the ward-room mess had laid in some brandy, and by accident, as was thought, but afterwards discovered to be by design, brandy was ordered by the steward from two grocers, thus doubling the quantity, and affording the steward an opportunity of giving it to Spencer, as none of it was ever used by the mess.

Spencer had often among the men vituperated Capt. McKenzie, and said it would be pleasant to roll him overboard. He had also examined the hand of Midshipman Rogers, and predicted a violent and speedy death, and he had drawn a picture of a brig with a black flag and asked the Midshipmen what they thought of it, and what kind of a pirate the Somers would make.

When Spencer came on board, Capt. McKenzie received him in a friendly manner, but having heard of his previous misconduct, and that he was dismissed from the Brazil station, he thought that he would make an effort to have him ordered from the vessel.

Mr. Hoffman here suggested the propriety of not reading any more of this narrative, as it evidently had not been compared with the original, which was sent to the Department. It was then passed over temporarily, to be resumed upon a future occasion, to be received nunc pro tunc, and meanwhile Capt. McKenzie would compare and correct it by the draft of the original.

Mr. Hoffman suggested that no witnesses should be examined until the whole paper had been read, as the object of reading it would be to ascertain if it was contradicted in any essential feature by the testimony adduced. If the witnesses were examined before the whole paper was before the Court, he conceived it would not be the proper course. Further proceedings were suspended for half an hour to give Capt. McKenzie time to compare and make his statement a correct copy of the original.—N. Y. Cour.

Fire in Providence. The Printing and bleaching establishment of Mr. Isaac Saunders, at the head of the Cove, in Providence, took fire on Tuesday night, and a large quantity, said to be 25,000 pieces, of brown and bleached printing cloth, was either burnt or damaged.

A New Lamp. An important improvement has been made in this city, of the Argand and Solar lamp, to fit it for the burning of lard and poor oil. The improvement has been made by Mr. F. H. Southworth, and the lamp is called 'Southworth's Patent Uranian Lamp.' It burns with an intense light, and a remarkably steady flame. We learn that it is fed and trimmed without difficulty, and that it is used with the same ease with lard as a lamp fed with oil. It is in the form of a solar lamp, and may be finished to any form of elegance desired. It seems likely to recommend itself to general use.—Adv.

Usefulness of Sunday Schools. At the recent anniversary celebration of the Sunday School attached to the Methodist Church in John Street, New York, Mr. Disosway stated that out of 150,000 children who received instruction at the Hibernian Society School, not one had ever been convicted of crime, and that of all the convicts at Botany Bay, one only had ever been a Sunday School scholar. He also mentioned that Dr. Dwight, in his History of Prisons, states the remarkable fact, that, in no instance which had come to his knowledge, had a person, who had been trained in a Sunday School, been convicted of crime.

The Case of Young Spencer, who was recently hanged on board the U. S. brig Somers for the high crime of mutiny, affords an admonition to our children and youth which ought not to be disregarded. A gentleman who has known him from his infancy informs us that he was a wild, headstrong boy, always ready for mischief, and always disobedient to his parents, and attributes his early and ignominious death, to his naturally bad and ungovernable disposition.

What a fearful warning is this to the young!—With what terific plainness does it tell them to curb their evil inclinations, to submit to the authority of their parents, and to grow up in the paths of virtue and rectitude! Children never become hardened and reckless in a moment, but they commence with a slight deviation from duty; and if they find they can transgress once with impunity, they are very apt to do so again, and to a somewhat greater extent; and thus they go on, often, until no crime is too great for them to accomplish. Children, beware of the first wrong action—for however trifling it may appear to you it may be the means of bringing you to the gallows!—N. Y. Sun.

Service of Plate. The Boston Insurance Companies have presented to Capt. Codman, of the ship Sarah Parker, a pair of splendid Silver Pitchers, and a set of Goblets, for his skill and seamanship in bringing the ship into port. They have also made presents to his mates, carpenter, and to the men. Though, as Capt. Codman says, 'he did no more than it was his duty to do,' it is still proper and right, that some testimonial should be offered by the Insurance Companies, of their appreciation of the efforts of Capt. Codman, his officers, and men, to save a disabled ship, and bring her into port.—Merc. Journal.

Cutting the New World in Two. This process it seems is begun. The canal company chartered by the government of New Grenada, have commenced excavating their big ditch through the Isthmus of Panama, and in a few years our whale ships, instead of rounding Cape Horn, will pass from ocean to ocean, through the mountains which Pizarro and his followers found such difficulty in climbing over.

The line of the canal, however, follows a less rugged route than they did. The country through which it passes has a mean elevation of only 37 feet above the level of the sea at high tide. The entire length of the canal will be about 49 miles, of which 12 and a half miles only will be excavated, the rivers Chagres and Grande supplying the necessary navigation for the remainder of the distance.

There will be a sufficient depth of water for ships of 1400 tons. It is supposed that within five years the two continents will be divorced, and every thing prepared for celebrating the nuptials between the two oceans.

Sad Affair. A few weeks since a man named Montgomery, at Harpersfield, Ohio, about three weeks after his wife's death, married a girl who had previously been living in his family. Several young men in the vicinity being indignant at the impropriety of it, serenaded him at night with horns, &c. A neighbor named Ferguson rebuked them for so doing, whereupon they entertained him in a similar manner. He ordered them to be off or he would shoot them. While they were going away he seized his gun and discharged it, lodging 60 shot in the neck of a young man named Jerome, who is not expected to recover. Ferguson has been held to bail in the sum of $500 to answer.

Attempt at Assassination by a Burglar. Last evening, between 7 and 8 o'clock, a colored man named Abraham Bostwick, was found in the entry of the house No. 95 Chambers street, in the act of stealing a coat belonging to Mr. R. Howel. He was seized and on his way to prison he made a desperate effort to escape, drew a knife on Mr. William Hafferman, the mate of the ship Italy, and inflicted several severe wounds on his person.

Mr. Hefferman was severely stabbed in the wrists, also in two places on either thigh. He received a thrust which cut through his pantaloons and divided a large plug of tobacco in his pocket, fortunately there, or the blow would have proved fatal.

This desperate villain is a noted burglar, and was lately convicted of a petit larceny, and sentenced to be confined in the City Prison. His time of sentence does not expire for several days to come. How he came to be at large is therefore a mystery, but the keepers of the City Prison deserve the highest censure for their misrule in allowing the man to be at liberty before his sentence expired.—N. Y. Express.

Out-Millering Miller. A Mr. Preble has been 'holding forth' at Keene, N. H. as we learn from the Sentinel of that village, to prove Miller's doctrine of the second advent and the destruction of the world. Mr. Preble believes the great demonstration will be so early as the 15th of February next! If Mr. Preble has not 'missed a figure,' there will be no need of repealing the Bankrupt Law.—Transcript.

Mr Maxwell one of the conducters on the Portland railroad, was seriously injured on Saturday week, by falling from one of the cars while the train was under full headway.

Two boys were terribly injured in Pittsburg a few days ago, by an explosion of powder, with which they were making squibs—one of them had his eyes entirely destroyed.

Alpheus Harmon a Mormon preacher, and his nephew Orsey Harmon, were frozen to death on the prairie between Carthage and Nauvoo, Ill., on the 16th ult.

Consecration of a Bishop. The consecration of Dr. Eastburn, as assistant Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Massachusetts, took place on Thursday of last week at the Trinity Church in this city. The preparatory service was read by Rev. Dr. Vinton and Rev. Mr. Watson; the sermon was preached by Bishop de Lancey of Western New York; and the consecration service was performed by Bishops Griswold, Brownell, and de Lancey. A very numerous audience attended the interesting service.

Fire. Sunday evening a fire broke out in the dry-house of the cotton factory at Dorchester, at 8 o'clock. The building was entirely consumed—the amount of damage not ascertained.

Elder Thurston. The Lowell Courier of Saturday states that the Ecclesiastical Council have decided that Elder Thurston be suspended from preaching the gospel at present.

A Great Fire.—occurred in New York on Thursday evening, between 10 and 11 o'clock. It commenced in a store in Fletcher street, two doors from Maiden Lane, and before it was subdued consumed three stores in that street, the 2 stores in the rear, and three stores in Maiden Lane. The loss is estimated at $250,000.

Juvenile Rogues. The Mercantile Journal cautions persons to be on their guard against rogues who abound in this community at the present time—and devise ingenious expedients to deceive and dupe the unwary. A short time since, a lad visited a number of dwellings in Roxbury, in open day, opened the front door, without knocking, and if not interupted, walked up stairs, and appropriated to himself whatever loose valuables he might find in bureaus, &c. If he met any person belonging to the house, he would inquire if Mr. Smith, Thomson, or Brown lived there—and declare that he knocked or rung, and as no one came to the door, he thought he would open it himself. This juvenile thief was quite successful in his depredations for a day or two, when he disappeared.

We understand that on Thursday, a little black boy rung the bell at the front door of a house in this city. A girl came to the door, and was told that Mr. T——, who resided there, had torn his pantaloons most sadly—and had sent him to get another pair. The girl, at first unsuspicions of any fraud, procured the article requested, as the story was by no means improbable. But as the mistress of the house was out, she questioned the boy a little, before she delivered the garment—and his answers were so unsatisfactory, that she at length refused to let him have the pantaloons, without a written order,—although he urged her strongly—assuring her that Mr. T——would be very angry with him if he returned without them. It is hardly necessary to say that the whole was a lie.

Information Wanted, of one Francis Caskin, an Irishman, about 30 years of age, of low stature, fair or sandy complexion. He left the Lowell almshouse about two months ago, in which place he had lived for a few months previous, in consequence of his becoming insane. The particulars relating to his escape, have been detailed to us, are as follows: 'We shall tell the story as it was told us.' We shall be glad of an opportunity to contradict it. It seems that he was kept handcuffed, and was suffered to wander about in the yard. On the day he left the almshouse, he went over to a neighbor's house, and in coming back at dusk, found the door fastened. A boy at the almshouse knew he was at the door, but would not let him in. They wanted to get rid of him, he said. He was handcuffed at the time, and from that day to this he has never been heard of.—Lowell Courier.

The ship Farewell, of Newburyport, from Calcutta, which has arrived below this port is said to have brought about 1865 tons of cargo, weight and measurement. This is stated to be the largest cargo ever loaded in Calcutta, under any flag. Some of the British East Indiamen are of 1200 tons burthen, but their between decks are occupied by armament, and for the accommodation of passengers, &c.—Advertiser.

The Millerites have contracted for the erection of that great tabernacle of which we spoke some days since. It is to be completed by the 1st of Febuary, at a cost of $1,800. The site selected is the lot in Howard street formerly occupied by the Howard street House. The walls are to be of brick 15 feet high—the centre of the roof to be 35 feet high. A lease of the land has been obtained for 15 months from the first of January. This fact indicates the uncertainty which prevails even among the second advent brethren in regard to the precise day of the Lord's coming.—Post.

Worthy of Praise. The thanks of our citizens are due vigilant and efficient of our City Marshal for his recent endeavors to break up and drive out from our midst, the various houses of ill fame which infest our city—for if there be a plague spot on the name of any metropolis, it is the existence of these dens of infamy, where the virtuous and unwary of either sex are seduced by the fascinating and deceptive allurements spread before their amazed view by the practised and cunning, who thrive only by their artifices upon the unsuspecting. How many innocent females are yearly, nay, monthly, sacrificed at those scenes of midnight orgies and crime! How many parent's hearts are made to bleed at their daughter's ruin, till bent to the earth by shame and grief, their grey hairs descend to the grave, before their time, through the crimes of their offspring! Yea, how many young men, the flower of our most respectable and wealthy families, whose name would be a passport for them to the society of the proudest of the land, sacrifice their reputation, and lose the respect of their friends by mingling in these debauching revels, with the depraved and abandoned! Their end is speedy, and one of despair and guilt.

That these plague spots exist in various sections of our city cannot be denied—but thanks to Marshal Blake, they are not left undisturbed—if he be but informed of their locality; and it is the duty of every honest citizen to give this information, if he have cause to believe that his own neighborhood is thus infested.—Bee.

Electoral Votes. By the new apportionment, the number of electors of President and Vice President chosen by all the States, will be 275, of which 138 are necessary to a choice. We give the following comparative table of the number of electoral votes to which each State is entitled, both by the new and old ratio:

	New Ratio.	Old Ratio.
1. New York,	36	42
2. Pennsylvania,	26	30
3. Ohio,	23	21
4. Virginia,	17	23
5. Tennessee,	13	15
6. Kentucky,	12	15
7. Massachusetts,	12	14
8. Indiana,	12	9
9. North Carolina	11	15
10. Georgia,	12	11
11. South Carolina,	9	11
12. Alabama,	9	7
13. Maine,	9	10
14. Illinois,	9	5
15. Maryland,	8	10
16. New Jersey,	7	8
17. Missouri,	7	4
18. Connecticut,	6	8
19. New Hampshire,	6	7
20. Vermont,	6	7
21. Louisiana,	6	5
22. Mississipi,	6	4
23. Michigan,	5	3
24. Rhode Island,	4	4
25. Delaware,	3	3
26. Arkansas,	3	3
	275	294

The number of electors, by the Constitution, it will be recollected, is equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress.—Thus, by the new ratio, Senators 52, Representatives 223: Total 275.

The old 13 States (including Maine, formerly belonging to Massachusetts) are entitled to 170 electoral votes: the new States 105.

Lynchalle. The Lexington (Ky.) Intelligencer, of the 2d, inst. says, that on the Wednesday night previous, at the usual hour, the stage from Maysville to that place drove up to Brennan's hotel, the door of the coach was opened for the passengers to alight, and the waiters busied themselves in taking off the baggage, of which there was a large quantity. The baggage was all removed, but no passengers appeared. The driver was interrogated as to what had become of them, when he then for the first time discovered that they were not in the stage, and had been left at the last stand, 9 miles from town, where they had all got out to warm themselves.

Good Advice. The New York Union says, 'place no confidence in imaginary prosperity—never venture beyond your depth—live within your means—think of making a living, not a fortune—look ahead—take care of the rainy day—be prudent—be temperate—be humble.'

Curious Relic. A lady, who was formerly governess to some of the royal family, at St. Petersburg, lately died in London, and left amongst other relics, a curiously wrought mattress, composed of genuine Russian leather and buckskin, and stuffed with hair from the manes and tales of the horses that perished at Moscow, when Bonaparte and his army invaded Russia.

The Sheffield (Eng.) Iris states that the leg of a man, previously magnetized, was recently amputated in that neighborhood without causing him the slightest pain. The patient said he had an indistinct recollection of having had a crash, but had experienced no inconvenience from the operation.

In Newmarket, N. H. after a protracted and very severe illness, Miss Martha Jane Daniels, aged 23, daughter of Joseph Daniels, Esq.

In Danvers, Dec. 19th, Mrs. Mary Porter, wife of Mr. Andrew Porter, formerly of Montpelier, Vt., aged 34. Her sickness was long and painful, and she at last fell a prey to that fatal disease, which destroys its thousands—the consumption. Although she had many attachments to life, yet she frequently expressed her willingness to depart, if it was the will of Providence. She declared that her faith in Jesus as the Saviour of the world, strengthened, if possible, as death approached; and in the full enjoyment of this faith, she departed to the world of rest and peace.—By this dispensation, her husband, three interesting step-children, the religious and benevolent Societies, and the Church, to which she belonged, have all met a loss which is irreparable. But it is a consoling assurance that their loss is her gain. com.

EIGHT DOLLARS PER DOZEN!

New Book of Psalmody. Third Edition. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by Thomas Whittemore, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of short Anthems, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Lang, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the Lessons or Rudiments, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

Dear Sir,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

Jotham S. French.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

'Gospel Harmonist.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

A Thought.

There is, we learn, more joy in heaven,
Far richer praise from angels there,
When one glad soul to God is given
In sweet repentance, trusting prayer,

When from the sinner's toilsome way
Beset with pain, dismay and scorn,
Lured by the Gospel's brilliant ray,
One blessed heart resolves to turn,

Than over numbers, who have ne'er
Forsook the pleasant path of right,
But walking in God's love and fear,
Need not repentance' waking light.

Then can heaven's joy be full, complete,
The seraph harp no faltering know,
And angel-eyes refuse to weep,
Each blood-bought soul with transport glow.

If from the ways of vice and woe,
Tossed on the waves of pain below,
One wandering sinner ne'er return! G. O.

Warren, Mass.

Miscellany.

'Remember the Poor.'

This is the season when those who are destitute of the means of worldly comfort, especially need the sympathies of the wealthy and affluent. There will be found in every community more or less families and individuals, who, by sickness, misfortune, disappointment, or, perhaps vice, suffer from the pinching hand of want, or the chilling embrace of poverty, or pine through unmerited neglect. Every benevolent heart will always be open to the necessities and wants of distressed, neglected, destitute and suffering humanity. And especially at this season of the year, when the necessaries of life are most difficult to be obtained, when destitution is accompanied with its worst, and most destroying consequences, every person, having a fellow feeling with his race, will listen to the demands of charity, and every hand should be ready with its contributions, to minister to the wants of the suns and daughters of affliction. Those who are comfortable and happy in their possessions, their means of enjoyment, their bright prospects, their pleasing anticipations, their flattering hopes, friends, health, success in business, reputation, fame, honor—are not always mindful of the wretchedness around them. They do not consider that poverty sways its iron sceptre over thousands prostrate in the dust; that want pinches and corrodes the emaciated forms of the destitute; that dark and dismal clouds settle upon the paths of multitudes; that despair has fixed its unrelenting grasp upon the hearts of many who struggle in vain to lose themselves from its terrible embrace; that friends have been snatched away, and left solitary and inconsolable mourners behind; that disappointments have blasted fair and reasonable prospects; that malevolence, slander or misfortune have overthrown the well-earned reputation of long years. The objects of sympathy and of charity exist all around, and every one, who can afford succor, should feel it a duty from whose sanctions he cannot be released, as well as a pleasure from whose participation he would not be excluded, to open the heart of sympathy, and extend the hand of relief.

Here is the poor and lonely widow with her suffering, shivering children, looking up to her for that warmth which gives to the body animation and energy, and for that bread which contributes to it vigor and strength.—Will he not take pity upon her as she stirs up the last dying embers of her last scanty stick of wood? and distributes to her needy little ones the last remnant of her solitary loaf? How many hearts might be made glad, backs clothed, and stomachs fed, by the contributions of that which never would be missed from the contributor. But we are not to make this the measure of our charities for we are not to live to ourselves only, we were made for the world—for mankind—for the universal happiness of the race. We are not to ask, when an alms is solicited, whether it will discommode us, whether we must deny ourselves in any particular, but whether we shall confer a greater good by giving, than secure to ourselves by withholding.

It is truly gratifying to notice in almost all the papers that reach us, accounts of measures taken to assist and relieve the suffering poor. Such measures, so generally adopted, confer more true glory upon our country, than all the exploits of Armies and Navies, successfully carried on to the end of time. But their good effects are not limited to this world, for, 'He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.'—Manchester Advertiser.

The Lord's Prayer.

In the consideration of this prayer we may remark, that as to its character:

It is divine. How excellent must be the petition which the king himself has drawn up! It must certainly meet with acceptance from its author.

It is comprehensive. There cannot be mentioned a petition necessary for man, not included in these,—Thy kingdom come,—Thy will be done,—Give us this day our daily bread,—Forgive us our trespasses,—Lead us not into temptation,—Deliver us from evil.

1. In its design. What is more ennobling than prayers? The loftiest place on earth is the footstool of Jehovah. The grandest posture prostration before his throne.

2. In its language. The simple grandeur which struck Longinus in, 'Let there be light, and there was light,' breathes in every sentence of this prayer. Here are no swelling word's of man's wisdom, here is nothing redundant; nothing deficient. It is the language of sublime devotion, chastened by filial awe.

3. In its conceptions. In vain look we for sublimity, where these are poor. But what vastness have we here! God,—the kingdom of God,—angelic obedience,—earth,—the will of God, the only law of its one thousand millions of living men; evil implying all that men can suffer, or dread; deliverance from evil; the power, the glory, the eternity of God! Was ever so much comprehended before, or since, in so few words?

Secondly, consider the spirit of the Lord's Prayer.

It breathes a filial spirit—'Father.'

A catholic spirit—'Our Father.'

A reverential spirit—'Hallowed be thy Name.'

A missionary spirit—'Thy kingdom come.'

An obedient spirit—'Thy will be done on Earth.'

A forgiving spirit—'And forgive our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.'

A cautious spirit—'Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.'

A confidential and adoring spirit—'For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen.'

When you pray, remember the direction of your Saviour.

Cruelties of Heathenism.

The following are extracts of a letter received by the Secretaries of the London Missionary Society, from the Rev. Robert Brooking, one of the Society's missionaries in Western Africa, dated Kumasi, Feb. 14, 1842.—The Reverend gentleman, after describing many things of minor importance, proceeds to add:—'On the 6th of last month (January) one of the king's daughters died, and a custom was made, during which three poor creatures were hurried into eternity in the shape of sacrifices, one of whose headless trunks I saw dragged through the market-place. On Sunday, the 9th, after preaching, I went to take the air, when I came unexpectedly upon the headless trunk of a human being who had been executed a few minutes previously. His hands were also lopped off, and one of the executioners was engaged in cutting off a part of the chin with the beard on it. On the 13th, the old chief Kumasi died, in consequence of which a large custom was made. During the day twelve persons were sacrificed. I witnessed the pushing of the knife through the cheek of one poor creature to prevent her from cursing the king. This was done almost instantaneously, after which her hands were tied behind her back, and in this state she was left for some time until executed.—On the 17th, two persons were executed for conspiracy and treason. I saw those persons with knives driven through their cheeks, their hands fastened by iron staples to logs of wood. I saw the head of one of them struck off. His blood served to besmear the king's drum, &c. His heart was then taken out and also one of his ribs, all of which was done in the sight of a survivor. They both retained their faculties till the last moment, and were quite aware of what was going on. On the 18th, while returning from the king's house, I saw the head and hand of one of those who were executed the preceding day, carried by an individual with as much unconcern as a butcher's boy would carry the head of a sheep in England. On the 23d, a fire broke out, which was soon extinguished. Scarcely was that done, however, when a house in another part of the town took fire during which time the wind blew rather strong, and the fire spread and burnt down three-fourths of the most thickly populated part of the town in the incredibly short space of four hours. I never saw such a scene before; the fire raged with incredible fury. It was truly heart-rending to see women and children retreating before it. On the 30th, a man of consequence died, and 12 individuals were sent into another world to accompany him, five of whose headless trunks and six heads were lying together at one time in the streets. Our reception was good, and our prospects are delightful; yet the scenes we sometimes witness are absolutely revolting to human nature.'

Curious Calculation.

The New Orleans Bulletin has quit political speculation, and has taken to mathematics. The last number contains the following curious calculation:—'The number who have lived upon the earth has been estimated at about 27,000,000,000.000,000. This sum when divided by 27,864,000, the number of square miles of land, gives 1,314,022,076, to a square rod, and five to a square foot! Suppose a square rod capable of being divided into twelve graves, each grave would contain a hundred persons, so that the whole earth has been one hundred times dug over to bury its inhabitants, supposing they had been equally distributed. Were the bodies laid upon the surface, they would cover the land to the depth of 100 feet.' The Bulletin asks, where are all these bodies? We answer that they are all existing somewhere, in new modifications of matter, or under new forms. The same particles which formed a portion of the brain of the brightest of ancient philosophers, may now compose the substance of a turnip, or be imprisoned in the scarce animated body of a tadpole.—Philad. Ledger.

But first, suppose we look at the calculation a moment. The world is 5864 years old. Thirty years is generally considered a generation; but suppose we say 20 years; and consider this the average period of human life.—Then in 5846 years, there have been 292 generations and a fraction. The present number of inhabitants on the globe is generally estimated at about 800,000,000. Multiply this by 292 the number of generations, and you have 233,600,000,000; which would be the aggregate number of inhabitants who would have lived upon the globe, if its population had been always as great as at present. But it has not. During several successive periods of 20 years after the creation of man, and again for several generations after the flood, the population of the world was comparatively small. But admitting it to have averaged 800,000,000 ever since the birth of Adam, (which is unquestionably very far above the truth,) still the whole number would be only (233,600,000,000) a 115,582nd part of what the Bulletin makes it. In other words, the Bulletin is in error to the amount of 26,-999,766,400,000,000. We rather guess the Bulletin took some Chinese or Hindoo authority for the age of the world; otherwise we don't understand its arithmetic.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

Cure for Consumption.

Mr. Adam Mott gives the following statement in the Maine Farmer:

'A friend of mine who resides in Industry in this State, told me that his wife was sick of what the Doctors call Consumption. She was visited by five physicians, who gave her over. She was very sick—was unable to sit up—had a severe cough—grew no better, 'but rather worse'—she failed very fast. She recollected that she had before received benefit from the use of St. John's wort; her husband procured some of it—it was steeped, and she made it her constant drink. For four or five days there appeared to be but little alteration; but after this she grew better very fast; her health was so much improved, that in the course of six or eight weeks she was able to resume her customary occupation—she commenced weaving and wove about forty yards of cloth.

'During this time she made constant use of St. John's wort tea. What has been may be done again. It helped her—it may help others.

'The tea may be made as you would make peppermint or any herb tea or drink—by merely steeping the herb tea in water. The herbs may be gathered any time after it is large enough; but the best time for gathering it is in the seventh month. A supply may doubtless be found in almost any hay mow where there is any hay. I much approve of this simple remedy.'

Plain Diet.

This is what children ought, on every account, to be accustomed to, from the first. It is vastly more for their present health and comfort than those little nice things with which fond parents are so apt to vitiate their appetites, and it will save them a great deal of mortification in after life. If you make it a point to give them the best of everything; to pamper them with rich cakes, sweetmeats, and sugar plumbs; if you allow them to say with a scowl, 'I don't like this,' or 'can't eat that,' and then go away and make them a little toast, or kill a chicken for their dainty palates, depend upon it, you are doing them a great injury, not only on the score of denying them a full muscle and rosy cheek, but of forming one of the most inconvenient habits that they can carry along with them in after life. When they come to leave you, they will not, half the time, find anything they can eat; and thus you will prepare them to go chafing and grumbling through life, the veriest slaves almost in the world.—Dr. Humphrey.

The Dead Alive.

Numerous instances are on record in which persons have been restord to life after they were to all appearance dead, and even after every arrangement had been made for burial. Cases, in fact, have occurred where persons have, beyond all doubt, been buried alive.—Diseases are not unknown to physicians in which animation is so completely suspended, that the subject presents every appearance of death. In the remarkable case of Rev. William Tennent he would have been consigned to the grave but for the interference of a physician, who persevered in the opinion that life was not extinct, amidst the opposition of friends. Sometimes this state of suspended animation is one of entire consciousness, in which case it is difficult to conceive of the horror of the situation. Generally, however, the subject is unconscious of being alive.—Mr. Tennent was in a trance, his soul reveling in the bliss of heaven. The following remarkable case is related by Mrs. L. M. Child the editor of the Anti-Slavery Standard, in a late number of that paper:—Boston Recorder.

A remarkable case accompanied with the consciousness of being alive, occurred in my own family. The yellow fever raged fearfully in Boston, the last part of the eighteenth century. The panic was so universal that wives forsook their dying husbands, in some cases, and mothers their children, to escape the contagious atmosphere of the city. Funeral rites were generally omitted. The 'death carts' sent into every part of the town, were so arranged as to pass through each st. every half hour. At each house known to contain a victim of a fever, they rung a bell and called, 'Bring out your dead.' When the lifeless forms were brought out, they were wrapped in tarred sheets, put into the cart and carried to the burial-place, unaccompanied by relatives. In most instances, in fact, relatives had fled before the first approach of the fatal disease. One of my father's brothers, residing in Boston at that time, became a victim to the pestilence. When the first symtoms appeared, his wife sent the children into the country, and herself remained to attend upon him. Her friends warned her against such rashness. They told her it would be death to her, and no benefit to him; for he would soon be too ill to know who attended upon him. These arguments made no impression on her affectionate heart. She felt that it would be a life long satisfaction to her to know who attended upon him if he did not. She accordingly staid and watched him with unremitting care. This, however, did not avail to safe him. He grew worse and worse, and finally died. Those who went round with the death carts, had visited the chamber, and seen that the end was near. They now came to take the body. His wife refused to let it go. She told me that she never knew how to account for it, but though he was cold and rigid and to every appearance quite dead, there was a powerful impression on her mind that life was not extinct. The men were overborne by the strength of her conviction, though their own reason was opposed to it.—The half hour again come round, and again was heard the solemn words, 'Bring out your dead.' The wife again resisted their importunities; but this time the men were more resolute. They said the duty assigned to them was a painful one; but the health of the city required punctual obedience to the orders they received; if they ever expected the pestilence to abate, it must be by a prompt removal of the dead, and immediate fumigation of the infected apartments. She pleaded and pleaded and pleaded, and even knelt to them in an agony of tears; continually saying, 'I am sure he is not dead.' The men represented the utter absurdity of such an idea; but finally overcome by her tears again departed. With trembling haste she renewed her efforts to restore life. She raised his head, rolled his limbs in hot flannel, and placed hot onions on his feet. The dreadful half hour again came round, and found him as cold and rigid as ever. She renewed her entreaties so desperately, that the messengers began to think that a little gentle force was necessary. They accordingly attempted to remove the body against her will; but she threw herself upon it, and clung to it with such frantic strength, that they could not easily loosen her grasp. Impressed by the remarkable strength of her will, they relaxed their efforts. To all their remonstrances, she answered, 'if you bury him, you shall bury me with him.' At last by dint of reasoning on the necessity of the case, they obtained from her a promise that if he showed no signs of life before they again came round, she would make no farther opposition to the removal. Having gained this respite, she hung the watch up on the bed-post, and renewed her efforts with redoubled zeal. She placed kegs of hot water about him, forced brandy between his teeth, breathed into his nostrils, and held hartshorn to the nose; but still the body lay motionless and cold. She looked anxiously at the watch; in five minutes more the promised half hour would expire, and those dreadful voices would be heard passing through the street. Hopelessness came over her; she dropped the head she had been sustaining; her hand trembled violently; and the hartshorn she had been holding was spilled on the pallid face. Accidentally, the position of the head had become slightly tipped backward, and the powerful liquid flowed into his nostrils. Instantly there was a short, quick gasp—a struggle—his eyes opened; and when the death-men again came, they found him sitting up in bed. He is still alive, and has enjoyed unusually good health ever since.

The Teeth.

The prevalence of defective teeth in this country, is the general subject of remark by foreigners; and whoever has travelled in Spain and Portugal is struck with the superior soundness and whiteness of teeth in those countries. Though not a clean people in other respects they wash their teeth often, and by means of tooth-picks, carefully remove all substances from between them after meals, a little silver porcupine with holes all over its back, to insert tooth-picks, is a common ornament on the dining tables of Spain and Portugal. The general use of them creates so large a demand, that the students at Coimbra sometimes support themselves by whittling tooth-picks, which are sold, tied in small bunches, like matches. They are made of willow, on account of its toughness and pliability. Tooth-picks of metal are too hard; and are apt to injure the gums. There is the same objection, in a less degree, to quills.—But willow tooth-picks are preferable to all others; and they have the advantage of being the most cleanly; for they usually break in the using, and are thrown away. Few sights are more offensive to a person of any refinement, than a tooth-pick that has been much used; it is moreover uncleanly, and therefore not healthy for the teeth. Food allowed to remain between the teeth, particulary animal food, is very destructive; it should be carefully removed after every meal, and the mouth thoroughly rinsed. This may seem to many a great talk about a small matter; but these are simple precautions to take, and very slight trouble compared with the agony of aching teeth, or a breath so offensive, that your best friend does not wish to sit near you. If there is any reason why a man's complexion should exclude him from the dining table, there is a much sounder reason why he should be banished for not taking proper care of his teeth. A bad breath is such a detestable thing, that it might be a sufficient reason for not marrying a person with otherwise agreeable qualities. It is moreover, perhaps inexcusable thus to transform oneself into a walking sepulchre. Nobody needs to have an offensive breath. A careful removal of substances between the teeth, rinsing the mouth after meals, and a bit of charcoal held in the mouth, will always cure a bad breath. Charcoal used as a dentrifice (that is, rubbed on in powder with a brush) is apt to injure the enamel; but a lump of it held in the mouth two or three times a week, and slowed chewed, has a wonderful power to preserve the teeth, and purify the breath. The action is purely chemical. It counteracts the acid arising from a disordered stomach, or food decaying about the gums; and it is this acid which destroys the teeth. A dear friend of ours, had, when about twenty years of age, a front tooth that turned black gradually, crumbled and broke off by piece-meal. By frequently chewing charcoal, the progress of decay was not only arrested, but nature set vigorously to work to restore the breach, and the crumbled portion grew again, till the whole tooth was as sound as before. This I know to be a fact.

Every one knows that charcoal is an antiputrescent, and is used in boxing up animal or vegetable substances, to keep them from decaying. Upon the same chemical principle, it tends to preserve the teeth, and sweeten the breath.

There is no danger in swallowing it; on the contrary, small quantities have a healthful effect on the inward system, particularly incident to summer. It would not be wise to swallow that, or any gritty substance, in large quantities, or very frequently; but once or twice a week, a little would be salutary rather than otherwise. A bit of charcoal as big as a cherry, merely held in the mouth a few hours without chewing, has a good effect. At first, most people dislike to chew it, but use soon renders it far from disagreeable. Those who are troubled with an offensive breath, might chew it very often, and swallow it but seldom. It is peculiarly important to clean and rinse the mouth thoroughly before going to bed; otherwise a great deal of the destructive acid will form during the night.

If these hints induce only one person to take better care of his teeth, I shall be more than rewarded for the trouble of writing. I am continually pained to see young people losing their teeth merely for the want of a few simple precautions; and one cannot enter a stage or steam car without finding the atmosphere polluted, and rendered absolutely unhealthy for the lungs to breathe, when a proper use of charcoal might render it as wholesome and pleasant as a breeze of Eden.—Standard.

A Ball at the Court of Russia.

We extract from the Journal de Frankfort the following details, which an eye witness gives of a ball at the court of Russia:—'Immediately after my presentation to the Emperor and Empress of Russia, I had the honor of being present at a magnificient ball, which showed the court in all its splendor. On such occasions no civil costume is admitted. Every one is in uniform, and a variety of dresses gives a splendid character to the scene. Imagine gigantic rooms lit up by thousands of wax lights, an assemblage of more than 1,500 persons, women admirably beautiful, whose exquisite dresses add to their beauty, and you would suppose yourself in a fairy scene. The Emperor opens the court balls with a Polonaise, dancing at first with the Empress, then the Princesses of the Imperial family, and next with the ladies of the highest nobility, or the handsomest. At the court of Russia beauty has the privilege of the entree, and causes birth to be forgotten. The Empress loves to collect around her the handsomest faces, and it is not rare to see the young daughters of functionaries of a fortune and rank altogether secondary, become ladies of honor to the Empress, thanks to their beauty and agreeable appearance. When the Emperor has danced a certain number of polonaise, French quadrilles and mazurkas are taken up all concluding with cotillions. The Empress formerly was exceedingly fond of dancing, and excelled in the art, but at present she rarely does more than figure in a quadrille, or take a turn or two in a waltz. At 12 o'clock the guests repaired to the marble hall, and the Imperial family took their seats at a table apart; the others placing themselves in groups at tables arranged about the Imperial one.—The Emperor supped in the winter garden, and admitted to his supper table only a few chosen persons. This winter garden ornamented with palm trees and magnificent orange trees, forms a charming contrast with the supper room, resplendent with tapers.—The half light with which it was lit up, the little birds, who, frightened with the noise, sent forth from time to time a few short notes, and the perfume from the flowers appeared to me to be the triumph of civilization over darkness, and produced in me the effect of an enchanted palace. I had next me a little man full of spirits and obliging, who laughed at the ecstacy into which those wonders threw me. The table was loaded with silver plate: there was before me a vase, weighing, it was said, 200 killogrammes, in which a man could hide himself. I learnt from my neighbor that this magnificent silver service came from the Empress Elizabeth, and after having been for a length of time shut up in cases, had been discovered two years before in the marble palace. The supper, which was composed of hot dishes, was served by a crowd of footmen and some Moors among them were remarked for their strange and original costume.'—London Paper.

David's Sow.

The common expression, as drunk as David's Sow, originated in the following ludicrous circumstance:—One David Lloyd, a Welchman, who kept a public house at Hereford, had a living sow with eight legs, which was much visited by the curious. He had a wife, too, somewhat curious also, in the frequent desire to prove the goodness and the potency of her husband's liquors, which often subjected her to a little due correction. One day, David's wife having indulged her propensity not a little too much, and being fearful of consequences, thought it best to seek timely retirement.

With this view, she turned out the sow from her habitation, and took possession of the sty, wherein to sleep herself sober. A company of persons coming soon afterwards to see the rare eight-legged sow, David ushered them up to the sty, exclaiming joyously, on approaching the enclosure, 'There's a sow for you! did you ever see such another?'—To which some of the party in advance, seeing the state the woman was in, replied, 'It is truly the most drunken sow we ever beheld.' Whence the woman was ever called 'David's Sow.'

Take counsel of him who is greater, and of him who is less than thyself, and then refer to thine own judgment.

Wages in Europe.

The following statement, from authentic sources, will give some idea of the condition of the working classes on the Continent of Europe:

Wages in France. Calais, common laborers, 7 1-2d per day, with board and without dwelling; Boulogne, 5d per day, do. do; Nantes, 8d per day, without board and without dwelling; Marseilles, 4d to 7d per day, with board and without dwelling. The food in some districts 'consists in rye bread, soup of millet, cakes made of Indian corn, now and then some salt provisions and vegetables, rarely, if ever, butcher's meat.' In others, 'wheat bread, soup made with vegetables, and a little grease or lard twice a day, potatoes, or other vegetables, but seldom butcher's meat.'

Sweden. 'The daily wages of a skilled agriculturist are 7d or 8d; while the unskilled obtain no more than 3d or 4d and board themselves. Agriculturists in the southern provinces live upon salt fish and potatoes; in the northern provinces, porridge and rye bread form their food.'

Bavaria. 'Laborers are paid at the rate of 8d per day in the country,' without board.

Belgium. 'A skilled artisan may earn in summer 1s 2d to 1s 5d.; in winter, from 10d to 1s 2d.; unskilled, half as much, without board; live upon rye bread, potatoes, and milk.' Agricultural Laborers have less.

Germany. Dantzic, laborers 4 1-4 to 7d per day without board; Mecklenburg, 7d per day, do.; Holstein, 7d per day, do.

Netherlands. South Holland laborers 3d to 4d per day, with board; North Holland 20d per day, without board; Antwerp, 5d per day do; West Flanders, 96s to 104s per year, with board.

Italy. Trieste, laborers 12d per day, without board; 6d with board; Istria 8d to 10d without board; 4d to 5d per day with board; Lombardy, 4d to 8d per day, do; Genoa, 5d to 8d per day and without lodgings, Tuscany, 6d per day without either.

Saxony. 'In 1837, a man employed on his own loom worked very diligently from Monday morning to Saturday night, from 5o'clock in the morning until dark, and even at times with a lamp, his wife assisting him in finishing and taking home the work, could not possibly earn more than 20 groschen, (or about 60 cents) per week. Nor could one who had three children aged 12 years and upwards, all working at the loom as well as himself, with his wife employed doing up the work, earn in the whole more than $1 weekly.'

The Wife.

If you wish to be happy and have peace in the family, never reprove your husband in company—even if that reproof be ever so slight. If he be irritated, speak not an angry word. Indifference sometimes will produce unhappy consequences. Always feel an interest in what your husband undertakes, and if he is perplexed or discouraged, assist him by your smiles and pleasant words. If the wife is careful how she conducts and speaks and looks, a thousand happy hearths would cheer and brighten our existence, where now there is nothing but clouds of gloom, sorrow and discontent. The wife above all others should study to please her husband and to make home attractive.

GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM. FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM—designed to lead inquirers to the belief of that doctrine, and believers to the practice of it.' By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. This work consists of 408 pages, handsomely bound; and will be sold at the low price of ONE DOLLAR a copy.

I. It gives a brief history of the doctrine from the earliest ages, and notices of its most eminent defenders.

II. It clearly and particularly sets forth the sentiments of Universalists.

III. It gives the evidences of Universalism as contained in the sacred Scriptures, by which it is infallibly proved that said doctrine is the doctrine of the Bible.

IV & V. It explains all the principal passages, both in the Old and New Testaments, which have been used to disprove Universalism, amounting to upwards of ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY, in which all the different subjects are discussed, whereon light is so much needed,—such as the words rendered 'hell,' 'the lake of fire,' 'the furnace of fire,' 'unquenchable fire,' 'everlasting fire,' 'everlasting destruction,' 'eternal judgment,' 'coming forth from the graves to condemnation,' 'the 'sin against the Holy Ghost,' 'day of judgment,' 'destruction of the soul,' 'kingdom of heaven,' &c. &c.

VI. It answers the common objections to Universalism.

VII. It points out the moral tendency of Universalism, and the duties of those who believe in that benign and heart-cheering sentiment.

VIII. It furnishes a Constitution for Universalist Societies, and advice in regard to the formation and management of the same; showing the only way in which they can enjoy prosperity. It also gives all the laws of the Commonwealth in regard to religious Societies.

IX. It gives directions in regard to the formation of Churches,—presents a plan of Church Government,—gives scriptural views of the Lord's Supper,—and a form of the administration of that service, for the benefit of young clergymen.

X. This chapter is on the evidences of revealed religion; and presents entire that masterly work, which never has been answered, and never can be refuted, Leslie's 'Short Method with the Deists.' Never but one Infidel attempted to answer it, and he gave up the task in despair.

This work is bound firm and strong, because we wish Universalists to lend it freely among their opponents.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE PARABLES. TENTH EDITION. For sale at this Office, the work entitled 'NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PARABLES OF THE NEW-TESTAMENT,' arranged according to the time in which they were spoken. By THOMAS WHITTEMORE.' 382 pages large 12mo at the low price of 75 cents per copy. Twenty per cent discount by the dozen. All the parables of the New Testament are explained at length in this work, and illustrated by appeals to the sacred Scriptures. Particular attention has been paid to those parables which have been used to prove the doctrine of future endless misery; and extracts are given from Orthodox Commentators, of great respectability, to show that they have explained them as Universalists now od

DAVIS' IMPROVED OXYGENATED SOAP. The Oxygenated Soap, as a Cosmetic and for Shaving, stands unrivalled. It is a composition in which pure Caustic Alkali is exhibited in its mildest form, united with a large portion of oxygen—a substance so well known to be essential to life, that it has obtained, in its gaseous forms, the name of Vital Air.

In external applications, especially when aided by the cleansing virtues of soap, it has a beneficial effect. It renders the skin soft and pliable, and preserves it in a healthy state; it gives it the bloom and purity of youth, and by its invigorating and strengthening qualities, enables the skin to perform its functions, known to be so necessary in the economy of nature for the preservation of beauty and the enjoyment of health. It removes all cutaneous eruptions, and is recommended as the best remedy for roughness of hands, Freckles, &c. that has ever been offered to the public.

This celebrated article is for sale in any quantity, on reasonable terms, at Messrs. THOMAS WHITTEMORE, 37 Cornhill; W. C. Stimson & Co's. south side Faneul Hall; J. P. Hall Union street; Brewster, Stephens & Cushing, Washington st; A. G. Peck & Co, cor. of Kilby and Water st; Lowe & Read, Merchants-Row; J. Kidder, Court st; Lewis & Co Trott & Bigelow, State street. Also, retailed by Druggists generally in this city and throughout the United States.

FOURTH EDITION OF CONFERENCE HYMNS. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'

Price $1,25 per dozen—12 1-2 cents single.

MILLER'S THEORY REFUTED. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of Wm. Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843. The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contrary.

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore. This subject is considered in connexion with the Judgment of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS. 'Selections from Eminent Commentators who have believed in the punishment after death; wherein they have agreed as Universalists in the interpretation of Scriptures relating to Punishment. By Rev. LUCIUS R. PAIGE. Second Edition, with revisions and additions. 358 pages. Price $1.

This is a highly valuable work to all Universalists. It proves by the most respectable orthodox authority that the interpretations which Universalists have given of the passages of Scripture which relate to punishment are correct. It is a refutation of endless misery by the testimony of the most learned writers who have believed that doctrine. The threatenings of punishment, occuring in the New Testament, which have been supposed to refer to endless misery, are explained in the work, in the very language of the Partialist Commentators. It is fatal to the doctrine of endless misery.

DODS' SHORT SERMONS. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the new stereotype edition of 'DODS' SHORT SERMONS,' with addition of several important articles. These Sermons have been regarded by the Universalist public with great favor. The first edition was taken up with avidity.—At the request of many friends, the author was induced to revise the work, and add many important essays on deeply interesting subjects; in which the author has thrown much light on subjects that have been regarded as very difficult to be understood. 'Mr. Dods,' says a distinguished correspondent, 'has done much to throw light on the sacred volume. Many of his expositions have struck us with great force. He has given us great light. Difficult subjects are explained clearly by him.'

Price of the work 75 cents. Wholesale dealers will find it to their interest to call at 37 Cornhill.

THAYER'S BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT. THIRD EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT, OR SCRIPTURAL GUIDE FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, being sketches of the Antiquities, Customs and Manners of the Jews, in illustration of Scripture, designed for the use of Teachers, Bible Classes, and the Higher Classes in Sunday Schools.' By Rev. THOMAS B. THAYER, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Lowell, Mass. This book is on a new plan, suggested to its author by his experience in conducting Sunday Schools and Bible Classes. It is not a book of questions merely; but each chapter consists of two parts,—1st. The history to which the questions refer is succinctly given, which is to be faithfully studied, and 2d. The Questions. We have examined this work and commend it; but any formal commendation is rendered quite unnecessary by the well known reputation of its author.

Price 25 cents single, $2.50 per dozen.

BALFOUR'S INQUIRIES. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, Boston, 'THREE INQUIRIES—1st. Into the Scriptural Doctrine concerning the Devil and Satan. 2d. The Extent and Duration expressed by the terms Olim, Aion, and Aionios, rendered Everlasting, &c. &c. in the Bible, and especially when applied to punishment. 3d. The New-Testament doctrine concerning the Possession of Devils. By WALTER BALFOUR, of Charlestown. Price $1.

ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM. SECOND EDITION. Just received and for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'The Ancient History of Universalism, from the commencement of the Christian Era to the time of the Reformation.' By HOSEA BALLOU 2d., of Medford. Price $1 per copy. A suitable discount to those who buy to sell again. It is a highly valuable work.

LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

BOOK OF PROMISES. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. BULFINCH EMMONS. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

PAIGE'S QUESTIONS. FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'QUESTIONS ON SELECT PORTIONS OF THE GOSPELS; designed for the use of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. By LUCIUS R. PAIGE, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Cambridge.' Price 25 cents single; $2,50 per dozen.

LIABILITIES OF THOSE WHO TAKE PERIODICALS.

The laws declare that any person to whom a periodical is sent is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office, or person with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a post office, store, tavern, or other place of deposite, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the postmaster, store or tavern keeper, &c. is responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or gives notice to the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

Post Office Regulations. Extract from the 'instructions to postmasters,' p. 50, sec. 118. 'In every instance in which papers that come to your office are not taken out by the person to whom they are sent, you will have immediate notice of it to the publishers, anning the reason, if known, why the papers are not taken out.

In all cases where Postmasters render themselves liable for the subscription money for a paper, by a neglect to notify the publisher that it remains dead in the Post Office, the Postmaster General reserves the right to admonish the Postmaster for his neglect, and require him to pay for the paper, or reform him out of office.

The End of the World.

In relation to this momentous subject, we see in our community, at this time, great excitement; and the many who are engaged in measures dictated by an expectation that this event is near at hand are called Millerites, because the man who has been foremost in proclaiming the approach of the end of the world is a Mr. Miller.

It seems natural to ask, what has led this man into his convictions in regard to this subject? Are our learned doctors of divinity of his opinion? Is he sustained by the divinity schools? Do our Christian clergy generally fall in with Mr. Miller? Do Christian professors, and members of our Christian churches generally unite with him in his opinions and movements? All these questions must be answered in the negative. No such thing. They generally regard this man as a deluded fanatic, if not something worse.—How then came this man by his views? Is he the first in all the earth who has preached about the end of the world? Is this notion about the end of the world a new thing in the Christian community? No, surely it is not. The learned doctors of the church, all the divinity schools in christendom, and nearly, if not all, professors of the Christian religion have been of Mr. Miller's sentiments for ages. Not that they have all fixed the time as he has; but the event, to take place some time, they have all believed.

We see now the true answer to our first query. Mr. Miller was educated from childhood to believe as the clergy believed and preached; and he, as well as every body else, knows that an event, which is certainly to take place, must take place at some certain time. Knowing this, like a sensible man, he rationally concluded that if the Scriptures reveal such an event, they also point out the time; not to a day or an hour, but near enough for people to make such arrangements in regard to it as prudence and good economy would dictate. Being of this opinion, Mr. Miller went to work in earnest to search the Scriptures to learn from the faithful word of prophecy, when this event would come.—The result of his researches satisfies him that the present year will witness the fulfilment of what the Scriptures teach concerning the end of the world. Is there any thing unreasonable in all this? If there is, why do not our learned doctors not only point out his mistake, but show us when this event is to happen.—For centuries past, the clergy have made nearly all their converts by the use of this most terrible, and truly awful event. They have represented the end of the world in such a manner, and with such terrors that the feeble nerves of the human system were, in many instances unable to endure the horror. After all this, now that Mr. Miller comes to the people, as if he really believes what all the clergy have been so long frightening the people with, the clergy are as cold and as indifferent towards him, as they would have been if they had never heard a word about the end of the world in all their lives!

What are these learned doctors going to do in future? Will they go on as heretofore, and try to frighten weak mortals with eloquent descriptions of those lively horrors attendant on the burning up of the world?

It seems reasonable to call on them to point out, if they can, one passage in all the Bible which speaks of this event. H. B.

Endless Misery not Christianity.

Christianity commands its votaries to love their enemies, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, render good for evil; that they may be imitators of their Father in heaven, who maketh the sun to shine on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. Endless misery is the reverse of this. It teaches that the sinner must suffer an eternity of suffering to satisfy justice. It says God will render eternal evil for the evil that man has done in this life.

Suppose at the judgment seat, the question should be proposed, why God was about to torment a part of his offspring world without end? The answer is, because they did not do as I commanded them—to love their enemies—to render good for evil, &c. Now see the inconsistency of this doctrine. God is about to 'inflict immortal pains' upon his erring offspring because they did not do the above acts of charity as Christianity commanded, that they might be imitators of their Father. How can God consistently command his children to imitate Him by loving all, if He is at one time to hate his enemies, and inflict upon them an endless evil? This is a singular way to remove an evil by perpetrating a greater one.

In conversation with an individual upon this subject, he was pressed so hard for arguments to sustain this theory, that he was obliged to say that God might hate his enemies in the future state. Then if it is right for God to hate his enemies, it is right for his children to do so, that they may imitate their Father. And it seems as if some had already commenced to 'walk in the name of the Lord their God,' as the prophet declares. Why did John Calvin burn Michael Servetus over a pile of green wood? Because he believed that God instead of rendering good for evil would confine the souls of heretics in the flames of endless woes. What made Tertullian say, 'How shall I admire, how laugh, how rejoice, how exult, when I behold so many kings, worshipped as Gods in heaven, together with Jove himself, groaning in the lowest abyss of darkness?' Because he partook largely of the spirit of his doctrine.

But how different are the precepts of Christianity. Instead of teaching us to rejoice over suffering humanity, it commands us to do something for its alleviation; to weep with those who weep, and to succor the distressed. Endless misery, therefore, is not Christianity. It is opposed to its precepts. It is at war with all heaven; at war with those philanthropic efforts which are made for the meleoration of the down-trodden of our race.

Suppose that there is to be suffering humanity hereafter; will not the precepts of Christianity there—to love our enemies, render good for evil, to do as we would be done by, to love our neighbors as we do ourselves—be as binding upon the followers of Christ, as well as in this world? Is heaven any less benevolent than this world?

Let us admit for a moment the stale objection, that of 'no change after death;' what follows? Why mankind will be subjected to a variety of troubles and sorrows; to anguish and disappointment; to pains, poverty and mental misery. But is not Christianity the same? Where then is John Howard, the friend of the friendless, who visited nearly all the prisons and jails in England, Ireland and Scotland? Where is Jesus, the sinner's friend, 'who in this life, constantly went about doing good?' Is he changed?

O no! his favors never end;
He's there, as here, the sinner's friend.'

Grant then the truth of the objection, of 'no change after death'; and it follows that the inhabitants of heaven will be in possession of the same sympathetic feelings that they were while upon earth. Now let those who inhabit the climes of immortal purity, behold their dearest friends in the 'land of horror and despair,' lashed to the rock of eternal death, in the midst of that awful ocean, whose surges are liquid fire and whose surrounding atmosphere is living flame, and the sight would unparadise the realms of glory, and silence the heavenly song of redemption. But we rejoice in believing that though

Earthly friendships fade,
Fondest ties may sever;
That Jesus' love knows no decay,
His friendship lives forever! E. H. L.

Elder Knapp and his Reporter.

In the course of his Sermon at the Marlborough Chapel on Thursday evening last, Elder Knapp took occasion to allude to his great Sermon against Universalism, preached recently in Salem, wherein he says, 'the backbone of that doctrine is broken;' and also to bring in the 'Reporter,' head and shoulders, who he said publicly from the pulpit, garbled the matter in taking it down, and 'made pretty English of it altogether!' It is not at all surprising that Elder Knapp should manifest such alarm and displeasure on seeing himself in print in connection with a discourse so full of obloquy and denunciation, as that pronounced at Salem, particularly after the passion which had dictated it, had in some measure subsided. But touching the correctness of that Report, the Reporter is ready at any time to bring forward an hundred or more attentive listeners, of every denomination, present at the time, who will vouch for its correctness; and he believes nearly every one in the Hall that night, would have the candor, at least, to say it was literally correct. The Reporter confesses that he took the liberty in writing out his notes to alter the manner, but not the matter, of certain expressions used, for the purpose of making prettier English than even the Elder did himself, and for this he certainly deserves his thanks. For instance, the Elder often spoke of the 'cissing of the fiery serpents,' which phrase the Reporter thought might be improved by substituting the participle hissing; and when the Elder in the heat of his anathemas, used such words as 'darzen't' for durst not, or 'yinder' for yonder, 'sperit' for spirit, 'them are' for those, 'rare up' for rear up, 'begrutch' for grudge, 'across' for across, 'chimbly' for chimney, 'contrerry' for contrary, 'catchise' for catechism, 'chaw' for chew, 'dazzler' for dandruff, 'isu-kle' for icicle, 'mash' for smash, 'drownd' for drown, 'disfaced' for defaced, 'pizen' for poison, and various other gems of beauty, he was at first undecided, as such beauties were numerous, whether to hang them up in a cluster in the appendix to the sermon, as lord Timothy Dexter did his punctuation, and let the reader pepper and salt the rare dish to suit himself. But he finally took the responsibility of 'garbling' them from the vernacular into the mother tongue, and thus make as pretty English of the mass as possible.

When the Reporter was engaged to report the Sermon referred to, Elder Knapp had announced that he should break the back-bone of Universalism on Wednesday evening. Agreeably to this announcement, the Reporter was in the seat; but the Elder seeing a 'chiel among them takin notes,' and knowing that words however well they may answer to effect a specific object, are at most but wind, and soon escape the memory, unless treasured up by those grim accusers, the types, thought proper to postpone the discourse to the next evening, when, if no Reporter were present, he might have verge or scope enough for the powerful action of his mind. But the Reporter was there the next evening, and placing a planed board furnished for the occasion, between his legs, and a quarter of a ream of white paper by his side, he bent his back in good earnest to the business before him. But the Elder was not long in discovering him—his eyes are black and piercing, and the glance quickly penetrated to the seat where the busy note of preparation was going on. The Reporter's back-bone bent now to the task, and nearly broken by two hours toil, was doomed to receive a broad side from the pulpit. The Elder gave a sharp look, and then piled on the agony by denouncing him as the Devil's Secretary, sent there on purpose to take notes. But he bore it all like a martyr, and kept the pencil hard at work, until the preacher said amen.

But such bitter malediction, and personal ill-feeling, as were exhibited from the pulpit, on that evening, and on other occasions, is a subject which should not be treated with levity. How solemn is the reflection to the christian mind, when a minister of the gospel, who professes to bear the Cross of Christ, and exhibit on his forehead the holy seal of the church, who as one of the 'heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ,' is commanded to 'walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,' to descend to such a course.—How can such a one sing a song to the Lamb when he hangs the harp on the willow, and sounds the voice of dissonance throughout the church? Are these the divine precepts of the Saviour, the 'friend of publicans and sinners' who was all gentleness and goodness and humility, whose mission on earth was guided by the pure spirit of divine love, and who came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance'? Wm. B. English.

A Scene at the late General Convention.

The table for the feast was spread;
And, on the sacred board,
They placed the wine and broken bread,
In memory of our Lord.

Disciples from the East and North,
The West and South were there;
And every grateful heart poured forth
Its blessings and its prayer.

Old Age with locks of silvery grey,
And Manhood in its pride,
And Youth, in Life's sweet, sunny May,
Sat, humbled, side by side.

The gifted with his thoughtful eye,
The beautiful, in tears,
The lame, the blind, the low and high
Met there as friends and peers.

The sinful came with contrite heart,
The mourning with her woe;
None asked, Does Judas take a part?
None could have answered, No!

'Twas not in Pharisaic pride
We met to share that feast;
God pardon, if our heart denied
To own itself the least!

Among the crowd one strange deep voice
Rose, nerved with thrilling power;
One heart coined burning words and choice
To suit the solemn hour.

He spoke—that reverend man of God,
With no cold, studied art;
He felt his Saviour's guiding Word,
*Fell trickling on his heart!

Of other days, less bright, he spoke;
Of Truth's dim, clouded morn,
When our refulgent Faith awoke
Like something newly born.

Of troubled times, and laborers few,
Of veterans long departed;
Of living patriarchs tried and true,
The loved and faithful—hearted.

Of those who stood there in their prime,
The Young, the Good, the Zealous,
In contrast with the olden time,
He strove, in tears to tell us.

And then he spoke of failing strength,
Of feeble frame and speech,
And knew not to what future length
His own ripe age might reach.

But hoped when 'neath the waving grass
His lifeless frame should lie,
And those who loved him here—should pass
His humble tablet by,

No shameful act of his should rise,
A grim ghost to the night,
And taunt the Daughter of the skies
With deeds her son had wrought.

He trusted, though he had not earned
A proud and starring fame,
His humble dust might be inurned
Beneath a spotless name.

And who, amid that tearful crowd,
Felt not his heart gush forth,
In blessings earnest, deep, and proud,
Upon that good man's worth!

God bless him with serene old age—
With health, and strength, and rest;
And in the star-a-bidden page;
Be he FOREVER blest!

Shirley-Village, Mass. S. C. E.

*Those present at the Communion of the late General Convention, will not forget this thrilling expression of the speaker.

LINES

Suggested by the article entitled 'HERO OF TRUTH,' in the 'Trumpet' of the 31st ult.

How sweet those moving sounds which float
Through the elastic air!
From Shirley Village comes each note,
Sung by the village Fair.

Her head has worn a garland bright,
And plac'd it on the brow
Of the most humble in the fight
For truth, which triumphs now.

Will jealous envy, think ye, frown,
And of these lays complain?
Will superstition, cowl and gown,
Cast on the maid disdain?

Bright eyes beheld in Elah's vale
The haughty giant stand;
They saw the host of Israel quail
Before his gitt'ring hand.

Then prayers went up to God, defied;
Matrons and maidens pray'd;
The fervent prayer was not denied,
Nor was relief delay'd.

A beardless youth, to their surprise,
With neither sword nor shield,
Who on the Holy Name relies,
Now boldly takes the field.

Fain would the giant daunt the youth,
And spurn him from his sight;
A stranger to the power of truth,
With truth he cared to fight.

One stroke, unerring, laid him low,
And shouts of victory rose,
And taught the enemy to know
The strength he would oppose.

Then in the dance, with tabrets sweet,
Matrons and maidens sung,
And did the Hero warmly greet,
While joyful music rung.

If Zion's daughters then, of yore,
Crown'd the triumphant youth,
Should not her maidens now much more
Laud heaven's victorious truth! H. B.

The Triumph of Faith.

Alexander triumphed over a world of warriors, and Newton over a universe of philosophical mysteries. Napoleon passed in glory the Alpine gates, which nature had lifted up to heaven, and bolted with eternal ice;—while Columbus plucked the laurels that blossomed beyond an unknown world of waters.

But the triumphs of faith surpass in glory, the united conquests of these heroes of the earth! Having overcome the world and purified the heart, she plants her flag upon the rock of Divinity, and exultingly exclaims, 'O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?'—Holman.

Boston:

Universalism in Boston.

The first Universalist Society in Boston is of long standing. John Murray was probably the first Universalist who ever preached in Boston. He came into the town in October, 1773, and preached in various places, and among others at the Factory, so called, which stood near where Park Street Church now stands, at Faneuil Hall, and at the French Protestant Church (Mr. Coswell's) in School Street. The Second Universalist Church now covers a part of the same lot.—Universalism continued to find friends, not the least of whom was Thomas Handyside Peck, the maternal grandfather of our present highly respected citizen, Hon. Thomas Handyside Perkins. On the death of Dr. Samuel Mather, the Society to which he had ministered sold their Meeting-House, on the corner of Hanover and Bennett Streets, to the Universalists. This took place in 1785.—They had occasional preaching until October, 1793, when Mr. Murray was called from Gloucester, and settled as pastor. He was succeeded by Rev. Edward Mitchell in 1810, who was succeeded by Rev. Paul Dean in 1813, who was succeeded by the present excellent pastor, Rev. S. Streeter in 1824.

The old house was a homely wooden edifice; but there has seldom been a happier congregation than the one that for years assembled in it. The site is a good one, in the old section of the city, and what used to be the court part of the town. The old edifice was removed in 1808, and a new and commodious brick Church was built on the same spot, which was dedicated on the first day of January, 1809. The following is a view of the edifice:

FIRST UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

SECOND UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY.

This was formed in 1817. Universalists had increased in numbers, and a Meeting-House was much needed near the center of the city. A lot was purchased in School Street, nearly opposite the City Hall, and a large, substantial brick edifice was erected thereon, containing about 150 pews. This house was dedicated on October 16, 1817. It is without a steeple, and is 75 feet long and 67 broad. The present worthy pastor, Rev. Hosea Ballou, was installed on the 25th of December, 1817. The following is a view of the Church:

SECOND UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

The Third, or Central Universalist Meeting-House in Boston, was erected in Bulinch Street. The Society was incorporated Jan. 31st, 1823, by the name of the 'Central Universalist Society.' The corner-stone of the edifice had been laid Oct. 7th, 1822. Rev. Paul Dean was the first pastor. He apostatized from Universalism, and went over to our enemies the Unitarians, in May, 1840, having used his influence previously to obtain an alteration of the name, from Central Universalist to 'Bulfinch Street Society.'—This measure was vigorously opposed by the early and steadfast friends of the Society, who remonstrated to the Legislature. About the time of the resignation of Mr. Dean, the Unitarians, in an underhand and unjustifiable manner, obtained possession of the house, under the pretext that they wished to keep Mr. Dean in his place, whereas one of the first acts they performed was to get rid of him. He has now no settlement as a pastor. Rev. F. T. Gray, a bitter enemy of Universalists and Universalism is now minister of this Church; but it seems almost impossible that the present state of things can long continue. Having stated these facts, we shall give the following view:

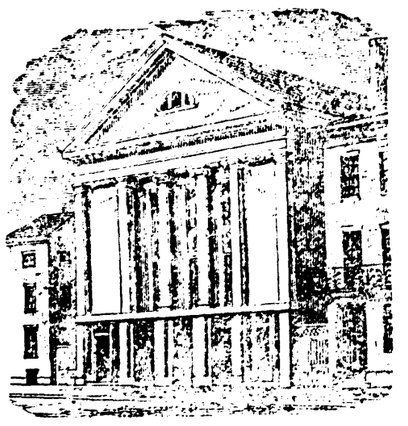
THIRD UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

The Fourth Universalist Meeting-House in Boston, stands on Broadway, in that section of the city called South Boston. The Society was gathered in 1830, under the labors of Br. Benjamin Whittemore. It worshipped for some time in a hall, and afterwards erected a commodious wooden edifice of which the following is a tolerable view. It was dedicated in April 1833.

FOURTH UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

FIFTH UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY.

This Society was formed in January 1835, principally of members from the Second Society. It worshipped three years in Boylston Hall, during which time their present pastor, Rev. Otis A. Skinner, was settled, a church was formed, and many advances made in the path of prosperity. The Meeting-House stands on Warren Street. It is a handsome brick structure, with an ornamented front.—The House contains 105 pews, and every pew is occupied. About eleven hundred persons can be seated. It is furnished with a fine organ. In the basement there is a large vestry and three school rooms. The Church consists of about 350 members. There are two Sabbath Schools connected with this Society, consisting of nearly 400 children and 70 teachers. We have yet at a view of the Church edifice.



FIFTH UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

SIXTH UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY.

The Sixth Universalist Society in the city is at East Boston, of which Rev. Sylvanus Cobb is pastor. It has hitherto worshipped in a small chapel; but is now building a fine Meeting-House, in that section which is nearest the main city.

Air Essential to Digestion.

During the mastication of the food, there is secreted in the mouth, from organs specially destined to this function, a fluid, the saliva, which possesses the remarkable property of enclosing air, in the shape of froth, in a far higher degree than even soap suds. This air by means of the saliva, reaches the stomach with the food, and there its oxygen enters into combination, while its nitrogen is given out the skin and lungs. The longer digestion continues, that is the greater resistance offered by the solvent action of the food, the more saliva, and, consequently the more air enters the stomach. Rumination in certain granivorous animals, has plainly, for one object, a renewed and repeated introduction of oxygen; for a more minute mechanical division of the food only shortens the time required for solution.

Total abstinence from food above seven days is fatal to man, but there are instances of surviving after a longer period. A religious fanatic, in 1759, determined to fast 40 days, but died on the 15th.

To Parents.

Would a farmer take a beautiful horse to be shod to an unskillful blacksmith, that a penny or two may be saved? He will not; for says he, 'the nail may be so driven in the foot as to make it lame, and I shall lose my horse. No, I had rather give a few more, than run the risk of losing my noble Charlie.'

Two teachers apply for the school in the district. The one is ignorant, but he offers to teach for $10 per month; the other is experienced, but asks $30 per month. The parents meet, and the $10 man is employed.—That the young mind is a more delicate thing to handle than a horse's foot is not perceived; and that the child is much more easily ruined by want of skill is never dreamed of.

A farmer sits in his door and sees a stranger coming through the gate. The traveller approaches and asks the farmer if he does not want to hire a hand. The farmer answers, 'Yes, if I can get one to suit me.'—And then he puts the following questions to the stranger: 'Can you drive team? Can you mow? Can you cradle?' &c. He is catechised most thoroughly.

Immediately after another stranger asks him if this school does not want to hire a teacher? The only question which the farmer asks is, 'How much do you ask a month, Sir?' We ask the reader to remark the difference in the examination of the two applicants.

Again, the parent will either work with the hired man, or his son will do so to prevent the laborer from slighting his work, or from wasting a moment's time. Or he will get his neighbor to peep over the fence occasionally, to see that the hired man does not sit down on his plough too often. But the same watchful parent will put a man over his children in the school house and never go near him for years! For the above facts I have never been able to account.

Secondly. Parents will labor and live sparingly all their lives, to give their children a 'start,' as it is called. But setting a young man afloat with money left him, is like tying bladders under the arms of one who cannot swim. Ten chances to one he will lose his bladders and go to the bottom. Teach him to swim and he will never need the bladders. Give a child a sound education, and then you have given him a 'start' that will enable happiness and victory to the race.

'A good education is a young man's best capital,' was truly and beautifully said by Miss Sedgwick. And formerly, listen to ex-Governor Everett; he has spoken the following:—

'Husbandman, sow the seed of instruction in your sons' and daughters' minds. It will grow up and bear fruit, though the driving storm scatter the blossoms of spring. Plant the germ of truth in the infant understandings of your children—save—stint—spare—scrape—do any thing but steal—in order to nourish that growth, and it is little to say that it will flourish when your grave stones, crumbled into dust, shall mingle with the dust they covered; it will flourish when the overarching heaven shall pass away like a scroll, and the eternal sun which lightens it shall set in blood.'

If a blacksmith should put up a sign, 'Watches mended cheap,' would you take your gold lever to him? If you should, the grave having heard that the silversmith, rubbed, would do the same? So with the cheap teacher; he takes the children, and rubs and pinches, and hammers them,—but would they keep time?

If a parent could stand on the shore of the Atlantic, and with one blow knock out all the light houses, would he not be accountable for all the shipwrecks, made during that darkness? And if the parent, through avarice or negligence sets a school from his child the light of learning, is he not responsible for the crimes he may commit?

I have always noticed that law of the Icelanders, who in a case of murder, the court inquire when a child is arraigned, whether the parents have given the offender a good education. And if not, the court inflicts the punishment on the parent.

The parent that at any rate procures his child a good moral principled and tempered, makes a better purchase for him, than to lay out the money to enlarge his farm.

Spare the child in his sleds, toys and playgrounds, in sash and ribbons as you please, but be most sparing in his education. It is not good husbandry to leave his fortune rich and his mind poor.—Common School Assistant.

A young Lady locked up in Church.

On Sunday evening, the 6th of October, a young lady, named Wood, attended divine service at the village church at Eastry, near Sandwich; but, not heeding to the fatigues of the day or sultriness of the weather, her animal functions became exhausted and she gently and gradually fell into the arms of 'quiet nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep,' nor did she awake until near 10 o'clock—about an hour and a half after the rest of the congregation had quitted the sacred edifice.—On rousing from her slumbers, the fear of spectres and hobgoblins filled her mind with terror, the white marble tablets, which were slightly discernible on the walls, seemed to her imagination like so many disembodied spirits hovering over their mouldering ashes; she was in the land of the dead. Scream succeeded scream; yet no one came. She tried the windows and doors, but they were all locked and barred; there was no way of escape. Fortunately, however, just as she was giving up her case as hopeless, a person happened to pass through the churchyard on his way homeward, and, hearing some uncommon noise in the church, went and informed the clergyman of the circumstance. The clergyman referred him to the sexton, who, procuring a light, went to ascertain the cause of the noise, when he found the young lady trembling violently with fear. She was immediately conducted home, and we are happy to state, has completely recovered from her fright.—Dover (Eng.) Chronicle.

Sorrows. It is beautifully said, that life has no abiding sorrows, for they are as clouds the quicker they ascend the heavens, the quicker they pass away; and those which stand still the ether drinks in, and they grow smaller and smaller until they disappear.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1843.

The Catholics,—the Convent, &c. &c.

We stated last week, that the Catholic journal of this city (the 'Pilot') had attacked us with some severity. Being accustomed to such kind of treatment, it has not disturbed our good nature at all. We bless God we live in a land where there is no Inquisition, no auto da fe, no Pope, no cardinals; but where our head is safe on our shoulders, even though we express our opinion with freedom in regard to matters affecting the Papal church. We have no enmity to the Catholics. We know but little about them, except so far as we have learned the spirit of their Church from impartial history.

The Convent was destroyed on the 11th of August, 1834, by an unlawful assemblage of men. Great excitement had been produced in consequence of the elopement of a Nun, who had complained of great ill usage, and who had been carried back within the walls of the Convent.—It was believed she was held there against her wishes, and that the intention was to send her away to Canada. The excited community applied for information, but could get none. The Selectmen of Charlestown applied, with some of the neighbors, in order to gain information to quiet the public; but they were treated with great disrespect by the Superior, as the lady in charge was called. All these circumstances combined to raise an excitement which the Catholics took no proper means to quiet, and the result was the destruction of all the buildings of the Institution. No lives were lost, nor were any of the inmates molested on retiring from the grounds. The site was on the summit of 'Ploughed Hill,' an eminence somewhat famous in the seige of Boston, under that name; but the Catholics had discarded the old revolutionary appellation, and baptized the hill under the name of 'Mount Benedict.' These things tended to irritate the public mind; and joined to the strong aversion the people had to a Convent, and to the circumstances of the elopement of the Nun, who was believed to be unjustly and illegally imprisoned there, and to the unwillingness of the Superior to give any information, and to the air of insolence she assumed, gave rise to the mob who destroyed the edifice. We spoke at the time in our columns, precisely as we speak now, in deep terms of condemnation of the mob. Their conduct was altogether unjustifiable, unlawful, and of dangerous tendency. We regretted then, as we regret now, that the Catholics did not take early and judicious measures to allay the public excitement. Such have been our sentiments from the beginning.

We promised to give our readers the article from the Catholic journal, which appeared last week. The principal part of it is here subjoined:

The Trumpet, a journal as eminent for its stupidity as for its crude and unchristian bigotries, is alarmed at the indications of a more just sentiment on the subject of the Convent, and twaddles along through a column of the most assinine attempts at reasoning, to show that there is a movement—a 'vigorous effort' making to put this question at rest by the granting of tardy justice. We feel no anger when we read such effusions as that in the last 'Trumpet,' thickly as it may be interlarded with the standard epithets against the 'benighted Catholics,' because we conclude that its feeble author reasons as clearly as his limited capacity will permit, and perhaps from a stronger motive, which is, that it cannot influence a single person.

As a specimen of the logic which usually sparkles in the columns of the 'Trumpet,' we will give the purport of the closing part of his very ridiculous article last week. He says:

Now the gist of this reasoning is this: the people of Boston have nothing to do with the honor of the State; at least they should measure their interference in the matter in proportion to the activity of other towns, which if they did, would amount to nothing at all. If we can see anything in this logic of the 'Trumpet,' it is a censure upon Charlestown and other places for having done nothing, and per consequence, praise to Boston for having done much, although the gentlemen who hold the consciences of the Universalists, never meant to drive at such a conclusion. The editor of the 'Trumpet' is evidently unable to comprehend the higher elements of political justice that enter into this question, and cannot therefore be expected to reason with much force or perspicuity upon it.

Such is the spirit of the article from the 'Pilot.' Wherein have we given occasion for it? We believe we spoke in respectful terms of the Catholics, although perhaps we asserted truths which were not welcome. However, we shall not be disturbed, least of all shall we be made angry.—We have a faculty to govern our temper when we determine to do so.

We have certain questions to propose for the consideration of the public.

1st. Did the Catholics take all the means to prevent the destruction of the Convent, which they might have done, and ought to have done? Did they not rather inflame than soothe the public mind?

2d. After the unlawful proceedings of the mob, did not the Catholics have precisely the same facilities for obtaining justice that the Protestants have? Were not the law-officers all ready to assist them? Were not the Courts open to them? Did not the judges, jurors, and the Attorney General spend weeks, yea months, in endeavoring to develope truth, and convict and sentence the offenders? Did not the Catholics enjoy every privilege in this respect that any of our citizens ever enjoyed?

3d. Has it been customary for the Commonwealth from its own Treasury to make indemnification in cases of this kind? If a poor man's house is burned down by the midnight incendiary, will the Commonwealth make indemnification?—Has this principle been considered sound? The Commonwealth is under just as much obligation to protect me from the midnight incendiary as from the mob; and if it will make indemnification in the one case, it ought to do so in the other?—When the poor families in Broad Street a few years ago, were driven out of their houses by a mob, and every thing they had in the world was despoiled and ruined, the gentlemen who are now so earnest to obtain an indemnification for the Convent, gave themselves no concern. No, the poor might suffer and die for aught these gentlemen did; but they are very eloquent in their entreaties to have indemnification made for the Convent. Why were they so little moved on the one subject, and so greatly moved on the other? Is it so much more necessary to take care of the rich than the poor? The Catholic Church as such is rich; and the owners of the Convent lands are rich, whoever they may be.

4th. Is not the main question after all the following? Shall the Commonwealth rebuild the Convent? We have no doubt, that the walls will rise again; that a batch of nuns will be brought here from Canada, or imported from Europe; and that the odious spectacle of a nunnery will be seen again upon that sacred eminence of the revolution, now ycleped 'Mount Benedict.'

New Hampshire Orthodoxy.

The Universalist presses seem animated with more than common malignity by recent instances of defection from their faith. Our readers will bear witness to the courtesy and respect with which we have spoken of the defenders of this erroneous, and, as we believe, fatal doctrine, whenever we have had occasion to notice their movements or principles; and whatever may be the return we receive for expressions of kindly regard, the only weapons we shall continue to use will be light and love. The Universalist Trumpet seems for weeks to have forgotten all other cares and labors, in its attentions to us; it says, in the charity of which it boasts so much, the 'Concord editor would like to have the necks of all the Universalists in the land united in one, for the pleasure of stretching it.' We desire not to lengthen the neck of Rev. Mr. Whittemore, but his probation, for which both his spirit and language show their is great necessity, if a well used probation is connected with eternal life.

It may pain our Universalist friends, but we cannot help it, to be informed that to our certain knowledge, a number of respectable men in different towns in this vicinity, who have heretofore been the strenuous advocates of Universalism, have recently renounced it as a system altogether unsatisfactory and false, and now are building up the faith they once labored to destroy.

'Animated with more than common malignity.' Not so, brother. We have no malignity—our religion will not allow of it. The stripes we have applied, we have put on in love, never in malice. We are sorry you do not bear them with more patience.

Our friend boasts of having spoken of Universalists with 'courtesy and respect.' Is the man insane? Universalists have scarcely been dealt with more ferociously by any editor. Our readers will call to mind his description of the late U. S. Convention at Providence, a body which he misrepresented in an unpardonable manner, and when we pointed out to him his errors, he had not the 'courtesy' to correct the mistake.

He calls Universalism a 'fatal' doctrine. Fatal to what? It is fatal to his Orthodoxy. It has almost killed it already, and will finish the work before long. In this sense, and in this only, is Universalism a fatal doctrine.

We beg him to spare his 'kindly regard.' Call it by some other name, Br. Wood. You have hated us, taunted us, misrepresented and opposed us ungenerously in almost every point of view; and now you call it 'kindly regard.' This is putting 'bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter.' We shall be glad to see you begin to use the 'weapons of light and love.' You have never yet used them to our knowledge. Your weapons have been 'carnal,' and therefore you have not prospered.

Our readers and the public at large may know the spirit Mr. Wood has manifested, from our remark, that 'if all the Universalists in the land had but one neck, he would stretch it.' He now says, he does not wish to lengthen Mr. Whittemore's neck, but his PROBATION.' Yes probation! The clergy have talked a great deal about probation. The 'day of probation' has been their everlasting cry. But where do they read in the Bible about the day of probation?—Can they find the word probation any where in the Scriptures? No, it is not there. We will excuse Mr. Wood for not lengthening what never had any existence. Tell us, Br. Wood, in what chapter and verse you find the word. You seem to be very anxious for our salvation. If God is as good as you, our soul is safe.

Br. Wood closes by saying, that a number of respectable men in different towns in his vicinity have renounced Universalism. And who are they? We suppose Rev. E. Dow counts only one, unless he now have three persons in one individual.—How then will Mr. Wood make out more than one? We will not press him on this point however, but merely observe, that 'it may pain our Partialist friends, but we cannot help it, to be informed that to our certain knowledge, a number of respectable men (aye, and ladies too,) in different towns in this vicinity, who have heretofore been the stenuous advocates of endless misery, have recently renounced it as a system altogether unsatisfactory and false, and now are building up the faith they once labored to destroy.'

The Half Year has Closed.

The half year has closed; the specified time for paying in advance has passed. We are sorry to say, that our receipts this year have fallen far below what they invariably have been at this season. Will our patrons, in the different parts of the country, be kind enough to send in the amount they owe? Let them take the money to the Post Master, and he will enclose it in a letter, and send it free of expence to them. This is the season in which we expect to hear from all our AGENTS. Short settlements make long friends. Frequent settlements prevent mistakes. We must hear from all. Those who owe for books are informed that the paper-maker and printer and binder want their pay. And how shall we pay them unless we collect what is due us for books? Before closing we would observe, that owing to the hardness of the times, we shall not be strict about the day for advance payment. Money sent in for two or three weeks will be regarded as in advance. If you have no opportunity to send by private conveyance, do not fail to hand the sum you owe to the Post Master, with a request to forward it by mail.

Foreknowledge and Accountability.

We have neglected until the present time to assign a reason for suspending the discussion on Foreknowledge and Accountability. It will be remembered that we stated at the commencement, we should publish but little on either side. Such controversies are generally unprofitable. Articles kept pouring in, not only from the two primary disputants, but from several others, each of whom claimed that he had a clearer and speedier way of settling the difficulty than any one had put forth. We saw, if we did not stop at once, there would soon be no place where we could stop. It is our duty to bear testimony to the good spirit in which the controversy was carried on; and in regard to the variety of articles which have come to hand from various quarters, we decline their publication without the slightest disrespect to their authors.

Puffing.

Our Unitarian brethren are well known to be the most notorious puffers in the world. They are constantly puffing one another. This has been a habit among them for a long time, both in this country and in England. It was the habit of Belsham and his contemporaries, it is the habit of the present English Unitarians, and also of the Unitarians of this country. We have recently seen in the papers of the city a regular built puff of Rev. F. T. Gray, who we suppose needs puffing as much as any body else. He is published in the city papers as a 'valued Pastor;' we are reminded of 'the modest worth of this unassuming divine;' we are besought to remember 'his social interchanges of friendly visits with his church—the joyous smile of welcome that is ever upon his lips to greet the visitor at his study—the easy strain of general conversation which whiles away the fleeting hours most mysteriously—COMBINED with the attractive society of his accomplished and kind hearted lady, throw a spell about his influence upon the minds of his young friends, that endears him to them by the most sacred ties of life, and day by day this friendship is cemented by some new act of kindness,' &c. &c. We will say but little of the presentation of 'a splendid silver pitcher,' to which Mr. Gray 'feelingly and appropriately alluded in concluding his discourse on Sunday.'

What now would a sensible man infer from the above? Would he not conclude that the Unitarian denomination were greatly in the habit of puffing their own members? Would he not conclude too that there is some pressing need for this puffing of Mr. Gray? What does it all amount to? Who does not know how little cause in general there really is for such things? Who will think any better of Mr. Gray? We are always half tempted to believe, when we see such extravagant puffing as the above, that there is some weakness or deficiency in the pastor; that he fails to attract attention; and that these newspaper puffs are merely attempts to beat up for recruits to the congregation. We should be more suspicious than ever that he was not doing well, and that these puffs were designed to accomplish for him, what he could not accomplish for himself.

When we first saw this puff extraordinary we asked ourself the question, will the 'Christian Register' countenance this? Suppose the example should be followed by all the Societies; suppose every Boston pastor should get such a tremendous puffing (and we have no doubt they are all as worthy of it as Mr. Gray is), the papers would not be able to contain it; every one of them would have to be enlarged to a mammoth sheet. And would this be a desirable state of things? Would this suit our nice and exquisite neighbors? We did not know therefore but the 'Register' would give a gentle reproof; but far from it, the article is copied in full into its columns, at the request of some person who hides his real name, and uses the signature 'M. G.'

Unholy Opposition.

The spirit which reigns in some men's hearts towards the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all men, may be seen from the following article which we copy from 'Zion's Herald.' It is from the pen of Rev. J D. Bridge, of Saugus, who certainly knows not 'what manner of spirit he is of.' Let him examine his own heart, and see if all is right there. He speaks of Universalism as the 'abomination that maketh desolate,' and then proceeds to say,—

Deism and Atheism are too gross errors for most men to receive; but Universalism, having a semblance of Christianity, is listened to, sought after, embraced, by many, very many, who would start with horror at the idea of open infidelity.—And yet, if the Bible be true, Universalism is as sure a passport to hell as Atheism itself. It is utterly impossible for a man to be an intelligent Universalist, and be a Christian. Why? Because modern Universalism denies Christianity outright. Read M. H. Smith's new work, and see if you have any doubts on this point. I admit that some Universalists are good neighbors and citizens—moral men; and they would be so professing Deism; but they are not and cannot be Christians; and it is high time that all the evangelical denominations in New England, in the spirit of decisive kindness, let Universalists and the world understand that they cannot be recognized, under any circumstances, as sustaining the Christian character. I say under any circumstances, not even on a funeral occasion, can an Orthodox or Methodist minister unite with Universalists; and if not on such an occasion, certainly not in the impious mockeries of a Universalist prayer-meeting.

We will not say that Mr. Bridge is not speculatively a Christian. He believes, it is true, in some heathen doctrines; but acknowledging Christ as his divine Master, we acknowledge him theoretically a Christian. But what is his spirit? Is it the spirit of Christ? Is it the spirit of love?—Is it the spirit of 'compassion on the ignorant, and those who are out of the way?' No, it is the spirit of wrath, anger, malice, and evil speaking; and it excites only pity for the man who cherishes it.

It is a small matter to us to be judged of men. There is a higher tribunal. We know that when our divine Master was on the earth, the world would acknowledge no good thing in him. His enemies said he had a devil. Shall we expect to be treated better than he was? As to Mr. Bridge, we have but slight reasons to regret his opposition. We are sorry indeed for a man to show such malice; we are sorry to see such weakness of mind; but what he may say is of small account. We do not believe his language will find an approval in every Methodist's heart. If so, they misrepresent themselves. Mr. Bridge is probably a man of small consideration in the Methodist Church. He aspires to be eminent; but he has not the ability. We have no doubt that his article will be lamented by many of the members of the Methodist Church. As to the propriety of publishing such articles in the 'Herald,' Mr. Stevens, the editor must himself be the judge. If he thinks it best to make his paper the vehicle of abuse and slander towards his neighbors, he can do so; but we can assure him that it will not redound to the honor either of him or his cause.

The Orthodox are making a serious effort to regain their power in the town of Epping, N. H.—They have built a new meeting-house, in which they have placed a bell; they have ordained a clergyman (Rev. Mr. Chapman, from the Andover Theological School), and the doctrine of the Trinity has been introduced into the Town Lyceum as a question for discussion. Let the Universalists in New-Hampshire be awake; their enemies are making great efforts to re-establish themselves in that State.

Tormenting Mankind.

The christian religion was designed for the happiness and consolation of mankind. It was announced with the joyful acclamation, 'Peace on earth, and good will to men.' Jesus came to give the weary rest. 'Come unto me,' said he, 'all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' Matt. xi. 28. Paul to the Hebrews speaks of 'joy and peace in believing' the gospel. To the Hebrews he says, 'We who have believed do enter into rest.' And Peter, in a highly emphatic manner says, 'Believing we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.' Almighty God said, by the prophet, 'Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem.' Isaiah xl. 1, 2. This is sufficient to show, that the whole design of the gospel of Christ, is to give happiness and consolation to men.

Is this the design of the revival preachers of the present day? We should gladly say yes, if we could do it in truth; but we know to the contrary; and to convince our readers that such have an entirely different design in their labors, we beg leave to submit to them the following facts. An account of a four days meeting at N. J. went the rounds sometime since in the orthodox journals, from which there is no doubt that the whole time was spent by the preachers in endeavors to frighten and torment the audiences that assembled.—That we may not be suspected of exaggeration, we give the following extracts from the narration, which was drawn up by the clergyman of the society with whom the meeting was held. The extracts follow:

'Twenty or thirty were ANXIOUS about their salvation.'

'In the afternoon, Mr. Judd, of Bloomfield, preached; and in the church the spirit of God was at work, searching the hearts, and shaking the hopes of professors of religion; many were in GREAT DISTRESS, and sadness sat on many faces. [Query. Is it not blasphemy to attribute such operations to the spirit of God? Jesus said, 'The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath annointed me to preach good tidings—to bind up the broken hearted,' not to break their hearts. Compare Isaiah lxi. 1, with Luke iv. 18.

'The ANXIOUS being again invited to the lecture room, we found it filled.'

'An invitation was given to such professors of religion as had lost their hopes [by hearing the preaching] to retire to the lecture room. About sixty were found there, many in great distress, and all much troubled.'

'On Sabbath morning, Feb. 19, Mr. Norton preached from Rom. viii. 9, on the spirit of Christ in his people; and still more among professors were cast into trouble.'

'This was the time when the distress in the church was at its height, and almost every countenance indicated sadness.'

'On meeting at 6 o'clock A. M. on Monday for prayer, the scene was little else than one of weeping and lamentation.'

'It was a time of most painful emotion. The whole church seemed to be weeping and mourning around their troubled leader. That night was sleepless with many; not a few passed the whole night in distressing anxieties, and CRIES FOR MERCY.'

This is enough, although we might make many more quotations from the same article. The clergy here confess, that their object is to torment mankind, and they publish their accounts of it as though it was a work to boast and glory of. Widely different is the influence of the gospel of Christ. It gives 'great peace' to the heart.

'When once it enters to the mind,
It spreads such joy abroad,
The meanest souls instruction find
And raise their thoughts to God.'

We give the following article at the request of our respected friend and brother, Rev. John H. Willis, of South Reading, Mass. It seems that the opposers of Universalism have made themselves very busy in spreading the report that Br. Willis has renounced his faith in Universalism.—It is needless to say, that such a report is wholly erroneous; there is not the slightest foundation for it in fact. Br. Willis speaks from the heart.

I have not renounced.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—Since I left Petersham last May, it has been thrice reported, that I had renounced the glorious faith, which all the benevolent spirits in earth and heaven desire to have true, and which nothing but the utterly reverse of God would have false.

These reports have been industriously circulated in Petersham and its vicinity; for what purpose you well understand. I care not who originated such reports. The authors of them no doubt feel that the desired ends will justify any means; and to lie for the glory of truth will answer just as well in the eighteenth as in the fourteenth century.

The first report, was that I had become a zealous Baptist; and that my Baptist brethren in Petersham, were very desirous to hear me preach now, that I had returned to my first love; for I was once a member of the Baptist—close communion—Church, in Chesterfield, N. H. I was then a child truly, being but 10 years old. This report soon blew over as false among my friends, though believed by many still who wanted to have it so. As soon as this falsehood was hushed, another was started.

I was now declared on good authority to be a flaming Methodist, and doing all in my power to counteract the dangerous influence of Universalism. My friends again interrogated me to know if this strange report was true. I answered.—They were satisfied. And I supposed the folly would here end. I thought it of too little importance to notice it publicly: and I should not have done so now, if another report had not sprung up, more absurd than either of the two first, and commenced its round of shameless scandal.

I received a letter last evening from Dr. L. Cooke, of Wendall, Mass. stating that it was currently reported, that I had abandoned the doctrine of Universalism, and become a follower of the strangely deluded, or the most deeply hypocritical Wm. Miller; who is now driving such a game of madness, fanaticism and misery, through the country.

I write this to put an end to all such reports, at once, and forever. And to say that when I give up my confidence in the blessed gospel of a redeemed and happy world, I will at once make it known to all whom it may concern, through the columns of the 'Trumpet,' if I can get your consent so to do, Br. W.; and I know you will give it.

Finally, I will say, that I am still a happy believer in Universalism. My confidence does not weaken, but grows even more strong in the sublime faith of the great salvation.

Yours, truly, JOHN H. WILLIS.
South Reading, Jan. 4, 1843.

We return thanks to Mr. S. N. Dickinson, proprietor of the Boston Almanack, for his kindness in permitting us to use the plates of the Universalist churches in this city. Some men would have refused. They would have said, 'these plates were made for our benefit; we had to pay for them; and if the public wish to see them, let them buy the Boston Almanack.' But Mr. Dickinson has proved himself to be above such considerations. He certainly deserves this public testimony to his politeness and liberality. We deem it our duty also to add, that the Boston Almanack, is an invaluable little manual, that contains an account of almost every thing that appertains to the city. It is furnished at the low price of 25 cents.

Tending to Universalism.

We have before this called the attention of our readers to the facts refered to in the following paragraph from the 'Connecticut Universalist.'

PROFESSORS STUART AND BUSH.

It is well known to most if not all of our readers, that the gentlemen whose names we have placed at the head of this short article, stand deservedly high in the respective Theological Institutions to which they are attached, as profound scholars, and Biblical critics—the former in Andover, Mass., the latter in New York City. Both of these gentlemen have recently given to the world their views in regard to the meaning of those portions of the scriptures on which the Miller theory of the end of the world is built. The 'New York Evangelist,' which by the way may be regarded as the organ of orthodoxy in the United States, in speaking of the views of Professors Stuart and Bush, says, 'The tendency of these views is to destroy the scripture evidence of the doctrine of any real end of the world, any day of final judgment, or general resurrection of the body. The style of interpretation, we assert, tends fearfully to Universalism. This tendency we are prepared to prove.'

Here we have the facts in a small compass.—Millerism prevails; it has made some havoc in the Orthodox churches; by necessity therefore Profs. Stuart and Bush have come out against it. But how do they combat it? Answer, with Universalist weapons. They are obliged to adopt the same interpretations of scripture which the Universalists in times past have adopted. There is no other way to combat this popular superstition. The 'New York Evangelist,' the leading Orthodox journal in the United States, is alarmed; and declares to all the world, that 'the style of interpretation tends fearfully to Universalism.' This reminds us of what we read in the prophesy of Isaiah, 'The sinners in Zion are afraid; fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites.' We do not say that Isaiah had reference to any people in these times; but merely that the language of the New York Evangelist brought up the passage in Isaiah to our mind.

The time is not far distant when the interpretations of the Scriptures adopted by Universalists, will be very generally adopted throughout the christian world.

Opposition to Washingtonians.

Why is it that so many of the partialist clergy speak with contempt of the Washingtonian reform? Is it because those priests cannot bear full sway in the moral revolution that is going on? Is it because they cannot have full credit for all that is being done? We are told that Rev. Parsons Cooke, of Lynn, stigmatized the Washingtonian lecturers with the undignified title of 'gutter graduates.' What is this for? What gives rise to this hostility? We believe, that there are some people in the world, who are not willing to see even a good cause go on, unless they can be the chief agents in the work, and have the chief credit for it. We remember to have read that once the disciples came to their Master boasting, that they had seen a man casting out devils in his name, but they forbade him because he followed not with them. That is just the spirit of many people of the present day. They must take the lead, they think; and if a man is engaged in ever so good a work, they will forbid him if he follows not with them. A certain parson Breckinbridge, of Baltimore, is very zealous in his opposition to Washingtonianism. He affirms 'that the scheme of total abstinence introduces a thousand evils without removing one.' His enmity to Washingtonianism has led him to oppose the cardinal doctrine of the whole Temperance reformation. But let the Washingtonians persevere. They have done immense good; and will continue to do good, notwithstanding the maledictions of their enemies.

A Caution.

It will be well for all Universalist Societies and congregations to be on their guard against the efforts of those who would turn them from the profession of the gospel faith. We are desirous, truly so, to treat our Unitarian brethren with respect; but we have not confidence in them. They seem continually to be plotting the ruin of our societies. We know there are honorable exceptions in that denomination,—men who despise every thing that is underhand and mean; but we believe there are men among them who are our bitter enemies, and who would rejoice to see every Universalist Society in the country perverted from its faith, and our meeting-houses passing into the hands of Unitarians; and the doctrine of God's universal love, as manifested in the highest welfare of the whole intellectual creation, banished from all our places of worship. We would rejoice to learn that our suspicions are groundless; we would be most happy to live on terms of generous intercourse with our Unitarian neighbors, if we could have confidence in them. But look at the Bulfinch Street operations. And those are not a solitary case; we have seen attempts to produce similar results in other places. What then is our duty? Let Universalists be on their guard; and while they are ready at all times to treat their Unitarian neighbors with christian kindness, let them also be ready to resist every effort to pervert our churches and congregations from the purposes for which they were founded.

Elder Thurston Deposed.

Our readers have learned that there has been great trouble in Lowell, in consequence of the financiering of Elder Thurston. He built a church with a very high steeple, which led us at the time to think he was somewhat vain. But where did he get the cash? He instituted a kind of savings bank, and the female operatives deposited their money therein. Things went on swimmingly for a time; but at last there was a crash, and the Institution failed. The Elder's brethren have examined into the matter; and without pronouncing as to the degree of his guilt, they have suspended him from preaching.

The Elder is not a Universalist; he is the individual who wished a short time since to have a controversy in Lowell, to show that Universalism is false, and of very dangerous tendency.

The 'Nazarene,' published at Philadelphia, comes to us in a reduced size, but it is a very neat and useful paper. We hope it will be well sustained, for a paper of like character is much needed in Pennsylvania. Let the Universalists of that region see that it does not want patronage.

Ordination.

Br. Frederick Foster, late of West Haverhill, Mass., was ordained at Winthrop, Me., on the 29th ult. Sermon by Br. William A. Drew, of Augusta.

Subscribing merely to patronize.

Some people subscribe for a paper merely to patronize it; not because they ever expect to pay for it, but just to help it along. We have had some such cases on our own list. We recollect a Mr. M——, in New Hampshire, a Major, Colonel, General, or something else of that kind, who took the 'Trumpet' until his bill was twenty dollars, and on calling for the pay, 'O, he did not expect to pay for the paper. He was one of its earliest friends, and he only subscribed just to give it a lift at the beginning.' The above circumstance was brought to our mind by the following article in a recent number of the 'Mercantile Journal':

A NEWSPAPER PATRON. Some years gone by, 'the good of the country, the welfare and wants of the community,' (as the publisher's prospectus had it,) required the establishment of a weekly newspaper in a then small town in the interior of this State. The community being sensitively alive to the truth of what the publisher had put forth in his prospectus, came forward, and some hundreds of subscribers were obtained for the paper. Among the number, the publisher noticed with some degree of pride the name of Mr. G—— W——, a personal and political friend, a man of some influence in the town and country, but never celebrated for punctuality in the payment of his debts. Time rolled on, and for three years the little sheet battled manfully, and successfully too, for the cause in which it was engaged.

But in time the publisher in order to meet his engagements with the paper-makers, and with the persons in his employ, found it necessary to call upon some of his delinquent subbscribers for payment. One day, while on a perambulating excursion, commonly known as dunning, the publisher met his friend, Mr. G——, in a store. He presented to him his bill for subscription for three years, fancying he had been extremely lenient in allowing it to stand so long. Mr. G—— took the bill, looked at it, and then at the publisher, his countenance all the while expressive of the utmost astonishment at what he deemed the absurdity and injustice of the claim. After looking alternately, for five or ten minutes, at the bill and the publisher, he handed it back again, coolly remarking, 'Mr. M——, why I don't owe you any thing! I never intended to pay for your paper!! I only took it to patronize you!!!'

Dods against Tappan & Dennett.

It was well known, that Rev. John B. Dods commenced a suit against Tappan & Dennett, of this city, for a libel, alleged to have been published in a pamphlet written by Matthew H. Smith. The charges brought against Mr. Dods were of a highly aggravated character; and tho' he is a remarkably peaceable man, and was scarcely ever before engaged in a law suit, he felt it his duty to bring the action. Messrs. Tappan and Dennett are men extensively engaged in business in this city, with abundant pecuniary means to carry on their suit. At first they professed to feel confident that they could prove their allegations, and showed no disposition to avoid a trial.

We learn, however, that they have consented that judgment shall be entered against them without trial, and have agreed to pay the costs of Court. Such a report has been in circulation for a week. We called upon the Clerk of the Supreme Court, and examined the Record, and find that the report is true.

As we understand this matter, Tappan & Dennett herein admit that the charges against Mr. Dods cannot be sustained. In effect, they are beaten. They probably foresaw that the case must go against them; and to save vexation and costs they consented to lose the case and pay the cost already accrued, without a trial.

Mr. Marshall and the duel.

Hon Thomas F. Marshall has recently expressed certain opinions in regard to his late duel with Col. Webb, of New York, which we think ought to be widely circulated. We copy from the 'Mercantile Journal' of this city. The remarks are from the Washington correspondent of that paper.

Observing in the 'Atlas' of Saturday last, some remarks, under the head of 'Thomas F. Marshall,' justice to that individual compels me to say, that I was at the meeting of the Temperance Society here, when the gold medal sent to him from New York was presented to him, and that, in the speech which he made at that time, he took occasion to say—that he sincerely regretted and was deeply sorry, that he had been engaged in the duel with Mr. Webb, and laid the duel to his former intemperate habits—as, if he had not been an intemperate man, he should never have given cause, for an attack upon his character, to any one. He said he could not call to his mind any scrape he had ever got into, that had not been brought about by intemperance—and that now he probably should never get into another. He stated that he now felt enmity to no man, and that he as freely forgave those who had injured or attempted to injure him, as he trusted he had their forgiveness.

His speech was very much applauded, especially at the remarks I have quoted. He farther remarked that he might have said as much, long ere this, but he would never have any thing dragged out of him. While he was abused, he would stand on his own reserved rights—but now he was free to say, that he felt great sorrow at having been obliged, as he at that time thought he was, to engage in deadly strife with Col. Webb. A Boston gentleman, Mr. Hardy, was at Appollo Hall, the evening I refer to, and will recollect whether I am not correct in my statement. VIATOR.

More Misery.

The work of insanity and death still goes on. The doctrine of endless damnation is one of the greatest scourges with which society was ever awicted. See the following:

INSANE. On Sunday, a man of family, residing in the Northern Liberties, was taken to the Mayor's office on account of insanity—his friends being unable to do any thing with him—and sent to the Insane Hospital. It is said that he has become affected by the Millerite doctrine of the end of the world.—Ledger.

A Mrs. Hurlbut, of Great Barrington, cut her throat with a razor and died few days since, in consequence of believing sincerely in the doctrine of endless misery.

Converts are fast coming over to Universalism. We find in our exchange papers notices of many persons leaving partialist churches, because they cannot believe in endless misery.

We acknowledge the reception of a sermon on the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, delivered in the Universalist Church in Nashua, N. H. by Rev. L. C. Browne. It gives, clearly and briefly, the Universalist view of this parable; and the circulation of it will do much good. We have no doubt of the general soundness of the views advanced.

We have received Robert Merry's Museum for January. As good as usual—an interesting and instructive juvenile Magazine.

Effects of Millerism.

This abominable nonsense has done some hurt in the world—it has made several insane. The authors of this mischief ought to be held accountable for the hurt they do. See the following articles:

More Fruits of Fanaticism.—Mr. N. E. Huckins, of Effingham, N. H. has lately been confined to a cage in consequence of religious insanity.—If endless punishment is the true doctrine of the Bible, the Millers, Smiths, and Knapps, must have a fearful account to give at the day of judgment.

The following is of similar dreadful import.

'The State Insane Asylum.—We learn from the Concord (N. H.) Patriot, that this Institution is now open for the reception of patients. One patient was admitted last week. He is from Tuftonborough, and was rendered insane by excitement upon the subject of the second advent.—He prays, preaches, exhorts, and harangues upon the subject every morning four hours upon the stretch, and the rest of the day is quite easy.'—Dover Enquirer.

Millerism seems to have had quite a run in Strafford and Carroll Counties N. H. We have one case of folly.

Woman, the Better Half.—Under this head the Dover Gazette says, 'We are informed that the story which has been going the rounds of the papers, of a man in Tuftonboro', N. H., having left half his crop of potatoes in the ground in consequence of his belief in Miller's vagaries, is untrue so far as respects the potatoes remaining undug. After the man had declined digging any more, his wife, truly as well as by courtesy the better half, employed help and had the potatoes secured. We have this from a brother of the woman, and will barely remark that she is worthy of a husband possessing more firmness of mind, and less liable to be affected by the idle superstitions of visionary theorists.' It is lucky, however, that such men have such better halves, to save them from the afflictions of lean understandings in the shape of starvation and the poor house.

To Correspondents.

'T. J. C.' and 'H. J.' came too late for this week's paper—they shall have place next week.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Celebration of Christmas.

The Sabbath School attached to the Second Universalist Society, in Lynn, gave the citizens of that town a fine specimen of their proficiency in the art of speaking, in the form of an exhibition on Christmas evening.

Some 30 or 40 children participated in the exercises, which were listened to by a very large congregation filling every part of the spacious house almost to suffocation. Such were the numbers that could not gain an entrance, and so eager were the friends generally to have it repeated, that it took place, last Sabbath evening, first in the new-year, and I must say that I felt proud for them that they had made such rapid progress in this department. Two years ago this school had hardly a name to live. But since that time through the well-directed labors of Br. Hiram West, the Superintendent, and the assistant officers and teachers, it has done nobly—and is now highly prosperous and happy.

I cannot express my love for Sabbath School Exhibitions. I think—I know they are serviceable to our cause in many ways. I hope they will meet with earnest and active approval from all parts of our young and growing Israel. It is some work, I allow, to get one up in good style, but then, what valuable blessing can we secure without toil.

Let there be frequent exhibitions—fostering care bestowed upon the lambs—an organized church, and conference meetings, with a willingness on the part of a Society to do their whole duty to God and man, and they will prosper like the garden of the Lord. Try it—try it beloved Universalist friends. This is the opinion of H. J.

Millerism Exposition of Scripture.

A few days ago I had the occasion to do some business with one of the Christ-ian alias Miller preachers of this town, who pretends to have no doubt of the second advent doctrine, etc. We conversed some time upon the subject, when I requested him to tell me what he supposed the apostle Paul meant by the following language, 'The creature (creation) was made subject to vanity,' &c. He said he thought the creation here signified the world—kosmos, the material universe—'for,' said he, 'if the whole creation is intended, that is, animate things, the beasts and birds, fish and all insects, must necessarily be included—and as we have no account that such will inhabit another world, therefore he thought the apostle could not have had allusion to animate but to the inanimate world—'this,' said he, 'is to be changed, delivered and purified at the coming of Christ now in a few days.' Pretty well thought I—this surely is an original method of getting rid of a manifest difficulty.

Surely, this brother must have been taking lessons of Elder Mason, of Mason Village, who concluded that 'carcass' in Matt. xxix, meant Christ, and the 'eagles' his followers.

I asked the man if he would have the goodness to tell me how the literal earth could be delivered from this bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God—and if the earth groaned and travailed in pain till now?—His confusion became so apparent that my benevolence forbade me to press the matter farther. Why will not men open their eyes? Why do they desire to twist and distort the Holy Scriptures?—Why not look at the Bible as we would look at any other good book? H. J.

Exeter, N. H. Jan. 1843.

Brooklyn, L. I. Jan. 3, 1843.

Br. Whittemore,—Having had nothing to communicate which would compensate the charge of postage, I have delayed writing to thee. A private opportunity of transmission now offers, and I embrace it.

Instead of being in 'the far West,' (as I intended to be by this time when I left Lowell in July last,) I am located in this goodly city, co-operating with the Lord's people in upbuilding Zion.—Notwithstanding divers difficulties and obstacles, we are prospering much beyond the expectations of even our most sanguine friends. Sixty families are now numbered with our congregation. I visited nearly all of them yesterday, with the compliments of the season, conformably to the customs of this vicinity. We hope to have one hundred families within a twelve month.

Our Meeting-House is in progress. It will be completed in the Spring. We shall then commence a Sabbath School. We are already making some arrangements therefor.

Millerism (so called by way of courtesy to the originator of the theory,) numbers many disciples in New York and Brooklyn. I have lectured on this subject in this city, and also in the Broadway Tabernacle in New York. I shall probably issue a sheet in newspaper form, designed to confute the 'phantasy.' It will be designed for general circulation, at about one dollar per hundred, which will barely cover cost of paper and printing.

The Washingtonian Temperance Reformation is moving steadily onward in this region. During my extensive visitations yesterday, I saw not more than a table spoonful of either wine or strong drink; and though I met and passed thousands of people in houses and streets, I did not see a single individual who evinced any symptoms of having tasted intoxicating liquor.

I write in haste, and therefore briefly. Our zealous Br. Burbank will acquaint thee with the particulars of our cause in this city. With sincere wishes for the prosperity and peace of the kingdom of heaven, I remain thy friend and brother, Abel C. Thomas.

General Intelligence.

Counterfeiters Arrested. We are happy to announce the detection of a company of counterfeiters, who have been carrying on their operations in this city and in Maine, for a considerable time past, and who have heretofore been able to elude the vigilance of the police. We understand that suspicions having attached to Jabez Fredericks, who come to this city more than a year ago from Belfast, Maine, he was accused of passing counterfeit three dollar bills of the Plymouth Bank, The Washington Bank, and a Bank in Augusta, Me. The Grand Jury found an indictment against him; and he has made disclosures which have led to indictments against several other individuals, some of whom have hitherto been in respectable standing.

One of these is Asa Ames, a grocer at 120 Cambrdge street. An indictment having been found against him, he was arrested on Friday evening, and arraigned on Saturday morning. He pleaded not guilty and wished for a continuance to the next term, which was granted, and he was ordered to give bail in the sum of $2000.

His person being searched, five counterfeit bills were found; and as the Grand Jury had been discharged for the remainder of this term, he was examined by the Police Court, on the charge of having these bills in his possession with intent to pass the same, and was ordered to give bail in the sum of $2000 for his appearance at the next term of the Municipal Court—making the whole amount of bail required in both cases $4000.

We learn that indictments were also found against two persons in Belfast, and that Constable Andrews left the city on Saturday for that place, with a requisition from the Executive of this State.

The bills which have been seized are not remarkably well executed, although some of them passed through the hands of several persons before they were discovered to be counterfeit. They are apparently all made from one plate, the name of any particular bank being inserted in the plate when bills of that bank were to be counterfeited. —Advertiser.

Steamer to Cape Cod. We see by the Barnstable Patriot that the steamer Express is to ply between this city and the Cape, next season, touching at Plymouth. This is a capital movement, and we trust it will be successful.

Harnden & Co. We observe that Nathaniel Greene Esq., late of this firm, has withdrawn from it, and that its business in future will be conducted by the remaining partners, Messrs. Harnden & Brigham. Mr. Greene will in future devote his whole attention to the New Exchange Reading Room, to which Messrs. H. & Co. will give every facility afforded by their extensive express establishment.

Massachssetts Charitable Mechanic Association. At the annual meeting of this Association, held on Thursday evening, the following gentlemen were elected officers for the year ensuing:—President, James Clark; Vice President, Jonas Chickering; Secretary, Henry W. Dutton; Treasurer, Osmyn Brewster; Trustees, John G. Roberts, Henry N. Hooper, Kimball Gibson, Henry K. Hancock, Roland Cushing, Reuel Baker, Billings Briggs, Job Turner, and Asa Swallow.

Surgical Operation The New Bedford Bulletin states that a very important and difficult surgical operation has just been performed in Boston, upon a man from Nantucket. The patient was afflicted with a malignant tumor, in size somewhat larger than a hen's egg, located upon the under jaw. In order to reach it, it was necessary to lay open the jaw, by removing the skin and dissecting from the point of the chin nearly to the ear. After this was accomplished, and the arteries carefully secured, the operator applied the saw, and that portion of the jaw-bone to which the tumor was attached, was successfully removed. This operation was witnessed by a number of physicians and students, who were highly gratified with the masterly skill of the surgeon, as well as with his complete success in saving the life of the patient. It may not be improper to state, adds the Bulletin, that the operator was Dr. J. Mason Warren, the grandson of Dr. John Warren, who for many years was Prof of Anatomy and Surgery in the Medical College, and the son of Dr. John C. Warren, the successor and incumbent of the Professorship of Anatomy and Surgery—a son who bears not the name only, but in whom the skill and abilities of both are happily united.

The Brattleboro' Phœnix says, it is now settled that the Fitchburg Railroad, extending from that town to Boston, will be built the present year.

Caution. the alarm of fire on Wednesday evening proceeded from the boarding house occupied by Mrs. Prescott, corner of High and Free streets.

It was found that in one of the chambers—the occupant being absent—an air tight stove had been left with the valve closed tight, preventing the escape of the smoke and gas into the chimney. Consequently the smoke found its way into the room, and entries causing the alarm So dense and suffocating was the cloud of smoke and vapor, that the first man who opened the chamber, fell instantly prostrate, and the second fell over him. Some buckets of water cleared the atmosphere of the apartment, and revealed the cause of the alarm. It requires but a small amount of science and attention to manage an air-tight stove, but that little must not be omitted.—Portland Advertiser.

A Fire caused by Water. We learn from the Portsmouth Journal, that on the 30th ult. a grist-mill at Newcastle, N. H., was destroyed by fire. In the storm of that day, says the Journal, the strong easterly wind caused the tide to rise to an unusual height, and, surrounding the mill, cut off all communication with the land. The water at 11 A. M., coming in contact with a barrel of lime set on fire, and soon the whole building to the water's edge, was in flames. About 50 bushels of grain or meal were consumed.

Duelling. There is a good deal of truth, we presume every one will allow, in the following remarks on the subject of duelling, which we extract from the Norfolk (Va.) Herald: 'Not one man in a thousand, who fights a duel, has the approbation of his own conscience or judgment. On the contrary, he acts in utter disregard of the admonitions of both. But most men had rather endure self reproach, superadded to the perils of personal conflict, than encounter the curled lip and the averted look of his old associates, female as well as male, which he knows awaits him, who having no conscientious scruples, brooks repeated insults, without calling his antagonist to the 'field of honor,' or, being called there himself, declines the invitation. The very men, who, as jurors, would condemn the murderer, would, as citizens, perhaps, treat with contemptuous scorn him who might refuse, on the demand of some braggart bully, either to murder or to be murdered! The fault, then, is in public opinion!'

Arkansas Minerals. Rich veins of lead have been found in Marion county, Ark., pronounced by the best judges of the ore, to be capable of yielding ninety per cent. Copper ore is also found in the same region. It also promises to yield a rich reward for labor. It has been the opinion of the oldest settlers of the northern part of Arkansas, that it abounds in minerals of almost every kind—iron, copper, lead, gold and silver, &c.

A Sermon for the Times. Last Sunday evening, the Rev. Mr. Beecher, of the Federal street Baptist Church, in Portland, as we learn from the Bulletin of that city, preached a most thrilling and excellent discourse, founded on the Somers tragedy. He appeared to be well acquainted with young Spencer's history, and showed the love of hair-brained adventure in this ill-fated youth, to have originated in a great measure from his habit of reading pernicious books. He was particularly severe on the piratical tales of Marryatt, Trelawney and Cooper. Mr. B. also spoke of the mismanagement of parents in bringing up their children, as another great source of mischief to the community at large. Parents should be gentle, but firm—a misgoverned family was like a noble ship driving over the ocean without compass or rudder.

A Safety Track for Railways, applicable to any road already built, has been invented by Mr. John Harris, a native of Troy. The object is to prevent the cars from being thrown off the track. To effect this, a central rail of wood or iron is laid between the rails on which the cars run.—'Hangers' are attached to the bottom of each car coming down under the flanges of the centre rail, and fitted with friction rollers which run clear except when the car rises or is in danger of being thrown off. When this does happen, the hangers bring up under the centre rail and restore the car to its equilibrium. The cost of the centre rail, if made of iron, will be $4000 per mile; if made of wood, with an iron plate, $2000 per mile.—Troy Whig.

The New Orleans packet ship Trenton, Capt. Burnett, from New York, bound to New Orleans was lost on the night of the 2d of Dec, five days from New York light, on the Eastern end of Man of War Key, near Elbow Key, and became at once a total wreck. At nine o'clock the next morning the passengers, cabin and steerage, were taken off by the wreckers, with a great deal of difficulty. The cargo was in part saved, in a damaged state. The rigging and sails were almost entirely destoyed by the surf and rocks.—The passengers only saved a part of their baggage, but all in a wet state. The vessel was set fire to and burned down in part, in order to save some goods in the hold. The gross sale of goods saved amounted to about $14,000, and 68 per cent allowed for salvage.

The passengers have chartered the British brig Mary Ann, for New Orleans, and would leave about the 23d of December.

End of the World. The editor of the N. York Express has favored his readers with deductions from a calculation, by which it appears evident that the world will not come to an end before 1950.

Fire in Newburyport. We learn from the Herald that a threatening conflagration broke out on Friday evening, in a two story building, occupied as a grocery by Capt. Small, on Water street nearly opposite the new James Steam Mill. The building in which the fire originated, was destroyed to the ground floor, and not an article of the stock was saved. The store at the head of Hale's wharf, was considerably damaged. The building was occupied by C. Huse & Co., and Hale & Co. Mr. Huse's stock of skins and wool was valued at about $1500 and was partially insured. The shop and stock of Capt. Small was insured for eight hundred dollars, about three fourths of its value.

Violating graves. Three negroes are now confined in the Woodbury jail, N. J., for violating the graves in the Camden grave-yards. Two bodies were sold by in Philadelphia for anatomical purposes for six dollars.

Manufacturers at the South. Cotton manufactories are begining to spring up in the midst of the fields where the raw material is grown. The Natchez Free Trader states that Mr. John Robinson, a Scotch gentleman, is now engaged in erecting a suitable building in Jefferson county, Miss., for the purpose of manufacturing cotton, bagging, jeans, linseys, towels, and coarse cloth used by the planters on their farms for the clothing of negroes. His building now in process of erection, is 60 feet by 40, two stories high. It is to be supplied with an engine, now making, of 12 horse power. To run 270 cotton and 60 woollen spindles. Two sets of woolen cards will also be attached. The factory when in operation, will turn out from the raw material, 100 yards of linseys and jeans per day. Mr. R. purposes carding and spinning cotton and wool for those who do their own weaving, charging a moderate compensation therefor.—Transcript.

A Praiseworthy Act. The Journal of last evening relates a remarkable fact with regard to a Mercantile firm, that five years ago became embarrassed, and settled with their creditors, by paying 60 cents on the dollar. They recommenced business, and fortune has since smiled upon their undertakings, insomuch that on Monday they sent as a 'new year's gift' to each of their creditors, the balance, forty per cent, amounting in the aggregate to about $15,000.

A man was choked to death in Cincinnati last week by a piece of meat, whilst he was incautiously eating and laughing.

Melancholy Accident. A young man named Joseph N. Robbins, says the Lowell Courier, while fixing a belt in the mill of Mr. Lawson in Dracutt, on Wednesday last, was caught in the same and carried up to the ceiling, his head striking it with such force as to make a hole the size of his head. He was jammed in so close as to stop the water wheel and all the machinery in the mill. His neck was broken and he died instantly. He was 23 years of age, of excellent character and temperate habits.

Death of a Patriot. John Waggoner, the last member of Washington's Life Guards, departed this life, at his residence, Lower Sandusky, on the 15th ult., in the 81st year of his age. Waggoner entered the army when he was but 16 years of age, and continued in the service until the close of the Revolutionary war. For 5 years he was attached to the Life Guards of Washington. —Bulletin.

The Astor Library. John Jacob Astor has adopted an excellent plan by which his name will be remembered when he is gone. He has devoted three hundred thousand dollars for a Public Library and the Library Buildings, in the city of New York, which he intends to give to that city.

Fire Department. The whole number of alarms during the past year, was one hundred and twenty-two. There were thirty-six false alarms and eighty six fires in the city. The amount of property destroyed was $107,694.

Robbery and Arson at New Orleans. On the 22d ult., the Exchange office of Messrs. Holland & Braun, Camp street, New Orleans, was set on fire, and robbed of about $30,000. The clerk of H. & B. has been arrested on suspicion, and an Italian barber who keeps a shop in Camp street, near Poydras.

Amendments in the Post Office Law. The Postmaster General has advised, and, in conjunction with the Postmasters of New York, Philadelphia and Boston, has determined upon the following changes:—All letters written by heads of departments, or by members of Congress, shall be charged to the government. No postmaster shall be allowed the privilege of franking any letter otherwise than on the business of his office. The highest postage shall be ten cents from or to any place in the United States.

The Croton Water Works. According to a report in the N. Y. American, the actual outlay for the Croton Water, including all expenses, is $11, 395,775, and it is estimated that a further sum of half a million, to complete the Aqueduct bridge over the Harlem river, and $20,000 for pipes still to be laid, will be needed. In round numbers the cost of the structure complete may be stated at $12,500,000. Of this sum, 9 to 10 millions bear 5 per cent interest, and the residue 7 per cent.—The annual interest is $665,000.

Foreign Emigrant Society. A large meeting of influential gentlemen was holden at the Exchange Coffee House, on Wednesday evening last for the purpose of taking measures to form an Association for aiding destitute emigrants. After some preliminary business, Mr. James Boyd moved that a committee be appointed to draft suitable rules and regulations in view of a permanent organization of a 'Foreign Emigrant Society.'—This was adopted, and the following gentlemen were selected for that duty:—Messrs S. A. Elliot, John G. Palfrey, George T. Curtis, James Boyd, Robert C. Waterson, A. Coindreau, W. H. Wilson, James Means, Francis McKenna, Bernard Rolker, Thomas B. Curtis, Terence M'Hugh, W. J. Walsh, and Wm. Underwood.

Robbery. The office of the Treasurer of the town of Coventry, R. I., says the Providence Chronicle, was broken into a few nights since and robbed of $500 and upwards. The money belonged to the School fund, and had been recently received for registry in that town. The thieves, two in number, have been apprehended and lodged in the East Greenwich jail.

Fatal Effects of Intemperance. We learn from the Nashville Whig, of the 27th ult., that on Christmas day a quarrel took place in that city between two young men, one named Sturdivant, the other Armstrong. Sturdivant drew a pistol with the intent to shoot Armstrong, when the brother of the former interposing received the contents of the pistol in his breast, and died a few minutes after. The Whig adds: 'Here we have another striking instance of the unhappy results of intemperance, and the fatal consequences of carrying concealed weapons. Although the laws of the State expressly forbid carrying concealed weapons, yet nothing is more common. It is a dangerous and foolish practice, which ought to be visited by the severest penalty of the law.'

The Philadelphia National Gazette says that a letter has been received in that city, from a gentleman in China, which states that 'at the city of Chin-Kiang-foo, three hundred women committed sucide, in preference to being subjected to the savage licentiousness of the British soldiery.'—So it appears that butchering men by thousands for daring to maintain and defend their own laws was not the worst feature of England's infamous war upon China.—Transcript.

Nutriment. Animal food has more nutriment than vegetable, when compared by weight, the true criterion, as the following critical analysis correctly shows:

do rice,	90
do rye,	80
do barley,	83
do beans,	80 to 82
do peas,	93
do mea', average	85
do potatoes,	25

By roasting, beef loses 22 per cent of its weight mutton 24, lamb 22, goose 19, turkey 20, duck 27 chicken 14.

By boiling, beef loses 15 per cent of its weight mutton 10, turkey 16, chicken 13, ham 6.

A Hard Case. The Northampton Courier says that Capt. Wm. Smith, who for the last ten years has been an inmate of the Northampton Almshouse, has just claims against the government, for French spoilations, prior to 1800, to the amount of $10,000. In 1798 and '99, he commanded, at different times, three vessels, in the cargoes of which he was interested to the amount of $10,000, prime cost—all of which vessels were captured by French privateers, and, with their cargoes, confiscated. The French government made compensation for these damages more than forty years ago, and the money was used in the purchase of Louisiana. Capt. Smith has sent a petition to Washington for relief, which is dated at the Northampton poor house.

It is said that Mrs. Small, the widowed mother of the unfortunate young man who parted with his life on board the Somers, and who resides in this city, has been in a very distressed state of mind, bordering upon insanity, since the news reached her of that melancholy event.

Straps. Dr. Smith, of the Medical and Surgical Journal, says, 'these tight straps under the feet, when the leg is flexed, press the knee pan so forcibly into the cavity of the joint that it is by no means strange there are numerous complaints of weak knees, rheumatic pains, and soreness of the muscles.'

Accident. On Monday, as a poor woman was walking down Hanover street she fell into one of the coal holes, and was very dangerously injured. She was taken up completely insensible, and for a time was not expected to survive. A lady, who was passing at the time, made three applications at different houses, before she could find a person to admit her. The accident was occasioned entirely by the cover being left unfastened.—Mercantile Journal.

Fire and death. A fire occurred in New York on Saturday morning at 3 o'clock, in a house in Pearl street; and a German girl named Caroline, and a man named Robert Brown, were suffocated by the smoke. The destruction of property was not great.

Sudden Death. Doctor Barker, of Lynn, died very suddenly on Sunday evening, from the effects of mortification in a body upon which he was performing a post mortem examination. The Doctor had a slight wound upon one of his fingers, where the infection, it is supposed, took its instantaneous and deadly effect.

The High Sheriff of Norfolk. John Baker, 2d died at his residence in Dedham, on Sunday, the 1st inst. The complaint was consumption, which has been wearing upon his constitution for some years, and has finally terminated in death. By the decease of this gentleman, the office of High Sheriff becomes vacant, and the term of office of all his deputies has, consequently, expired—and all precepts, which are by law appointed to be executed and returned by the Sheriff, are to be served by a Coroner, who is empowered to act, until a new High Sheriff be appointed and legally quallified.—Quincy Arrora.

Collision on the Western Railroad. The steamboat train for New York via Norwich, which left this city on Monday afternoon, ran into the accommodation uper train while the latter was stopping near Needham. The last car of the accommodation train was completely destroyed. The accident was owing to the dense fog.

The driver of the Telegraph Stage from Springfield to Northampton, lost his way during the severe snow storm on Thursday night, and after vainly endeavoring to find it, detached his horses, and huddling them together on the south side of the stage, to protect them as much as possible from the storm, got in to the stage, and with 3 passengers (two gentlemen and a lady,) patiently waited for day-light, which greeted them in about six hours.

A Desolate Home. The entire family of Abm. A. Keyser, editor of the Reflector, at Poughkeepsie, consisting of five children, has been swept off by the scarlet fever in 11 days.

A Wolf in Sheep's Clothing. The very curious circumstance occured recently at a village in Buck's county, of a gentleman by the name of Sheap, having been robbed of his clothing during the night, by a room companion—a pompous, self-important, dresse little fellow, calling himself Col. Wolf, who forced an undue share of civility upon him, during an hour or two's acquaintance. In the morning Wolf was not to be found, but pursuit being made, he was soon overhauled, dressed entirely in Sheap's clothing.—New York Union.

Meeting on Capital Punishment.

There will be a meeting in this city, on the fourth Wednesday in January, (the 25th) at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Second Universalist Church in School-Street, to discuss the subject of Capital Punishment with reference to its abolition. All those who take an interest in the subject are invited to attend.

This is an important meeting.

DIED:

In Framingham, Dec. 30th, Mrs. Mary Hunt, wife of Wm. Hunt, Esq. of Sudbury, aged 90. This venerable couple whose united ages amounted to more than 180 years, having lived together 72 years, were married by his great-grandfather, the Rev. Israel Loring, of Sudbury, who lived to baptize several of his descendants of the fifth generation. Mrs. Hunt was the daughter of Dea. Thomas Plympton, of Sudbury, who was much distinguished for piety, benevolence, and moral and social virtues.

In New Bedford, Dec. 18, Mr. Timothy Hawes, aged 34. To say of a departed friend, that he was respected in life, and lamented in death by all who knew him, is to pronounce an eulogy which all may desire, but which far less may truly merit. To say this of Mr. Howes, however, is but to record the unanimous sentiment and feeling of all his acquaintances. He was possessed of those amiable qualities of heart and mind which endeared him to all; but most to those who knew him best; for in all the relations of life, it was his ambition to fill up the measure of his duty. For many years he had ardently cherished those liberal and elevated views of the gospel which fill the heart with hope that finite and ephemeral evil shall be ultimately overcome by infinite and eternal good; and that all men will survive the wreck of death, and live forever in a purified and happy state. To him, a Father of infinite wisdom and goodness was at the helm of universal government; he could see no want of love in the past, nor did any clouds of apprehension hang over the future. And in him was exemplified the truth of the Psalmist's declaration, 'They that know thy name, will put their trust in thee.' Although he had suffered many years from an affection of the lungs, his last sickness was exceedingly acute, and rapid in its progress. But he did not murmur or repine. The confidence in the paternal wisdom and goodness of God which had sustained him hitherto, did not fail him in the expiring hour. Just before he died, and when the icy hand of death was already upon him, he assured his weeping companion that he felt no alarm—that if it were Heaven's will, he would like to remain longer in the flesh for her sake; but that his confidence in the rectitude of the divine councils was unwavering, and that his soul was filled with that filial trust and resignation expressed by Israel's ancient king,—'Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me.' Thus lived and died a firm Universalist. May his afflicted widow, thus early bereft of one of the best of husbands, with the parents, relatives and sympathizing friends, be comforted by the precious truth that God has 'devised means that his banished be not expelled from him,'—that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, all shall be gathered together in that better world where sickness and parting will not be known; and where death shall be succeeded by universal and eternal life. EIGHT DOLLARS PER DOZEN!

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY. Third Edition. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by Thomas Whittemore, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of short Anthems, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Lang, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the Lessons or Rudiments, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

Dear Sir,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

Jotham S. French.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

''Gospel Harmonist.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

Weekly Bay State Democrat. The above paper will in future be published every Friday, at the corner of State and Devonshire-St. at One Dollar per annum, payable in advance. Original Hymn, Sung at the anniversary of the Roxbury Universalist Sabbath School, Sunday evening, Jan. 1, 1843.

BY REV. J. G. ADAMS.

Thanks, that on hearts like ours
Thy loving kindness showers
Knowledge divine;
O let its influence be Fruitful in works for thee,
Causing in purity
Our lives to shine.

Bless this our childhood band,
And let us ever stand
Truthful and strong;
Christians in deed and love,
Such as thou wilt approve,
Till we in worlds above
Thy praise prolong!

Creation's sovereign Lord!
Be thy glad name adored
Through earth and sky!
Hear, as in youthful days
To thee we humbly raise
Songs of our grateful praise,
Holy and High!

Thanks for thy light so free,
Causing our eyes to see
Thy truth and grace;
Love, that dispels our fear,
Mercy, to sinners dear,
Life, dying souls to cheer,
For all our race.

Novel Reading.

It is never good to excite the mind or the heart overmuch, save when it can find immediate vent in actions which concern real life. A confirmed novel reader is alway morbid; on some sides preternaturally sensitive, on others preternaturally callous; capable, it may be, of talking much fine sentiment, but wanting in that spiritual strength, in that moral robustness, which is equal to the performance of a useful but difficult part in real life. The less fine sentiment we have on our lips, the more genuine feeling shall we have in our hearts; and the more noble and generous action shall we perform. He who stops to sentimentalize about poverty, will be the last to throw his cloak over the tattered gabardine of the beggar. This is no doubt all very antiquated and altogether old-fashioned. But we hope our young friends, seated on rich ottomans or reclining on soft couches, with the last new novel still moist from the press, will forgive this our antediluvianism. It is with no vinegar visage, nor cant, that we tell them to throw that novel aside, to rouse themselves from their indolence, and go forth and devote the sensibilities of their hearts, the richness of their fancies, and the creativeness of their imaginations, to the great and noble work of relieving actual distress, and of upbuilding the cause of truth and righteousness on earth. Oh! my young friends, there is not such an overplus of generous sentiment, of warm and noble feeling, in this cold wintry world of ours, that you have any to waste over a Paul Clifford or a Jack Sheppard. No: go forth into real life, and let your sensibilities flow out for the actually poor and wretched; let the tear, so lovely in the eye of beauty, start at no fictitious woe. That poor mother, by her dying boy in that miserable hovel, needs it; those poor children, ragged, encrusted with filth, growing up to fill your penitentiaries, need it; the wrongs and outrages man is every where inflicting on man, should call it forth. Throw away the last new novel; go with me through these dark lanes, blind courts, into the damp cellars, unfurnished garrets, where poverty, vice, and crimes are crowded together, layer upon layer, where breeds the corruption that pollutes our whole moral atmosphere. Here my friends is a volume that may excite you; here is a work which you may read. Forget your luxury; forget your luxurious ease, blush for your repinings, your sentimental whimperings, your vapors and indigestion; and remember that you are men and women: and that it is your business to make this earth a paradise. —O. A. Brownson.

Hint to Married Women.

The following anecdote is 'going the round' of all the newspapers that are edited by married men: When Livia had attained such ascendency over her husband Augustus, that he could hardly refuse her any thing, though Emperor of the world, many of the married ladies of Rome were anxious to know the secret and source of her success; to whom she replied, 'I rule by obeying.'

The Street Preachers of Naples.

Among the mendicant friars, or street preachers of Naples, are to be found men who excercise an astonishing influence over the lazzaroni. Of one of them, Rocco, a Dominician, a posthumus fame is preserved for witty sayings and happy allusions which, if collected, would fill volumes. He was reckless whom he attacked, and often said things which upon any one less popular would have drawn down the vengeance of the public authorities; but Rocco was a man of whom the police stood in awe. One day he was preaching to the crowd in the public market place: 'This day,' said he, 'I will see whether you truly repent of your sins.' Whereupon he made a penitential discourse that 'made the hair of the hard-hearted multitude stand upright,' and when they were all on their knees, knashing their teeth, and beating their breasts, and putting on all imaginary signs of contrition, he suddenly cried: 'Now you, who truly repent of your sins, hold up your hands.' There was not one present who did not immediately stretch out both arms. 'Holy Archangel Michael,' then exclaimed Rocco, 'thou who with thine adnantine sword stands by the judgment seat of God, hew me off every hand that has been raised hypocritically.'—Instantly every hand dropped, and Rocco poured forth a fresh torrent of invective against the sinfulness and perversity of his audience. Rocco was once engaged in a discussion with a Spaniard, whom he silenced by swearing that there was not a single Spanish saint in heaven. The Castillian was startled at so unexpected a declaration, but Rocco maintained the truth of it. 'A few were let in at first,' he said, 'but they smoked so many segars that the Madona and other virgins were fairly sick; so St. Peter set his wits to work how he might rid them of such disagreeable guests. He sent word to every part of heaven, that a bull-fight would be held outside the gate. Thereupon every Spanish saint, without exception, ran off to see the show; and he took care never to let another Spaniard in again.' Rocco lived to a good old age. Just before the Neapolitan Revolution, we find him mentioned by another German traveller, Rehfues. Rocco, at that time, was 80 years old, and suffering from the gout; but his wit was unsubdued, and he said, he was resolved to battle it with the devil to the last.

Ferdinand I., who was fond of every thing connected with the popular manners of his capital, showed great favor to Rocco, and used to talk to him from the windows of his palace.

The Tailor and Dean Swift.

A tailor in Dublin, near the residence of the Dean, took it into the 'ninth part' of his head that he was specially and divinely inspired to interpret the prophecies, and especially the book of Revelation. Quitting the shop board, he turned out a preacher, or rather a prophet, until his customers had left his shop, and his family was likely to famish. His monomania was well known to Dean Swift, who benevolently watched for some convenient opportunity to turn the current of his thoughts. One night the tailor as he fancied, got especial revelation to go and convert Dean Swift; and, the next morning took up the line of march to the deanery. The Dean, whose study was furnished with a glass door, saw the tailor approach, and instantly surmised the nature of his errand. Throwing himself into an attitude of solemnity and thoughtfulness, with the Bible opened before him, and his eyes fixed on the 10th chapter of Revelation, he awaited his approach. The door opened, and the tailor announced in an unearthly voice, the message—'Dean Swift, I am sent by the Almighty to announce to you' —'Come in, my friend,' said the Dean, 'I am in great trouble, and no doubt the Lord has sent you to help me out of my difficulty.'—This unexpected welcome inspired the tailor, and strengthened greatly his assurance in his own prophetic character, and disposed him to listen to the disclosure. 'My friend,' said the Dean, 'I have just been reading the 10th chapter of Revelation, and am greatly distressed at a difficulty I have met with; and you are the very man sent to help me out. Here is an account of an angel that came down from heaven, who was so large that he placed one foot on the sea and the other on the earth and lifted up his hands to heaven. Now my knowledge of mathematics,' continued the Dean, 'has enabled me to calculate exactly the size and form of the angel; but I am in great difficulty, for I wish to ascertain how much cloth it will take to make him a pair of breeches; and as that is exactly in your line of business, I have no doubt the Lord has sent you to show me.' This exposition came like an electric shock to the poor tailor; he rushed from the house, ran to his shop, and a sudden revulsion of thought and feeling came over him. Making breeches was exactly in his line of business. He returned to his occupation thoroughly cured of his prophetical revelations, by the wit of the Dean.

Winter in Russia.

'Winter is more variable at St. Petersburg than at Moscow; that is, the cold does not reign there with such continued severity.—Thus, for instance, it is said not to be a rare circumstance at Moscow to find a fruit peeling, or any other matter, thrown by chance from a window, catch on the balcony, and, becoming immediately frozen, remain there suspended for the rest of the winter. Such a case could not occur at St. Petersburg, where though the thermometer often descends to 30 degrees of Reaumer below zero. (35 1-2 below zero of Fahrenheit.) the neighborhood of the sea combats the icy winds of Siberia, and unexpectedly brings on the most strange changes in the temperature. It has never rained, in the memory of man, at Moscow during the months of December and January. At St. Petersburg, on the contrary, rain frequently falls during these two months, and at that period it has been constantly the custom to replace carriages by sledges. This latter kind of vehicle, which no person gives up, becomes the most inconvenient in the world, being driven in the midst of snow and mud.

The winter at St. Petersburg, on account of these sudden transitions, so unexpected and so rapid, is far more formidable than at Moscow, and to strangers who have not experienced its effects, is particularly serious. To defend ones self from the weather, the most constant and minute precautions are required. In October, the Russians, and all who have been long in the country, assume fur clothes, and keep them in continual wear until the month of April, after the ice has broken up on the Neva. Stoves are lit everywhere and each family lays in a stock of birch wood, the blaze of which is more abundant than that of any other wood. There is a servant specially appointed to attend to the stoves, and his duty is to keep up as much as possible, an equal heat throughout the house. The best stove keepers, whose fame procures them the highest salary are generally from Moscow. Twenty degrees of cold do not appear astonishing to an inhabitant of St. Petersburg, though he then casts a curious look at the thermometer. At 23 or 24 degrees, constant rounds are made during the night, to prevent the police and sentinels from falling asleep on their posts.

Should the cold bring on drowsiness, and the sufferer not be able to prevent himself from yielding to its influence, he must perish as he can only awake from his sleep in the other world. At 25 degrees the theatres are closed and all those who are obliged to go out on foot hurry along with the utmost speed, most anxiously looking at the noses of all those whom they meet in the street. If a sudden paleness—of which no intimation is given by any physical feeling—should appear on that part of the face, the passer by rushes forward and commences rubbing the afflicted feature of the aforesaid passenger with snow, to produce animation. The same thing may occur to the operator himself before the hour is over. At 30 degrees of cold the populace alone go out of doors, entire families shut themselves up, and not a single sledge of any appearance of fashion is seen in the streets. Yet even then the military reviews were not interrupted, and the highest dignitaries, up to the Emperor himself, repair to them without a cloak.

It must be evident that, with cold of such intensity, the sufferings of the poor must be dreadful. Yet it may be affirmed without exaggeration, that the lower classes, in winter, suffer less in Russia than in France. There are placed in the various quarters of every large town in the empire public establishments heated by large stoves, where every person that pleases may take refuge. Dreadful accidents undoubedly mark the arrival of the severe season, but they generally fall on the servants of Russian noblemen, whose carelessness towards their servant's comforts is akin to barbarity. It must not be forgotten either that, three-fourths of those accidents are attributable to the abuses of spirituous liquors. The passion of the people for brandy sets at defiance every warning, and in winter it becomes more than usually fatal.'

A way to silence Slanderers.

'My dear friend that woman has been talking about you so, again! She has been telling the awfulest lies you ever heard; why, she railed away about you for a whole hour!'

'And you heard it all, did you?'

'Yes.'

'Well, after this just bear in mind that it takes two to make a slander, one to tell it, and one to listen to it.'

If there is a delicate, deformed, or weak-minded child in a family, it is generally the favorite with its parents. This is a beautiful illustration of nature taking the part of the most helpless.

A Philosophical Hoax.

Judge Breckenridge, the elder, had a deadly hostility to philosophical societies, against which he waged a war of extermination in the papers, and in the celebrated satirical work, Teague O'Regan. Few persons living knew the cause of his ire, which fell under my observation at the time the provocation was given. In the year 1785 or 1786, he was a candidate for a seat in the legislature of Pennsylvania, for Alleghany county. Parties ran high—and he was elected by the constitutional party, (the democrats,) under the idea that he would advocate some measure which they had very much at heart; among the rest the reception of a certain species of province money, in payment of arrears due for lands in that country. To the surprise and indignation of his constitutents, he not only voted, but made a powerful speech against the last measure. He was then naturally and violently denounced by the democratic party. About this period he became a candidate for membership in the American Philosophical society, to which his talents gave him a claim superior to that of most, and perhaps nearly equal to that of any, of the members of that body.—The 'deep damnation' of his vote respecting the province money, was an inexpiable sin in the opinion of the majority of the members who were ultra democrats; and he was accordingly blackballed. This irritated him highly, and led him to the warfare against the society, and all similar institutions. The Judge said that he was wont to delight in hoaxing this society; and among other tricks which he had played them, he narrated the two following: He stole his grandmother's fan, and covered it for a considerable time in a mud puddle. Having disguised it as completely as in his power, he sent it to the society with an elaborate description to prove that it was the wing of a bat. It was received with due solemnity, and a vote of thanks was passed to the donor. A debate arose as to the species of bat to which it belonged—and a committee of seven was appointed to ascertain whether it was the wing of a Madagascar or Canada bat. The Committee sat three weeks, and after consulting Buffoon's Natural History and Goldsmith's Animated Nature, they reported that it must have belonged to a Madagascar bat. It was pronounced the greatest curiosity in the Museum, except a large sheet of brown paper which he had hung up in the chimney and disguised with soot and dirt, and palmed upon the society as part of a Brahmin's shirt.—M. Carey.

Infidelity.

Men are never infidels for the sake of infidelity. Imidelity—I use not the name reproachfully—has no charms of its own.—There is no charm in looking around on our fellow-men as mere plants that spring up in the morning—wither and die ere it is night. It is not pleasant to look up into the heavens and see no spirit shining there—over the rich and flowering earth, and see no spirit blooming there—abroad upon a world of matter, dead matter, and feel ourselves alone. It is not pleasant to look upon the heavens dispeopled of the gods, and the earth of men, to feel ourselves in the centre of a universal blank, with no soul to love, no spirit with which to commune. I know well what is that sense of loneliness which comes over the unbeliever, the desolateness of soul under which he is oppressed, but I will not attempt to describe it.—Brownson.

The True Idea.

Somebody has written out the truly christian idea. We wish it might become more prevalent, even among those who profess Christianity—the most enlarging and liberal of all religions; if it was so we should see more real Christianity.

A man should live in the world like a true citizen; he may be allowed to have the preference to the particular quarter, or square, or even alley, in which he lives; but he should have a generous sympathy for the welfare of the whole; and if, in his rambles through the world, he chances to meet a man of a different language, or complexion, from his own, still he is a fellow creature, a short sojourner, in common with himself; subject to the same wants, infirmities and necessities: and one who has a brother's claim on him for his charity, comfort and relief.

It is Vulgar.

The following is extracted from Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott:

'Lest I should forget to mention it, I put down here a rebuke which, later in life, Sir Walter gave in my hearing to his daughter Anne. She happened to say of something, I forgot what, that she could not abide it—it was vulgar. 'My love,' said her father, 'you speak like a very young lady; do you know, after all, the meaning of this word vulgar?—'Tis only common: nothing that is common except wickedness, can deserve to be spoken of in a tone of contempt; and when you have lived to my years, you will be disposed to agree with me in thanking God, that nothing really worth having or caring about in the world, is common.'"

Living without Food.

Animals support want much longer than is generally believed. A civet cat has lived ten days without food, an antelope 20, and a very large wild cat also 20—an eagle has survived 22 days, a badger one month, and several dogs 36 days. In the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, there is an account of a bitch which, having been accidentally shut up in a counting house, existed 40 days without any other nourishment than the stuff of the wool of a mattress, which she had torn to pieces. A crocodile will live two months without food, a scorpion three, a bear six, a chameleon 8, a viper ten. Valliant had a spider that lived nearly a year without food, and was so far from being weakened, that it immediately killed another large spider equally vigorous, but not so hungry, which was put along with it. The celebrated John Hunter enclosed a toad between two stone flower pots, and found it as lively as ever after 14 months.—Land tortoises have lived without food for 18 months, and a beetle is known to have been kept in a state of perfect abstinence for three years when it contrived to make its escape.—There is also a well authenticated account of two serpents living in a bottle without any food for five years.

Advice to Married Women.

A decent country woman came one market day, and begged to speak with me. She told me, with an air of secresy, that her husband behaved unkindly to her, and sought the company of others; and that knowing me to be a wise man I could tell what would cure him. The case was so common, I thought to prescribe for it without losing my reputation as a conjuror. The remedy is 'simple,' said I.—'Always treat your husband with a smile'.—The woman thanked me, dropped a courtesy, and went away. A few months after she came again, bringing a couple of fine fowls. She told me with great satisfaction, that I had cured her husband, and begged my acceptance of the fowls in return. I was pleased with the success of my prescription, but declined the fee.

Farming without Rum.

Whoever commenced the Temperance Reformation, was, in truth, a benefactor to the human race. From the highways and byways, from the borders of the abyss of degradation, if not from the depths of the abyss itself, thousands will rise up to call that man blessed, who has saved them from themselves. Great as are the talents of O'Connell, there is an unpretending priest, who is at the present moment doing more to elevate, disenthral, and regenerate Ireland, than a thousand O'Connells, without his aid, could have done. Wherever Father Mathew goes, the distilleries become useless, the pig gets an extra quantity of corn, the wife a new dress, and the laborer sheds his rags for a coat, saved from earnings that formerly went to brutalize and impoverish himself and family. Scarcely less striking has been the result of abstaining from the common use of ardent spirits in the United States, and in no department of industry, has this influence been more beneficially felt than in that of agriculture. Of this no one doubts, we believe, who has made the experiment of farming without rum, or in other words, banishing ardent spirits from his farming operations.

We are well aware there were thousands, in fact nearly every farmer in the country, who, when the idea of farming without the use of ardent spirits was first proposed, deemed it wild and visionary, if not impossible. So intimate had the associations of work and rum become in the minds of most men, that to separate them—to undertake to break in upon long established usage—to get in a harvest, or erect a building, without such drinks, required no little exercise of reason and independence of feeling. Many who were convinced the practice was useless, hesitated about abolishing it, lest the withholding spirits should be charged to a penurious disposition. Good sense, however, and a feeling of right prevailed; rum was banished from the harvest field and the raising, in numerous instances, and it was found that none of the injurious effects anticipated by many, followed. There was no want of laborers; the coarse grains still commanded good prices; and four or five distilleries in every town ceased to produce and distribute misery and death.

In those neighborhoods, and on those farms from which intoxicating drinks have been banished, those revolting scenes unfortunately once too common, are now no longer seen. We remember when it was the custom to find each laborer in the harvest field with his pint of spirits daily, that there was frequently more waste from the effects of the drink than their labor cost. We have seen in the harvest field by the middle of the afternoon the reaper so blue that he was as likely to cut of his own fingers as the grain, and compelled to resort to a corner of the fence and a nap, to restore a capacity for work. We have seen half a dozen cradlers racing it through a wheatfield like madmen, yelping and yelling like savages throwing the grain behind them without care or thought, and causing a waste greater than as many swine would have done, even had they been of the most approved alligator breeds. We have seen a dozen men reeling home from a raising to sleep away the liquor that had stolen away their reason, or, as was most likely, to abuse their wives and children. Now, where temperance principles prevail, such scenes are never witnessed; and their influence can be traced in the mitigation of these evils, even where they are not yet fully triumphant.

The proper source of ability to labor is found in food; this alone nourishes and confers strength. Ardent spirits give no nourishment; they only stimulate; and all experience proves, that all expenditure of power, not based on the true source of supply, can only be temporary, and must produce results the more injurious to the individual. The correct course, then, is to substitute the nutritive for the stimulant; healthful for the injurious; habits that too frequently end in rum for those that are certainly safe and honorable.

If there is a single reader of the Cultivator, who has never made a trial of farming without rum, we ask him as a friend to make it thoroughly the present season, and then to judge for himself. The experiment is not now an untried and hazardous one; it encounters no opposing public opinion, nor subjects the farmer to the charge of eccentricity or niggardliness; and it is not one which might once have been considered as tampering with the health of the workingman. The man who labors must have food in abundance, and of the best kind; he must have drink too, but this should not be ardent spirit.—Albany Cultivator.

Good Advice to Ladies.

Captain Sabretash, in his lately published work, 'The Art of Conversation,' gives the following good advice to ladies:—'My fair friends, never scold servants. Instruct, reprove, admonish, as may be necessary; give warning, or, if need be, turn the worthless out of the house, but never descend to scolding, or to the use of rude or harsh language; for there is, in truth, something very undignified in the practice. There are, no doubt, plenty of bad servants, but there are more bad masters and mistresses in proportion, and for this very evident reason, that it is the object and interest of servants to please their masters; whereas the latter are independent of the former, and need take no trouble about the matter; and as there is effort on one side and none on the other, the result will naturally be on the side of those who make at least a fair attempt. Besides, bad masters often make bad servants, when the servants cannot well influence the conduct of the masters. If people could only see the undignified figure they make when in a towering rage, the chances are that they would keep their temper rather more within bounds. We may excuse anger, and even passion, perhaps, where the name, fame, or character of friends and relatives are assailed; but to fly into a fury about broken plates or overdone mutton, is to show a want of mental composure, that few would like to have described in its proper light and called by its proper name. Recollect that servants are made of the same clay, and that they may possess feelings—kind, generous, and just feelings too—as well as their superiors; and is it not casting a stain upon ourselves to rail, with ignoble language, at those who are made in the same high image of which it is our boast on earth to bear the faintest impress? Let us hear no more of scolding servants, therefore; if you will scold, scold your husband; and if he is a sensible man, he will pat your cheek, give you a kiss, and laugh at you for your pains.'

Melancholy.

When the last poor Indian shall be left to wander, unbefriended and alone, upon a wild, rocky coast in search of a solitary being whom he might call brother—when he shall go down into the valley that contains the bones of his fathers, upheaved by the spade and the ploughshare—when he shall meditate over the new made grave of his late and only companion, and think how soon he, himself, must fall to perish in the dust, like the last leaf of autumn, from a noble and once flourishing tree,—won't he feel kinder sorter bad about it!

Knowledge is Power...Curious Illustration.

At a meeting which took place the other evening for the purpose of forming a North London Mechanics' Institution, Mr. Basil Montague, as an illustration of the maxim that knowledge is power, related the following, anecdote:—He was walking a few months ago in Portland Place, when he observed a large crowd of people assembled, and found that it was in consequence of a large mastiff dog having a lesser one in his gripe. Several persons tried, by splitting the mastiff's ears, and by biting and pinching its tail, to make it let go its hold, but in vain. At last a delicate and dandified young gentleman came up, and making his way through the crowd into the circle, requested to be allowed to separate the dogs; assent was given amid jeers and laughter, when the dandy slowly drew from his pocket a large snuff box, and having taken a pinch himself, inserted his fingers again into the box, withdrew a larger pinch, and deliberately applied it to the mastiff's nose. The snuff operated so powerfully on the animal's olfactory nerves, that it not only immediately let go its hold but made its escape as fast as it could. The dandy was loudly cheered, upon which he stopped for a moment, and said, 'Gentlemen, I have merely given you a proof that 'Knowledge is Power.'

Genius.

Genius is displayed, not in grandeur and magnificence alone. It is seen in the cotton gin, as well as the Principia of Newton; in the Iliad of Homer, as well as the lever of Archimedes; it was in the song of Miriam; in the plans of Washington for the surprise of Cornwallis at Trenton; it was in the daring of Napoleon at the bridge of Lodi; it constructs edifices, fills up valleys, bridges the Atlantic, and hangs the railway on the verge of the mountain cliffs. It was the genius of benevolence that sent Howard on his tour of philanthropy; taught Wesley to lay down principles whose existence was to be felt through long vistas of coming generations; and urged Matthew, the apostle of temperance, to the vast labor he has undergone in removing a plague-spot from the escutcheon of that land whose genius has filled the world with admiration, as her sons have emblazoned her name upon the scroll of honor, with a pen of fire.

Genius was in Cæsar's 'Veni, vidi, vici;' it was in the words of Nelson at Trafalgar—'England expects every man to do his duty;' in the language of Franklin—'Where liberty dwells, there is my country;' in the last speech of Robert Emmett—'Until Ireland is free, let not my epitaph be written.' It was in that appropriate thought which adorned the grave of the dead with a weeping willow, that drooping emblem of perpetual sorrow. Earth, ocean, and the thoughts of eternity, are full of genius.

Honesty.

Were all the world honest, the truly honest man would fare much better than is usually the case, because of the absence of suspicion. He is often received with mistrust and coldness in society on account perhaps of his frankness and simplicity, while the polished knave and cunning impostor, through their adroitness and flatteries, are welcomed heartily. Thus too often the base counterfeit is seized and the pure gold rejected.

Book Shelves.

To give some idea of the extent of the new portion of the library of the British Museum, it has as a point of useful information, or perhaps, also as a matter of curiosity, been ascertained that the whole length of the shelves, which hold 260,000 volumes, was 42,240 feet, or 8 miles. The length of the shelves of the library at Munich contains 500,000 volumes, taking the same proportion will be 15 miles and two fifths. The King's Library in Paris, of 650,000 volumes; must, by the same calculation, have not less than 20 miles of shelf.—John Bull.

MILLER'S THEORY REFUTED. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted.

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the fallacy of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS. 'Selections from Eminent Commentators who have believed in punishment after death; wherein they have agreed with Universalists in the interpretation of Scriptures relating to Punishment. By Rev. LUCIUS R. PAIGE. Second Edition, with revisions and additions. 358 pages.—Price $1.

This is a highly valuable work to all Universalists.—It proves by the most respectable orthodox authority, that the interpretations which Universalists have given of the passages of Scripture which relate to punishment, are correct. It is a refutation of endless misery by the testimony of the most learned writers who have believed that doctrine. The threatenings of punishment, occuring in the New Testament, which have been supposed to refer to endless misery, are explained in this work, in the very language of the Partialist Commentators. It is fatal to the doctrine of endless misery.

DODS' SHORT SERMONS. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the new stereotype edition of 'DODS' SHORT SERMONS,' with addition of several important articles. These Sermons have been regarded by the Universalist public with great favor. The first edition was taken up with avidity.—At the request of many friends, the author was induced to revise the work, and add many important essays on deeply interesting subjects; in which the author has thrown much light on subjects that have been regarded as very difficult to be understood. 'Mr. Dods,' says a distinguished correspondent, 'has done much to throw light on the sacred volume. Many of his expositions have struck us with great force. He has given us great light. Difficult subjects are explained clearly by him.'

Price of the work 75 cents. Wholesale dealers will find it to their interest to call at 37 Cornhill.

BALFOUR'S INQUIRIES. Just published and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, Boston, 'THREE INQUIRIES—1st. Into the Scriptural Doctrine concerning the Devil and Satan. 2d. The Extent and Duration expressed by the terms Olim, Aion, and Aionios, rendered Everlasting, &c. &c. in the Bible, and especially when applied to punishment. 3d. The New-Testament doctrine concerning the Possession of Devils. By WALTER BALFOUR, of Charlestown. Price $1.

ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM. SECOND EDITION. Just received and for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'The Ancient History of Universalism, from the commencement of the Christian Era to the time of the Reformation.' By HOSEA BALLOU 2d., of Medford. Price $1 per copy. A suitable discount to those who buy to sell again. It is a highly valuable work.

GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM. FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM—designed to lead inquirers to the belief of that doctrine, and believers to the practice of it.' By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. This work consists of 408 pages, handsomely bound; and will be sold at the low price of ONE DOLLAR a copy.

I. It gives a brief history of the doctrine from the earliest ages, and notices of its most eminent defenders.

II. It clearly and particularly sets forth the sentiments of Universalists.

III. It gives the evidences of Universalism as contained in the sacred Scriptures, by which it is infallibly proved that said doctrine is the doctrine of the Bible.

IV & V. It explains all the principal passages, both in the Old and New Testaments, which have been used to disprove Universalism, amounting to upwards of ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY, in which all the different subjects are discussed, wherein light is so much needed,—such as the words rendered 'hell,' the 'lake of fire,' the 'furnace of fire,' 'unquenchable fire,' 'everlasting fire,' 'everlasting destruction,' 'eternal judgment,' 'coming forth from the graves to condemnation,' the 'sin against the Holy Ghost,' 'day of judgment,' 'destruction of the soul,' 'kingdom of heaven,' &c. &c.

VI. It answers the common objections to Universalism.

VII. It points out the moral tendency of Universalism, and the duties of those who believe in that benign and heart-cheering sentiment.

VIII. It furnishes a Constitution for Universalist Societies, and advice in regard to the formation and management of the same; showing the only way in which they can enjoy prosperity. It also gives all the laws of the Commonwealth in regard to religious Societies.

IX. It gives directions in regard to the formation of Churches,—presents a plan of Church Government,—gives scriptural views of the Lord's Supper,—and a form of the administration of that service, for the benefit of young clergymen.

X. This chapter is on the evidences of revealed religion; and presents entire that masterly work, which never has been answered, and never can be refuted, Leslie's 'Short Method with the Deists.' Never has one Infidel attempted to answer it, and he gave up a task in despair.

This work is bound firm and strong, because we wish Universalists to lend it freely among their opponents.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE PARABLES. TENTH EDITION. For sale at this Office, the work entitled 'NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PARABLES OF THE NEW-TESTAMENT, arranged according to the time in which they were spoken. By THOMAS WHITTEMORE.' 382 pages large 12mo at the low price of 75 cents per copy. Twenty per cent discount by the dozen. All the parables of the New Testament are explained at length in this work, and illustrated by appeals to the sacred Scriptures. Particular attention has been paid to those parables which have been used to prove the doctrine of future endless misery; and extracts are given from Orthodox Commentators, of great respectability, to show that they have explained them as Universalists now do.

THAYER'S BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT. THIRD EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT, OR SCRIPTURAL GUIDE FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, being sketches of the Antiquities, Customs and Manners of the Jews, in illustration of Scripture, designed for the use of Teachers, Bible Classes, and the Higher Classes in Sunday Schools.' By Rev. THOMAS B. THAYER, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Lowell, Mass. This book is on a new plan, suggested to its author by his experience in conducting Sunday Schools and Bible Classes. It is not a book of questions merely; but each chapter consists of two parts,—1st. The history to which the questions refer is succinctly given, which is to be faithfully studied; and 2d. The Questions. We have examined this work and commend it; but any formal commendation is rendered quite unnecessary by the well known reputation of its author.

Price 25 cents single, $2,50 per dozen.

LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letters and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

BOOK OF PROMISES. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. RELFINCH EMMONS. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

FOURTH EDITION OF CONFERENCE HYMNS. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'

Price $1.25 per dozen—12 1-2 cents single.

MUSICAL NOTICE. B. A. BURDETT (of the Brigade Band,) respectfully informs the public, that he composes and arranges MUSIC for Military and Amateur Bands, on application at his residence, No. 128 Cambridge-street, Boston.

N. B. Particular attention given to selecting Musical Instruments. Gamuts or Scales furnished for different instruments. July 21.

Agents who become RESPONSIBLE for six subscribers, shall, each year, receive a volume therefor, as long as they retain their responsibility, and the same proportion, for a less or greater number.

All papers will be forwarded, until an explicit order for a discontinuance is received; and whether taken up by the subscriber or not from the place where they are deposited, he will be held accountable for the pay until he orders a discontinuance, and pays up all that is due.

LIABILITIES OF THOSE WHO TAKE PERIODICALS.

The laws declare that any person to whom a periodical is sent is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office, or person with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a post office, store, tavern, or other place of deposite, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the postmaster, store or tavern keeper, &c. is responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or gives notice to the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

Post Office Regulations. Extract from the 'instructions to postmasters,' p. 50, sec. 118. 'In every instance in which papers that come to your office are not taken out by the person to whom they are sent, you will have immediate notice of it to the publishers, assigning the reason, if known, why the papers are not taken out.

In all cases where Postmasters render themselves liable for the subscription money for a paper, by a neglect to notify the publisher that it remains dead in the Post Office, the Postmaster General reserves the right to admonish the Postmaster for his neglect, and require him to pay for the paper, or reform him out of office.

Inconsistent Interpretations.

There is no feature in what is termed Orthodoxy, more striking than that which is exhibited in its inconsistency in Scripture interpretation. One hand pulls down what the other builds up; one position is taken at one time as impregnable, but when assailed it is abandoned and another equally untenable assumed. Of this we complain. We ask those who advocate their system to stand their ground or yield it, and when they have yielded it once, not to return to it, after they have been driven from their new position. My meaning will be best understood by furnishing examples of the course, the unfairness of which, I condemn.

We will suppose this passage of Scripture to be the subject of Orthodox interpretation: 'Enter ye in at the strait gate, for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat; because strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life and few there be that find it.' Orthodox Commentators and Orthodox preachers take this view of this passage of Scripture. First, they interpret destruction in this text to mean eternal perdition, or endless misery beyond the grave; secondly, that the road that leads to it is broad, and that the gate that opens upon it is wide; and thirdly, that many go in thereat. In harmony with this definition of the word destruction they understand, first, that life means the felicity of the spirit-world;—secondly, that the way that leads to it is narrow and the gate strait; and thirdly, that there are but few who find it.

Such is the construction put on these verses, and when stripped of their drapery they proclaim in so many words, that the few will be the heirs of a blessed immortality and the many will be the subjects of endless torments; that the road to hell is thronged with crowds, while the narrow path to heaven shews, 'here and there a traveller;' in short, that while the great captain of our salvation claims his thousands, his adversary, the devil, will carry off his ten thousands. This is the unvarnished version of the doctrine, and we find no fault in those who adopt it, if they will be consistent and stick to it. What we condemn is, that when they comment on other portions of Scripture, they lose sight of their previous interpretations.

We will now turn to other portions of Holy Writ of a very different complexion, and contrast them with the passage previously quoted. See Rev. v. 13: 'And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb forever and ever.' Again in Rev. vii. 9: 'And after this I beheld, and lo, a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb.'—When Commentators come to explain these passages they lose sight of the narrow path and the strait gate, and they people heaven with innumerable multitudes. Their mind seems to dilate to take in the heavenly vision, and in joyful contemplation of the hosts of the redeemed, they are almost Universalists. We are sorry to wake them from this dream of bliss (their moments of bliss are so few,) and make them sensible, that in view of their former interpretation it is but a dream. We ask of them consistency and honesty. Let them adopt one of these conclusions: that the strait gate and narrow road does not refer to our immortal existence, or that the vision of St. John in the multitudes of the redeemed was an idle fancy, or lastly, that multitudinous as they were, they are but units compared to the thousands that shall people the world of wo.

It has been said by one eminent in the Orthodox church, that he did not believe that more would finally be lost in proportion to those who are saved, than the number executed in the State bears to the whole population. Such expressions are grateful to our feelings because they evidently disclose a progress towards that grand ultimatum for which we contend; and it will not be disputed by the Orthodox themselves, that the sterner features of their systems have wonderfully relaxed. While, then, we rejoice in these lights thrown upon these dark paths, we cannot but see that they are wandering from the prescribed tract which their own interpretations have marked out, and we have only to regret that while they relinquish the horrible results of their dogmas, they would not candidly reject as inappropriate those misinterpreted passages which are cited to support them.

In the Epistle of Paul to the Romans, ix. 27, we have these words: 'Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sands of the sea, a remnant shall be saved.' If it be the pleasure of Orthodoxy to affix to this prophecy the meaning that only a remnant of the children of Israel shall finally be saved, and that the great bulk of the nation, being found in unbelief shall be lost forever, be it so. We only ask them to abide by this interpretation when they comment on the passage, 'So blindness has happened in part to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, and all Israel shall be saved.

The same observations may be extended to the heathen. It is a point constantly insisted upon, that millions of the heathen are going down to the abodes of despair, from their ignorance of Christ. We are told that this life terminates our moral instruction and that 'as death leaves us, judgment finds us.' That 'there is no other name given under heaven whereby we may be saved than that of Christ Jesus,' and that if we have not secured an interest in him in this life, all hope of future bliss is vain. It is notorious that all the money which is collected for evangelizing the heathen is obtained for the ostensible purpose of saving them from eternal perdition.—While such are the doctrines and such the practice of Orthodox Christians, it is but right that when they expound the passage, 'Ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession,' they should state in so many words, that this declaration is restricted to the handful of heathen converted by Christian Missionaries, and paid for by Christian money. This would be a consistent interpretation.

The different views which are taken of hell, founded on similar passages of Scripture are unjustifiable. Sometimes hell is a place and sometimes a state of torment. We protest against these conflicting statements. If the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus is a simple matter of fact—an actual bona fide transaction, let it be so understood. Let it be taught that heaven and hell are so near together, that people can hold converse with each other; that the rich man was in actual flames and begged only a drop of water to quench the power of the fire that was drying up his tongue. When we attack the Orthodox and inquire of them what kind of a heaven that must be in which our eyes behold the horrors and our ears are saluted with the shrieks of the damned; or when we ask them, what kind of a God that is who created so many millions with the certain knowledge of their becoming fuel for the flames of this vast Pandemonium, let them not attempt to turn aside the edge of this cutting appeal by saying, 'O we do not believe in actual flames, we only contend for a state of mental anguish and regret for our sins.' If they take this ground, then we insist upon it, that they abandon the description of the rich man in hell, as a literal matter of history.

If the question is asked to what cause we are to attribute this want of uniformity in interpretation, I can only suggest the following reply: If hell is merely a state of regret or mental anguish, and there is no change after death, then the wicked will not be very likely to stand in fear of it; but if they make hell a place of literal torment, and locate it so close to heaven that the eyes of the celestial inhabitants can witness the tortures of their brethren, and their ears drink in their cries, then their very heaven becomes such a dismal and awful place, that no good men would desire it.

Universalism in Rockingham County, N. H.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I have had it in mind for some weeks to give you a brief account of the state of our cause in this region, and my own progress in my now, and to me, novel calling, as a Missionary at large.

The first of November last I moved my family to this place, and begun my labors.—Since that time I have visited in the County about twenty-five towns and preached about thirty-five times. I have been prevented from visiting some towns by reason of the inclemency of the weather and indisposition. But I believe there have been only two or three congregations gathered for me, which I have failed to address as appointed. I will not disappoint a congregation if I can consistently help it.

Our Missionary Enterprise is new to our friends in this region. Few, however, treat it indifferently; on the contrary, it seems to meet the hearty response of the majority of those to whose attention it was commended.

Some, to be sure, have feared it might partake a little too much of the spirit and policy of the Orthodox—this impression, I trust, has been already removed. There are a few avowed Universalists, you know, Br. Whittemore, who appear to think almost their salvation depends upon their unremitting hostility to the opposing sects! Of this class is a writer, who signs his name 'Barnes,' in the 'Gospel Banner'. That man, I should almost conclude, would abuse his wife and children, if he was confident the Orthodox are bent upon using theirs well! Such is the folly of some of our professed friends. My earnest prayer to God is that their eyes may be opened to the real pressing wants of that cause which has suffered so long and so much from the hands of its professed friends.

There are thirty-five towns in this County, and it is with sincere grief that I announce that there are but two Societies which support a constant ministry of our order. These are Portsmouth and Newmarket. The first is an old, large, and truly flourishing Society. Br. Moses Ballou, a good minister of truth, has sustained himself well here for some eight or ten years, and is ardently attached to the people, and they to him as a natural consequence for his fidelity. He has fed the people with knowledge and with understanding. Blessings be upon pastor and people. Newmarket; here we have a good Society, but not very numerous. When I bring to mind what the brethren and sisters in this town have done for the gospel as they understand it, I am moved with emotions of ardent thanksgiving and praise! How have they struggled! how have they sacrificed! how have they honored the truth! They have steadily increased, and were the manufacturing business as good now as in former days, they would have to enlarge their house of worship. I love to preach to this people—I admire to write about, and think of them, not only because the name of our much-beloved and departed Br. Hanscom stands associated with their past history, but because I deem them worthy of the name they bear, and worthy of the kingdom of God. Br. S. C. Bulkeley is and has been their pastor for the last three or four years. He has done a good work for them and is much endeared to their hearts for his straightforward, independent and manly course and procedure at a time when they had great and severe struggles to encounter.

The result of the present Missionary effort cannot now, of course, be fully understood. But we may hope at least that it will result in the introduction of three or four more preachers into the County in the Spring.—And in addition to this, the Directors purpose, if it is possible, to continue the efforts of the Missionary. This is very desirable—it is absolutely necessary, if we would see the onward march of our cause. I do not mean that my labors are so valuable, I mean that the labors of some brother in the station which I occupy, are needed very much in this and every County similarly situated. I may say that their has been quite an interest created even now in the region, and good promises to be the result. Atkinson, Plaistow and two other Societies in that region, intend to consolidate their efforts and have a preacher among them immediately. East Kingston, in connexion with a few other towns have strong hopes of settling a brother soon; and the same may be said of Poplin and its sister towns, Danville, Sandown, Nottingham, &c. Let Exeter secure the services of its present preacher, Br. Locke, three-fourths of the time, (who lives in West Amesbury and preaches here half of the time,) or some other Br. as worthy, and then he could supply in Hampton, Stratham, Rye, &c. This would afford a delightful location for a preacher—and I opine that the Spring will witness an effort to this effect. So mote it be. On the whole, Br. Whittemore, we thank God and take courage, for we feel that he hath crowned our efforts.

A word to my brethren and sisters of 'Old Rockingham'—Remember, dear friends, that you are to sow bountifully, if you expect to reap a rich harvest. Efforts are now being made to establish our faith in all parts of your county. Means are in successful operation by which to build up your spiritual Zion, shall we have your united, hearty and constant co-operation? Say yes, brethren and sisters, and act accordingly. Sympathize with the Agent, the Officers. Brethren, look up, for the day of your redemption draweth nigh. Stand forth—give us your hand—give us your heart—let us work for enslaved humanity.—See! see! how men will work for error! O, shall we cease to act efficiently for the truth? Arise—awake—renounce at once and forever every habit contrary to the gospel—embrace it heartily—live out its teachings before your neighbors and fellow-townsmen—drink in its sublime spirit. Let every brother whose eye falls upon this, renew his diligence in ascertaining what can be done for the cause in his town. Come, brethren, come—you will do as well as say—let me hear from you—write me—make known your wishes—suggest to us—we desire your aid, counsel, good wishes, prayers and warm sympathies.

O, what a glorious warfare! Bless God that he put me into this faith! I will praise him! I will spend my days in his service! UNIVERSALISTS OF THE WHOLE WORLD, upon you I call; double your efforts—put on the whole armor. God will help us do a work which shall cause men to marvel. All we lack is true faith in the strength of our cause. 'Go forward—go forward.' Amen.

Birth of the Saviour.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I have noticed in the 'Trumpet,' several accounts of the commemoration of the birth of the Saviour, by various Univeralist Societies in your region; and I rejoice that such has been the case.

Seasons like those which your paper notices have often been enjoyed by the Society in Marlborough; and among the happiest and best was the last. On Sunday evening, the 25th ult. our Church which had been decorated for the occasion, was literally thronged in every part. The song of holy joy went up, and the heart of trusting prayer and grateful praise; and at the close of the usual services, the Lord's Supper was administered, as has long been our custom; previously to which, seven young persons professing faith in the SON OF GOD, were welcomed by the right hand of fellowship as members of our Church.

The scene was thrilling; and the recollections awakened truly sublime! More than eighteen centuries had rolled into the vast but silent ocean of the past, since Jesus of Nazareth was born, and lived and labored for the good of man—and at last yielded up his life, to open to the eye of faith the door of immortality—and there, after that long, long lapse of time, stood fair and blooming youth, and early manhood in acknowledgement of that exceeding love of God, which giving the Saviour to the world, gave with him hope and joy and peace unspeakable to man! And there too was the hoary-head running in the track of retrospective thought over the mouldering ruins of the misty past; and contemplating with thrilling emotion the great event which looking through all time to its final fruition, beholds mankind redeemed and God adored by all his creatures evermore!

The birth of Jesus is an event of no ordinary interest to mankind. And, who, among ALL who name the name of Jesus, have greater reason to rejoice at his advent, than those who trust implicitly in the full accomplishment of his glorious mission?

Certainly he who hangs in doubt that the Redeemer will do ALL his Father's will, can plead no greater reason for joy and rejoicing, than he who believes, fully, that he will 'finish the work which his Father gave him to do.' And, perhaps it is on this account, that many of the limited sects have taken little, or no notice of the occurrence of the day which once witnessed the assemblage of angels to utter forth, in the melting music of the skies, the tidings of 'peace on earth and good will to men,' which shall ultimately make intelligent creation vocal with the chorus which the herald angels sung, 'Glory to God in the highest; and on earth peace, and good will to men.'

And what, let me ask, what is there that should, or could cause the reflecting mind to rejoice at the birth of Jesus, in the views of his mission, and the ultimatum of his reign, as understood by the believers in a limited salvation? Let the doctrine of either of the limitarian sects be true; and is there any way to avoid the conclusion, that the gift of him to our world, is a calamity, rather than a blessing?

He came, according to the common view, to institute a reign which shall end in his separating, eternally, members of the human family from each other, and perhaps the nearest and the dearest friends on earth; and to follow with frowns of unending wrath to the regions of hopeless anguish the shrieking spirits of those who while he was in the flesh witnessed, and received nought from him but the very fulness of love and mercy and compassion! 'Here he went about doing good'! From the mild beamings of his blessed countenance flowed ever that sacred light which bade the darkened mind look up and live!—The poor, and the lowly and oppressed of earth, hailed him that friend indeed, whose every accent was mercy, and whose every act was beneficence and love—at whose bidding disease gathered up its implements of torture, and retired from the human frame—whose touch was eyes to the blind—and the mighty energies of whose love and pity for the bereaved, caused even death to relax his icy grasp from the pale sleeper, and the thrilling accents of filial affection to warble again from the lips once sealed in the stillness of dreamless repose. And many, many were the hearts that beat with transport, while yet he was in the world, at the blissful truth he uttered—that ere his reign should cease, the last sufferer of the human family should be freed, the last lone slumberer in the 'narrow house' should wear the garments of immortal day and peace, such as the world giveth not, should crown the soul! But, if the teachings of men be true, that same Jesus from whose approach on earth even cruelty shrunk back in shame, and coldness blushing at its own indifference, put on the garb of friendship, and mercy shone in tenfold loveliness—shall ultimately sit on a throne of terror whose very sight shall freeze the form of supplication into shuddering, agonized despair! Now take the result to which all limitarians come, of a world of unceasing anguish for a large portion of the creation of God, and what is there, in which to rejoice, that Jesus was sent into the world—or that should cause humanity to raise heavenward the grateful emotions of the soul, that man has ever lived? Oh could the angels, the brightness of whose glory gave sudden day to the night-wrapped plains of Judah,—foreseeing such a result of the Saviour's mission,—could they have ever uttered that devout and holy song,—'Glory to God in the highest,' in announcing the birth of him whose voice on earth was pity, and whose soul was love? No! Nature and reason, and compassion answer no!

But thank God! there are better hopes and better promises for man. The song of the angels was not mockery! The peace which they announced, was not eternal pain; the good will which their message breathed was not the spirit of cold indifference, nor everlasting frowns. But it was the unfolding of the future of the Father's everlasting love, and the announciation of the final enfranchisement of all his family, from every thrall, and their exaltation to bliss unspeakable, in sonship of the living God. And faith and hope smile sweetly where the music floats, and echoes back the rapturous strains, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men.'

Let Universalists then in the spirit of their doctrine ever delight to commemorate the day, which while its annual return is calculated to awaken the holy raptures of the soul in commemoration of an event which was but the precursor of that glorious triumph-scene, when VICTORY over darkness, death and sin, shall burst 'like the eternal thunders of the deep,' in one loud shout of never-ending praise to him that sitteth upon the Throne, and to the Lamb forever.

In South Shrewsbury also, on Monday evening, the 26th ult. the same event was observed with demonstrations of holy joy. The house was beautifully and tastefully decorated, brilliantly illuminated, and filled in every part with attentive listeners, and we have reason to believe that a sense of the importance of Christianity was deepened in many minds. The sermon was by the writer; and in the other appropriate exercises he was assisted by Brs. Landers and Mellen, the aid of which brethren is hereby gratefully acknowledged.

While life and memory on earth shall last, such scenes shall be precious to our soul, and gladly celebrated to the upbuilding of our hopes; and unto God shall be all the glory. Amen.

God seen in all His Works.

In that beautiful part of Germany which borders on the Rhine, there is a noble castle, which as you travel on the western banks of the river, you see lifting its ancient towers on the opposite side, above the grove of trees about as old as itself. About forty years ago, there lived in that castle a noble gentleman, whom we call ——. The baron had only one son, who was not only a comfort to his father, but a blessing to all who lived on his father's land.

It happened on a certain occasion, that this young man being from home, there came a French gentleman to see the baron. As soon as this gentleman came into the castle, he began to talk of his heavenly Father in terms that chilled the old man's blood; on which the baron reproved him, saying, "are you not afraid of offending God who reigns above, by speaking in such a manner?"

The gentleman said that he knew nothing about God, for he had never seen him. The baron did not notice at this time what the gentleman said, but the next morning took him about his castle and grounds, and took occasion first to show him a very beautiful picture that hung on the wall. The gentleman admired the picture, and said, "Whoever drew this picture, knows very well how to use his pencil."

"My son drew that picture," said the baron.

"Then your son is a very clever man," replied the gentleman.

The baron went with his visitor into the garden, and showed him many beautiful flowers and plantations of forest trees.

"Who has the ordering of this garden?" asked the gentleman.

"My son," replied the baron, "he knows every plant, I may say, from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall."

"Indeed," said the gentleman, "I shall think very highly of him soon."

The baron then took him into the village, and showed him a small, neat cottage, where his son had established a school, and where he caused all young children who had lost their parents to be received and nourished at his own expence. The children in the house looked so innocent and so happy, that the gentleman was much pleased, and when he returned to the castle, he said to the baron, "What a happy man you are to have so good a son."

"How do you know I have so good a son?"

"Because I have seen his works, and I know that he must be good and clever if he has done all you have showed me."

"But you have never seen him."

"No, but I know him very well, because I judge of him by his works."

"True," replied the baron, "and this is the way I judge of the character of our heavenly Father. I know from His works, that He is a being of infinite wisdom, and power, and goodness."

The Frenchman felt the force of the reproof, and was careful not to offend the good baron any more by his remarks.

The Evening Hymn.

How many days with mute adieu,
Have gone down yon untrodden sky!
And still it looks as clear and blue
As when it first was hung on high.
The rolling sun, the frowning cloud
That drew the lightning in its rear,
The thunder, tramping deep and loud,
Have left no foot-mark there.

The village bells, with silver chime,
Come softened by the distant shore;
Though I have heard them many a time,
They never rung so sweet before.
A silence rests upon the hill,
A listening awe pervades the air;
The very flowers are shut, and still,
And bowed as in prayer.

And in this hushed and breathless close,
O'er earth, and air, and sky, and sea,
That still low voice in silence goes,
Which speaks alone, great God! of thee.
The whispering leaves, the far-off brook,
The linnet's warble fainter grown,
The hive-bound bee, the lonely rook—
All these their Maker own.

Now shine the starry hosts of light,
Gazing on earth with golden eyes;
Bright guardians of the blue-browed night!
What are ye in your native skies!
I know not! neither can I know,
Nor on what leader ye attend,
Nor whence you came, nor whither go,
Nor what your aim or end.

I know they must be holy things,
That from a roof so sacred shine,
Where sounds the beat of angels wings,
And footsteps echo all divine.
Their mysteries I never sought,
Nor hearkened to what Science tells,
For, oh! in childhood I was taught,
That God amidst them dwells.

The darkening woods, the falling dews,
The grasshopper's last feeble sound,
The flowers just wakened by the breeze,
All leave the stillness more profound,
The twilight takes a deeper shade,
The dusky pathways blacker grow,
And silence reigns in glen and glade—
All, all is mute below.

And other eyes as sweet as this
Will close upon as calm a day,
And, sinking down the deep abyss,
Will, like the last, be swept away;
Until eternity is gained—
That boundless sea without a shore,
That without time forever reigned,
And will when time's no more.

Now Nature sinks in soft repose,
A living semblance of the grave;
The dew steals noiseless on the rose,
The boughs have almost ceased to wave;
The silent sky, the sleeping earth,
Tree, mountain, stream, the humble sod,
All tell from whom they had their birth,
And cry, 'Behold a God!'

Building on the Sand.

'Lord save me and I will serve thee!' cried the professor.

'If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself and take his cross and follow me,' said the Lord.

'I will profess religion, and join the church, and be baptized, and partake the sacrament, and attend meeting, and if need be, pray and exhort,' replied the professor. And he did so.

'Sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven,' saith the Lord.

'Not so,' replies the professor, 'I must have something against a rainy day, and against old age.'

'Go, visit with relief the needy widow and fatherless,' saith the Lord.

'No, Lord, I must provide for my own against the time they may want, as the Scriptures say, "he that provides not for his own household is worse than an infidel."'

'Visit the sick and imprisoned, and take the poor outcast to thine house.'

'Not so, Lord,' replies the professor, 'It would be to the neglect of my business, the spending of my money, the sacrifice of my ease and comfort, and to my cost and inconvenience.'

'Rebuke thy neighbor, and suffer not his sin upon him,' saith the Lord.

'No, Lord, it would offend him,' replies the professor. 'I should lose his good opinion of me, and his patronage of my business. Let me be excused in those things, Lord, and I will be strict in the ordinances of thy house, zealous for the doctrines and honor of the church. I will give something of my property to supporting the ministry and for public charities, trusting thou wilt make up more to me, by prospering my affairs, than I give for thy cause.—All I can do, Lord, in thy cause and for the good of mankind, without injuring my reputation or interest, and that will not put me to hardship, or deprive me of ease or any of the good things of the world, I am ready to do for thy sake.'

'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father, who is in heaven. He that heareth my sayings and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man who built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house, and it fell—and great was the fall of it.'—Disciple.

People are like the sea; they like best the wild, the passionate, the quickly penetrated; they catch the fancy, and seize the heart;—while the calm, the placid, even-tempered, yet really conscientious person, will fail to gain more than our respect and esteem.

Where learning is confined to the few, liberty can be neither equal nor universal.

'Another Strange Thing.'

With no little confidence it has been objected to the doctrine of 'the ungodly and the sinner [being] recompensed in the earth,' that some prosperous, though avaricious, unscrupulous, unfeeling tradesman, who WITHOUT CONSCIENCE hesitates not, to distress his more worthy fellow-men, is perfectly satisfied, is happy, provided he can only amass his pile of mammon,—the only God of his devotions!

Now, all this involves an assumption of a most important bearing on the subject, viz. that the man 'WITHOUT CONSCIENCE,' is happy! If the consciousness of rectitude and virtue be to the good man, a source of SUCH RICH JOY, must not a destitution of such consciousness be to the bad man, just the reverse? If the holy man can rejoice in that the testimony of his conscience witnesses that he is 'void of offence both towards God and man,' MUST not a destitution altogether of conscience, or a 'seared conscience,' be a sure, inevitable source of unhappiness? Can the man without conscience be happy! The view just taken, places a negative on the interrogatory, and demonstrates that while the consciousness of wickedness is to the evil doer a source of misery, 'there is no peace to the wicked,' who void of conscience perpetrates wickedness and villianies. The objection above stated, to the scriptural teaching that 'the righteous are recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner,' is a very 'strange thing,' showing most convincingly, as it does to the candid mind, that to avoid arriving at Universalism, the [Partialist objector has to reason against reason, and also to contradict the express declarations of the Scriptures.

Millerism.

'Millerism is like tainted meat; the more you eat of it, the less you will care about it.'

Br. WHITTEMORE,—A few evenings since, two Orthodox clergymen appeared in our School District, Mr. B. from S. and Mr. H. from L., to lecture against Millerism. After a long lecture from Mr. B. on the 2300 days of Daniel, Mr. H. arose and raid, 'Millerism is like tainted meat; the more you eat of it, the less you will care about it.'

Now we say our sympathies are with the Millerites in preference to the Orthodox.—The Millerites tell us when this great and awful day is coming—they have set the time.—The Orthodox believe, just as firmly, that this day is coming; they say, 'It may come sooner'! But they think it will not come this one hundred years yet, and perhaps longer'! .

We consider the Millerites more honest;—they will soon put an end to the humbug.—The Orthodox wish to ride the hobby longer. They have long lived upon the fat of the spoils and are very unwilling to give up the craft by which they get their living.

Mr. H. chuckled in his sleeves when he got off his joke on the Millerites, but it may be justly turned on himself. He is a preacher of endless misery, and we say that 'tainted meat' sits much easier on our stomach, than his nauseating doctrine of endless torture.—We do not digest it at all. Indeed, 'the more we eat of it, the less we care about it.'

The Law of Kindness.

Among the characteristics of a virtuous woman, whose 'price is far above rubies,' Solomon says that, 'in her tongue is the law of kindness.' She is distinguished from those whose kindness is fluctuating, and temporary, or merely assumed for the occasion. With the truly virtuous woman, kindness in speech is habitual, springing from a deep settled principle in the heart, so that it may be well called a law of action. All her conduct is in strict accordance with the kind, benevolent emotions of her soul. Her speech, her tones, her looks, are the true index of her heart, and infuse health, peace, contentment, and exalted pleasure, through all the circle in which she moves.

The law of kindness! What a beautiful conception of angelic innocence, faithfulness, and love, does it suggest to the mind! How it supercedes the necessity of other laws.—How many of the most desirable accomplishments are included in it. If true politeness be 'real kindness kindly expressed,' if the graces of mind and heart are the brightest female adornments, then Solomon's beau ideal of a virtuous, is also the model of an accomplished, woman.

Who then is deserving to be called virtuous, according to this rule? Is she, who assumes looks, and tones, and words of kindness, when strangers or visitors are present, to be exchanged for scowls and bitter words the moment they are gone? Or she who is kind and cheerful only when in perfect health, when every thing smiles around her, and when all her desires are gratified? Has kindness become the law of her tongue, who only speaks well of the members of her own favorite circle, or of those with whom she is now on terms of special friendship? Is the law of kindness limited to any particular circle?

But this law is not binding on the woman alone. If it is her bright ornament, her sweetest charm, how graceful must it be when fully exemplified by man. His duties call him to encounter rougher scenes, and participate more in the great battle which will never end till sin is subdued and satan is bound—the battle between truth and error, between power and right. It is his, often, to maintain the sternness of truth, and stand up in all the severity of right. To brave the villian and abash the fool, to separate between the precious and the vile, to strip the courtly visor from the features of specious error, and unmask its hateful deformity, though sometimes a sacred duty, is often difficult to be performed in the exercise of the law of kindness. But if the achievement be difficult, it is none the less desirable. The law of kindness should ever guide the tongue and the pen, in public and in private. Even severity should be tempered by it. 'Let the unrighteous smite me and it shall be a kindness,' says David, who knew well that reproofs which may sometimes seem severe, may be the most sincere and faithful exhibitions of love.

The foundation of this law, let it be remembered, is Christian love. How beautifully was its power exemplified in Mrs. Judson, interceding for a poor slave, with her infuriated mistress, and procuring her freedom, or visiting and softening the brutal Burman officers in whose power the Missionaries were helplessly confined, and by her gentle influence subduing their ferocity and even moving them to pity. Here were fortitude and kindness so blended, as to be irresistible, even to the hardest hearts.—Christian Watchman.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 21, 1843.

Meeting at Malden.

Middlesex Conference—Sermon by Rev. E. G. Brooks—Sermon on the Church by Rev. H. Ballou 2d. &c.

A session of the Middlesex Conference of Universalists was holden at Malden on Wednesday of last week. Not a large number of preachers were present. We learned that a very interesting discourse was preached in the morning by Br. E. G. Brooks, of East Cambridge; but as we were not present in the forenoon, we cannot give an account of it. In the afternoon, an excellent discourse was preached by Rev H. Ballou 2d, of Medford; and in the evening a very animated and profitable Conference was holden. It is described as having been a glorious meeting. The following is a report of Br. Ballou's discourse, which we filled up from notes taken at the time. We hope it will be read and deeply pondered.

He took for his text the words in Acts ii. 47: 'And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved.'

The preacher stated that a more correct rendering of the passage would be,—'And the Lord added to the church daily the saved,' or such as had been saved from error and sin by the influences of divine truth. The salvation had been experienced previously to admission to the church.—He observed also, that the subject he was about to discuss was one that could not be despatched in a moment; his examination must necessarily be imperfect; his statements must consist mainly of a dry detail of historical facts from the New Testament; and he should have therefore to rely, more than usual, upon their voluntary attention.

There was one fact, he said, which nobody ever thought of denying; it stood out prominently upon the pages of the New Testament, viz. that wherever there were avowed believers in Christ, there was a Christian church; a church was invariably gathered, having not only the outward form, but the internal arrangements of a church of Christ. He then proceeded to inquire,

What kind of bodies were those churches?—First, they were not merely accidental assemblies, not merely an assembly of hearers; but a body of Christians. It is sometimes said, the original term translated church, signified merely an assembly of whatever kind. This might be true perhaps of the original sense of the term, but that is not invariably its use in the New Testament. The word came in the days of Christ and his apostles to have a peculiar use. Instances were brought forward by the preacher from the New Testament, to prove the correctness of this supposition. Mere hearers were not regarded as church-members, even though they were favorable to the apostles. Belief in Christ, in fact, was not sufficient to make a member of the church; because there were some, like Nicodemus, and Joseph of Arimathea, who believed in Christ, but hesitated to avow him, through fear of losing their standing in society, and such never were considered members of the church.

The preacher proceeded next to inquire, what was necessary in the days of Christ and his apostles to make a man a church-member? He affirmed that there was some definite action, on the part of the church or the individual, to make him a member,—to fix upon him in the face of all the world, the character and responsibilities of a Christian.

Here the preacher proceeded to trace the history of the organization of the church. He began with Christ's personal ministry. Then an open profession of Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God, was the principal qualification, and this remained the same through the ministry of the apostles. But there were also other qualifications. Christ required men to forsake every thing for his cause; no one who was not willing to forsake all, could be his disciple. Jesus and his apostles forsook everything for the truth's sake. When the apostles were called, they forsook their customary business,—left their usual avocations,—and gave all their time and all their powers to establishing their Master's kingdom in the world. This little flock constituted the germ of the church, whose branches now extend so widely abroad. And here the preacher remarked, that outward baptism at this time was not required—it had nothing to do with admitting people to the church.

We see then, said the preacher, that in the days of Christ, the qualifications for admission to the church were an open profession of faith in Jesus, as the Christ, the Son of God, and a willingness to give up all for his name. And that the church was then governed by certain rules of discipline, is evident from Matt. xviii. 15—17.

The preacher then considered the history of the church after Christ's death. The first great movement after the death of Christ, took place upon the day of Pentecost. Peter preached and three thousand persons were brought to the knowledge of the truth, and were converted and admitted to the church. And how were they admitted? By what form? By baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. This fact was illustrated by several quotations from the New Testament. The baptism on the day of Pentecost appears to have been the first time that form was administered on admission to the church.

It is apparent that in the primitive church believers had all things common. Members on entering the church sold their goods, and put the proceeds into the common stock. There was also a regulation in regard to supporting the widows in membership, and the churches at this early day everywhere supported their own poor.—It was then a separate body from the assembly of hearers. The community of goods seems to have been peculiar to the church at Jerusalem, or at most the churches of Judea.

The church at Jerusalem seems at first to have had a kind of pre-eminence. When the trouble broke out at Antioch in consequence of the belief which some entertained, in the necessity of circumcision for the Gentile converts, a deputation was sent to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders there, about this question. After it had been considered, 'the apostles and elders and brethren' sent a deputation to Antioch, declaring that circumcision was not necessary to the Gentiles, but deciding that they should abstain from all sin, and from meats offered to idols, and from things strangled. Paul does not seem afterward to have paid full respect to this decision, so far as meats were concerned. (Rom. xiv. 2, 3.)

The apostolical churches had discipline. This is perfectly evident from the New Testament.—They took cognizance not only of scandalous conduct, but they also ejected those who caused divisions, and those who taught doctrines fundamentally false.

It is also apparent from the New Testament, said the preacher, that Christians were universally expected to become members of the church.

The preacher then took up the subject of the Lord's Supper. This subject was seldom referred to in the New Testament. The phrase 'breaking of bread,' is of doubtful meaning; it may not have referred to the Lord's Supper.

The Supper was celebrated at first in private. It was always confined to the church exclusively. The nature of the case shows that it was designed for the church. Who would desire to join in such a service except Christians? It is probable the service was observed in private by the Christians through the apostolic age.

Here the preacher insisted again, that the church was not an indiscriminate assembly—it consisted of men of peculiar characters—of disciples devoted to the service of their Master, and it had discipline for the regulation of bad members.

From this the preacher proceeded to consider the duty of Christians in the present day. It is our duty to observe the example and commandments of Christ, and Christian ceremonies in their distinguishing character and spirit. Changes in smaller matters may and must obtain. One custom of the primitive church had been almost totally laid aside, because it no longer comported with the usages of common life. He referred to the washing of feet. The mode of baptism too had changed. The washing of feet originally was a common service, rendered necessary by the customs of society; and in the church it was at times performed by the members for one another as a token of humility. But ceremonies never were designed to remain the same in all ages, and in all climates, and under all other circumstances. They must comport with the usages of common life. Our duty is to observe them in their distinguishing character and spirit.

Reference was made by the preacher to the Baptists, who were very particular as to the manner of outward baptism. They cannot regard with favor those who do not observe this ceremony in the precise manner in which they observe it; and yet they will think it a light matter to depart from the primitive custom in regard to all other ceremonies. And even in baptism, in which they are so zealous to follow primitive custom, they have made a wide departure; for they have changed the river to a baptistry in the broad aisle or vestry; and the pure flowing element to water heated in kettles and boilers for the purpose.

The character and spirit of Christian institutions we ought to carry out. We ought to have such a church as the primitive Christians had, and all conscientious Christians ought to join it and take its responsibilities.

The preacher noticed the feeling which has existed against separate organizations. It is said we are Universalists, and ought to take in the whole. Most gladly, most joyfully would we do so, if they will embrace the Christian faith, and show a regenerated life, and manifest desires to live according to the gospel.

But some, he said, were opposed to making distinctions. Still we do make distinctions, and we must. We labor to make men Universalists, and is not this making distinctions? We labor to make men good, and this is making distinctions. We must continue to make distinctions until all men are brought to the knowledge of the truth and are saved, and then all distinctions shall be done away. The same general remarks were pursued in regard to the Lord's Supper. The preacher repudiated the idea of inviting all to the table. Would you invite Atheists? Infidels? Would you invite the vicious? But it will be said, 'if we invite all, the unbelieving and vicious will not come.' True, said he, and if it was thought there was any danger of their coming, they would not be invited. The invitation to them then means nothing; and you depend on their good sense to take you as you MEAN and not as you say.

Probation.

It is a just matter of surprise, that the Partialist clergy have departed so widely as they have, from the plain doctrine of the word of God.—How few of the doctrines which they have preached are to be found in that blessed Book. But we took up our pen in this instance to speak of the common doctrine of PROBATION. How much has been said about the day of probation. This life, we are told, is a day of probation. In this world we are forming characters for the future state. Our condition there will depend upon our condition here. This is our time of trial, &c. &c. &c. Such has been the burden of much of the preaching to which mankind have listened.

Now there is one curious fact, which we beg leave to notice in connexion with this subject, viz. that there is an entire silence throughout the Bible in regard to this whole subject. There is not a sentence, word or hint to favor that sentiment in the entire Scriptures. We speak confidently on this point, because we have made a thorough examination. The word PROBATION, which has been in the mouth of every Partialist preacher in Christendom, is not to be found any where in the Bible, neither in the Old Testament, or the New, no, not even in the Apochraphy. Think of it,—no word in the original languages so used in the Scriptures, as to justify the consciences of Partialist translators, in inserting the word PROBATION. Now, can this be accounted for, on the supposition that the common doctrine of probation is taught in the Bible? If any one doubts what we say, let him show us where the word is. Give us chapter and verse. No man has a right to say the word is in the Bible, if he never saw it there. We declare again, with much emphasis, the word probation is not there.

The exposition of Matt. xxiv. 28, given by a Baptist clergyman in Mason, N. H., is so ridiculous, that a labored refutation is useless. For this reason, we do not publish the article of our correspondent on that subject.

The Trumpet's course in regard to Doctor Channing.

We find the following article, from the pen of Br. Henry Bacon, in the 'Gospel Messenger,' of Providence, R. I. under date of the 14th inst.—That our readers may see the whole, we publish it entire.

We are well acquainted with the early history of Unitarianism in New England; and have in our possession a large array of facts touching that matter. As yet, we have not published them in our columns; but they do conclusively prove that there was the same policy pursued originally by the great body of Unitarians in regard to the doctrine of the divine Unity, which is now pursued in regard to the more important doctrine of the final salvation of all men. We expressed our honest convictions in regard to Dr. Channing, drawn out by the communication of a correspondent. We have no ardent desire to publish the facts to which we have referred; but it seems to be necessary under the circumstances; and at some convenient time, we may do so.

We call the particular attention of our readers to what Br. Bacon says concerning our course in regard to slavery. If we have been remiss in the matter referred to, they know it; and if we have not, they know it. To them we appeal.—So far as our information goes, there is scarcely a difference of opinion among Universalists as to the institution of slavery. It is in itself wrong, sinful,—a great dishonor, a great evil. But it is encompassed with many difficulties. We hope it will be abolished in the speediest and safest possible manner. Such are our sentiments; we have before expressed them, and do not hesitate to express them again.

THE 'TRUMPET' vs. DR. CHANNING.

We cannot deem it possible that the author of the 'Modern History of Universalism' is not familiar with the well known Unitarian Controversy' which grew out of the 'Prophist's' review of the chapter on American Unitarianism in Belsham's Life of Lindsey; and supposing him familiar with that, we are utterly astonished by the assertion contained in the last 'Trumpet,' from the editor, as follows:—'There was no moral greatness in the manner in which he (Dr. Channing,) avowed Unitarianism, twenty years ago, being driven out, by opponents, after long concealment.'

In the repetition of this old and stale aspersion of the character of one of the brightest of the stars that have set, we forget what has been attempted by the Partialist press to detract from his merit. Br. Whittemore has the questionable honor of opening the grave of the past and of bringing up this corruption to lay dust on the fair brow of the dead. Dr. Channing's most decided opponents in this country and in England, have left untouched the ermine of his moral character, having been fully satisfied with the noble vindication of the course pursued by himself, and Thatcher, and Buckminster, as Gospel ministers. We know of no liberal Christian who has presumed to recall and state again the charges which were set forth against them with such a bitter spirit in 1815, by the Orthodox party, and by which that party would brand them as hypocrites. Let any one read the exordium of Thatcher's sermon on the 'Unity of God,' and he will see the whole matter in a small space. And he will see also some excellent hints in reference to preaching, which would not harm those who give ten strokes against Dagon, to one on a stone for the upbuilding of the walls of Jerusalem. Here, for instance, is not a very bad sentiment:—'We have been always more solicitous to impress on you what is true, than to discuss what is false; and have thought it more in the spirit of the religion of peace, to show you in how much Christians agree, than to magnify the importance of that in which they unhappily differ.'

The preacher from whom we quote the above goes on to speak of the censures which have come upon Unitarians, for not making the pulpit a field of perpetual and stern controversy, and says: 'Our forbearance is made a crime; and our unwillingness to denounce those who differ from us, and to turn our churches into halls of unhallowed and unchristian disputation, is imputed to the most unworthy motives.' The worst of these motives is uttered in the assertion that Dr. Channing, after long concealment, was driven out by opponents. Out from what? Out from the covert of hypocrisy, to be sure. Let the assertor have the glory of his assertion—he speaks only as one. Even Tappan, who for years was intimate with Channing, and who gave up Unitarianism, has awarded him every moral claim!

But allowing for a moment—and only for a moment—the truth of the above assertion, is it right to go back twenty years to find something to cloud the beauty of long devotion to the best interests of man? Was there not moral greatness in Channing's plea against War and Intemperance, for Intellectual and Moral Freedom, for the Poor, the Laboring Masses, and the SLAVE? We could adopt this method of going back to no advantage to Br. W. He once, in the case of Father Winn, declared the liberation of slaves a legitimate fruit of Universalism; and why does he not now have the moral greatness to assert and vindicate the same? Why has he never spoken one strong, earnest, thunder-word for shackled millions? Has he not a mind to see, and seeing to believe, and believing to avow and defend, the anti-slavery tendency of Universalism?

But we have no desire to multiply words.—Channing's fame is with the humanity he has nobly served. No great mind ever yet saw all the tendencies of the truths it advocated, for progress is the law of the greatest as of the least, and is as applicable to theology as to science. Channing never denied Universalism, and never asserted it, for to him the Scriptures were not clear for or against that most glorious sentiment.—What he believed, he avowed and vindicated.—He avowed and vindicated not only the universal love of God, but also an extreme moral freedom in man, and the mingling of these kept away from his mind the truth which comes clear to far simpler minds that have not such views of moral freedom as he cherished. Yet was great, and belonged to those of whom he said—'In the more enlightened classes, individuals now and then rise up, who, through a singular force and elevation of soul, obtain a sway over men's minds, to which no limit can be prescribed. They speak with a voice which is heard by distant nations and which goes down to future ages. Their names are repeated with veneration by millions; and millions read in their lives and writings a quickening testimony to the greatness of the mind, to its moral strength, to the reality of disinterested virtue. These are the true sovereigns of the earth. They share in the royalty of Jesus Christ.'

Richmond, Va.

We are happy to perceive that the Universalist church and congregation in Richmond, Va. is enjoying a season of great prosperity. The editor of the 'Warrior' states, that many have been added to the church,—that the Meeting-House is thronged with honest inquirers after truth, and that many more are seeking for the living waters of salvation. Baptism by immersion has been administered to a large number of the candidates. Thus may the truth have free course and be glorified throughout all the Southern States, and destroy all sin and every thing that is opposed to its own heavenly spirit.

A correspondent has sent us an account of the sudden departure of a somewhat celebrated partialist clergyman in Connecticut from his flock.—He has gone it is said to Texas, and he is charged with a high offence. We do not perceive that it will be of any public utility to publish the account.

A new Unitarian Paper.

We have had upon our table for a week, the first number of a new Unitarian paper. It is proposed to be published in this city, by Mr. George G. Channing, brother of the late Dr. Channing, and is entitled the 'Christian World.' It was at first proposed to be called the 'Gospel Quickener,' being designed to quicken the Unitarian denomination into newness of life,—to point out its faults, its dangers and its remedies. With very slight opportunities of knowledge, we have a favorable opinion of Mr. Channing, which probably will be increased by future developements. He has felt the quickening power of the gospel in his own soul; it has reformed his life; and he is now ready to make any sacrifices for the cause of truth and righteousness. We propose in this place to notice some of the statements made by Mr. Channing in regard to the denomination to which he belongs. He is certainly high authority. He has always been acquainted with his sect; he has moved in its highest circles; his statements therefore are important. We find an article from his pen entitled 'Condition and wants of Unitarianism,' from which we propose to make a few extracts.

The Unitarian denomination is now generally admitted to be in a critical position. Its first phase was one of controversy, attack, reform.—It had all the ardor and vigor which belong to a reforming body. Its second phase was of repose. The battle had been fought, and ground had been won within which the churches could enjoy some quiet. They had rest for time. Sermons assumed a practical character. Sunday schools began to be formed and books of practical devotion to be written. The love of ease and quiet, so natural to man, soon took possession of our community. We considered our warfare accomplished, and thought to sit under our own vine and fig tree, with none to molest or make us afraid.

But it now begins to be evident that we assumed this conservative attitude too soon. We never can be conservatives as a denomination.—As a denomination, we are either nothing at all, or the party of reform and progress. It is natural that a few of the old and large societies in this vicinity, which are easy and comfortable, should desire to rest where they are, and not like to be disturbed by new movements. But the small and distant churches on the frontier of the denomination must go forward, or else go backward. The opinions they hold are utterly opposed to those of the immense majority about them. The principles they advocate are counted dangerous by all around. They must build their churches, as the Israelites built the wall of Jerusalem, after the captivity. 'With one hand they wrought in the work, and with the other hand they held a weapon.' But even the strongest churches among us will gradually lose their members and become lean, if they cease to advance. A Mr. Kirk or Knapp, or a popular Episcopalian preacher, will occasionally penetrate into the midst of our strongest societies, and lead away captive youth and women, and sometimes strong men. And if these men and women really find more spiritual comfort and life in their new connection, we ought to be glad that they have gone. Yet we should be sorry that they did not find the same life and comfort in our own churches. And tho' it is very easy to pen a smart paragraph about the young men and young women who become Transcendentalists or Orthodox, yet it is a very bad sign for any denomination that the young are leaving it. If this should become usual, if the Unitarian churches are unable to interest and help the youth of the denomination, in a very few years we shall lose all the ground we have ever gained.

Such is the condition of the Unitarian denomination, according to the opinion of Mr. Channing. He then proceeds to inquire, what do Unitarians need? Shall they resume the old controversies? No, for the leading orthodox themselves have given the death blow to the old systems of faith. Shall they then go off into transcendentalism, rationalism, neology? No, for this instead of going forward would be going backward. It is receding into a species of infidelity. This is a hard blow at the transcendental theology, now coming into vogue among Unitarians, under the auspices of Messrs. Ripley, Emerson, Parker, &c. After noting these matters, Mr. Channing continues.

The way in which Unitarianism must now advance, is by assertion not by denial. It is by taking that high ground where it can receive into itself the truth that lies in all doctrines, all creeds, all denominations. It is by making Life greater than Thought, and Faith greater than Opinion. By its own inherent character of freedom, it can adopt any new mode of statement, any new outward form. It may modify its opinions, but it must be true to its principles. It may alter its measures; it must not desert its ancient love of free thought and its reverence to the rights of the mind.

To be more particular. The Unitarian denomination now needs more Life, greater vitality.—It needs to be made to feel from end to end, that Religion is not an amusement, not a speculation, not a decency, but that without which man is not a man—the great business of the individual soul. Our prayer should every day be, 'Wilt thou not revive us again?' The objection now felt against us is drawn from our apparent inactivity. Men say, 'The Unitarian doctrines seem reasonable, but the Orthodox are doing more, are more in earnest, seem awake, seem alive.' It is no answer to this to say, 'Their zeal is sectarian, proselyting and a party spirit—they are driven on by the fear of Hell.' Be it so; but why do not you do more then? If you are moved by higher motives, why do you not perform greater actions?—The effort of the denomination should now be to realize its own convictions more deeply, so as to be quickened by them into a profounder life.

We are pleased with the above. We hope the Unitarian denomination will 'receive into itself the truth that lies in all doctrines, all creeds, all denominations.' We hope, instead of endeavoring to circumvent other denominations, and get their Meeting-Houses away from them, they will seek after truth and charity, and be willing to receive that too, no matter from what quarter it may come.

Mr. Channing thinks the Unitarian denomination needs more LIFE. He wants a revival of religion among them. There is an 'apparent inactivity.' And he puts one home question, viz. if the Orthodox are in error, if their zeal is sectarian, and if you Unitarians have juster conceptions of things, why do you not DO more than they? Ah! that question ought to reach your hearts.

It should be observed also, that Mr. Channing is in favor of NEW measures. He does not fear, but invites a change of operations. And as to the character of the new measures, he gives expression to his views, as follows,

> The time has also come when we should adopt new measures for promoting this spirit. We should be ready to make use of every expedient to awaken the soul—whether by social meetings, improvement in the forms of worship, lay-preaching, or whatever else may be best adapted to interest and edify. We profess to be free—why not use our freedom? We do not believe our present modes of action to be divinely appointed—why not change and improve them to meet the wants and changing tastes of the day?
> Our doctrines also need to be reconsidered, and modified. We have formed them in the midst of controversy—it is therefore probable that they partake too much of a negative character. They were formed in order to reply to opponents; we now need to put them in forms which will enable us to apply them to our own consciences and hearts. Our doctrines must be preached in a more close, searching and pungent manner.—They must be so stated as to mean as much as possible, not as little as possible. We have been too much in the habit of saying that 'Conversion only means so and so'—that 'Regeneration means nothing more than this'—that 'Repentance is nothing but that' &c. Now we need to see that Conversion and Repentance mean a great deal; and to say so.

The object is 'to awaken the soul.' And the means recommended are, 'social meetings,' 'lay preaching,' or 'whatever else may be best adapted to interest and edify.' Let Universalists take a hint. Here is a testimony borne to the utility of Conference meetings. These meetings have been neglected in times past by Universalists in general; but we are happy in believing that a better state of things is coming over us. Let Universalists every where encourage Conference meetings. Let every Meeting-House hereafter built be furnished with a good vestry. Let the laymen employ their gifts; it must be done; and where there are no objections, let women do the same, if moved thereunto. We have heard women speak with great propriety and profit in social meetings. While we see christians of all denominations awaking to these things, let not Universalists any longer sleep. Awake, awake, awake.

Notwithstanding we approve in general the sentiments of the article from which we have quoted, we take exceptions to certain sentiments in the last paragraph.

There are those who think that nothing can be done with the Unitarians—that they are not to be improved—that their case is hopeless. Not so with us. We see their faults and mean to speak of them; but we also see their great merits. We see an amount of real goodness among them which challenges comparison with any denomination—we see among them a substantial virtue, which may become the foundation of the noblest religious character. We see moreover that they alone, of all religious sects, seem to retain the idea of Progress—that they alone uphold the principles of religious Freedom. To them therefore we must look for our FUTURE—they have a mission to fulfil, a baptism to be baptized with. We have faith in them, notwithstanding all their manifest deficiencies, and we are ready to work with them in hope of a better day.

We do not believe that the 'Unitarians alone of all religious sects retain the idea of progress,' or that 'they alone uphold the principles of religious freedom.' This is folly. Nobody will believe it; the world will laugh at Mr. Channing for such a suggestion.

Dreadful Suicide in Salem.

It is with deep melancholy we are obliged to add another to the list of victims to the dreadful doctrine of endless torture. Mr. Wm. Nutting, of Salem, Mass., an aged gentleman, cut his throat on Sunday, the 8th inst. in a state of depression caused by a belief in the doctrine of endless misery. He was a member of a Baptist Church, and as happy as men in general, until the late visit of Elder Knapp to that peaceful city. Under the preaching of that revivalist, he was made to believe that he had not lived up to his profession; and he remarked to one of his neighbors a short time before his death that he must go to hell. It was too much for him,—despair seized him, and he fell a victim to his own unfounded fears, produced by the false doctrines he too confidently believed.

The Baptist clergyman (Mr. Banvard) was called to the funeral. He offered not one word of apology to the distressed family for having brought Elder Knapp into the place. He did however, have the grace to assure them, that their departed friend was in heaven, contrary to the general sentiment that a self-murderer cannot pass the portals of glory. The Rev. gentleman assured the mourners that the deceased had gone to heaven, and that he believed it as firmly as though he had died of a fever or consumption.

Millerism Refuted.

The following argument was taken from that excellent work, 'Miller's Theory Utterly Exploded,' by Rev. O. A. Skinner and others. We know not who framed the paragraph, but we are quite sure of the source from whence the argument was derived.

'Methuselah was not the oldest man, according to Miller's theory. For his theory teaches that a day means a year in the Scriptures, and that 'seven times' means seven years of such days.—Hence there are twenty-five hundred and fifty-five years in the 'seven times' of Scripture. The prophet Daniel tell us that Nebuchadnezzar was doomed to eat grass as oxen for the space of 'seven times,'—which, according to Miller, would be twenty-five hundred and fifty-five years. This would make Nebuchadnezzar's life exceed Methuselah's by fifteen hundred and fifty-six years. Nor does this tell the whole story. For if Miller's theory be true, Nebuchadnezzar is yet alive, and the decree by which he was doomed to eat grass for the space of 'seven times,' will not be fulfilled until A. D. 1885, long before which time we are gravely told that all the grass will be burnt up. O Tempora! O Mores! For no one can write on such a subject without feeling a slight touch of the pedantic from mere sympathy.'

The Baptismal Question.

We have received (from the publishers, we suppose) a 12 mo. entitled 'Discussion of the Baptismal Question.' Consisting 1st of Hints to an Inquirer on the subject of Baptism, by Rev. Messrs. Cooke and Towne. 2nd. Review of the Hints, by Rev. Mr. Hague. 3d. Rejoinder to the Review, by Rev. Messrs. Cooke and Towne.—4th. Examination of the Rejoinder, by Rev. Mr. Hague. Published by Gould, Kendall & Lincoln, 59 Washington-Street.

We have not had time to read this work since its reception, but promise ourselves to do so the first opportunity. We approve of the manliness of the Baptists, in publishing both sides in one volume. We always half suspect a party in the right, who adopt such a course.

A strange mingling of things.

A Methodist missionary in Oregon, writing to his friends in the East, says,

> I sometimes feel blessed in trying to preach Christ to the natives. We are yet as to ourselves trying to make our way to a better world. O may it be so. Let us toil hard for heaven. We have an addition to our family of another daughter. I have written in great haste, as this is to be off early to-morrow morning. Besides I have plenty of company, a number of men being here to buy Salmon of which I have the care. Others are on their way down the river. Indeed my house is at times, as to travellers, more like a public house than a Methodist preacher's. But all goes on well with Christ in the soul. Much love to all.
>
> Would it not be well to keep the ecclesiastical and secular a little more distinct?

Imitate God.

Our Saviour gave this direction to his disciples: 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.' Many descriptions have been given of God's character; we shall now notice only three:—

1. It has been said that God, from all eternity, without regard to faith, works, or conditions, elected a part of mankind to everlasting life, and reprobated the remainder to endless misery. The elect he loves; bestows blessings on them in this life; and will grant them endless happiness in the next. The reprobates he hates; if he bestows on them any good thing here, it is only to aggravate their final doom, which shall be endless torment. How would the character of a man appear, who should thus deal with his children? Yet this conduct should be imitated by all who verily believe God conducts thus.

2. It has been said that God loves all men, and has made salvation possible for all; but at the same time has given to men an 'agency' which he fully knows will hinder the salvation of many.—Let a man conduct thus; let him profess to love all his children, and to desire the continuation of their lives; at the same time let him give them food, which he knows they love, in which he has mingled so much poison that he knows it will destroy the lives of one half the number. This would be God-like—if the conduct of God be such as has been represented. But God-like or not, such conduct would be rewarded by our magistrates with hanging.

3. It has been said that God loves all men; is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works; that he bestows all the good men enjoy in this life, and that he not only desires, but will assuredly accomplish, the everlasting salvation of the whole human family. Let man imitate this character. He need not hate any one; his benevolence may extend not only to all his own family, but to the whole human race, and by exercising this benevolence he imitates God.

Reader, which character, think you, should man imitate, to become holy? Think of these things. Remember it is your duty to become perfect, even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect.

Brief Exposition of Universalism.

We have received a copy of a little work, entitled, 'The Salvation of Christ, or a brief exposition and defence of Universalism, for the candid and prayerful consideration of all such as are opposed to a universal Saviour.' By Rev. G. W. Quimby. Published at Saco, Me. The author's object was to furnish a tract to the Universalist community that can be given or loaned in return for a similar favor. It is rather large for a tract; but is a clear statement of many of the most important arguments by which the doctrine of Universalism is sustained.

A Short Dialogue.

'Why do you not renounce Universalism?' said one gentleman to another not long since.

'Because I cannot do it, and be an honest man,' he replied. It then became his turn to ask a question.

'Why do not you renounce Partialism?' said he.

'Because, if I did,' he replied, 'I should be turned out of the Church, and lose the most influential friends I have in the world.'

Now, reader, which assigned the best reason?

Christians not moved by the fear of Hell.

The following from Sir Thomas Browne, is admirable. We extract it from an article of Br. Bacon, in the last Gospel Messenger.

> I thank God, and with joy I mention it, I was never afraid of hell, nor ever grew pale at the description of that place. That terrible term hath never deterred me from sin, nor do I owe any good action to the name thereof. I fear God, yet I am not afraid of him. His mercies make me ashamed of my sins, before his judgments afraid thereof. I can hardly think there was ever any scared into heaven. They go the fairest way to heaven, that would serve God without a hell. Other mercenaries, that crouch unto him in fear of hell, though they term themselves the servants, are indeed but the slaves of the Almighty.

The following extract from the 'Star in the West,' gives us the account of another clergyman converted to the truth.

Another Clerical Conversion.

The following good news is communicated by Br. Darrow, a zealous defender of Universalism. Preachers of endless misery are coming over to us almost every week. We may announce the name of another soon, of the Methodist faith.

Br. James Cowan (of East Liberty, Logan Co. Ohio) a clergyman of the Methodist order, has renounced the doctrine of endless misery, and is now preaching the restoration of all things. I was present last Sabbath evening, and heard him renounce that doctrine and declare himself a believer in Universal Salvation. His text was 1 Tim. iv. 10. He preached an excellent discourse, and will undoubtedly become an able advocate of the faith once delivered to the Saints. He declared himself free from the shackles of endless misery with which he had heretofore been bound. He declared that no men believed in endless punishment for themselves, but that they always believe it for somebody else. He rejoiced in his deliverance from his former faith—which he said disgraced the character of the God of the universe. He has statistics from the clergy of the Methodist Church showing his standing as a lay member and as a clergyman of that order May God Almighty enable him ever to proclaim the glorious gospel of the blessed God.

E. H. Conant, Portrait Painter.

This gentleman, whose room is in School-St., opposite Rev. Mr. Ballou's Church, has just finished a portrait of Rev. Otis A. Skinner, which is one of the best likeness we have ever seen. Mr. C. is a young artist, and already stands deservedly high in his profession. His portraits are distinguished for accuracy. We know of no painter who gives a more perfect likeness. His prices are moderate. Those who want a good painting and portrait, would do well to give him a call.

Withdrawal.

The following is a copy of a letter addressed by a lady in Lowell, to the pastor of the Free Will Baptist church in that place. We copy from the 'Star and Palladium.'

> To the Rev. Mr. Woodman—Respected Pastor. After much reflection and attentive study, I have embraced the doctrine of Universal Salvation, which I believe to be the pure gospel of Jesus Christ. Therefore, I shall consider myself no longer a member of the church over which you preside.
>
> But while I thus separate myself from you, I yet cherish a spirit of christian fellowship, I trust, with my former friends, and hope that they too may soon see the beauty of that Gospel that bringeth good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. M. S.
> Lowell, Jan. 10, 1843.

The following remarks from the pen of Br. A. B. Grosh, we copy from the 'Magazine and Advocate,' of the 13th inst. We commend them to the attention of our readers.

Moral Subjects.

Our brethren 'down East' are troubled and divided about the subjects proper for discussion and resolutioning in our Associations and Convention. For years past, resolutions have been passed on temperance, mourning apparel, capital punishment, etc. Of late our Anti-slavery brethren have insisted on introducing the subject of American Slavery, in some shape or form, for condemnation. The result is, no little excitement, some discussion, and a great diversity of opinion. One is for allowing the discussion of any subject—another for discussing those subjects, only, on which the whole denomination are agreed. One is for discussing all moral questions, and all subjects that have moral bearings and relations; and another, seeing that this would introduce every question and subject under heaven, proposes to introduce those questions only that involve measures for the better organization of our ecclesiastical bodies and the spread of our sentiments.—One appeals for precedent to our past action on temperance, capital punishment, etc., and another condems that past course as having been entirely wrong, out of our proper line of business, etc.

Now, in this subject itself, there is much of interest and importance to every Universalist. For the first time, I believe, the question has arisen, What is the proper sphere of action—proper subject for legislation—for our Associations and Conventions? Where shall we stop? What are our limits? To what point shall contraction extend, if we must draw back? These are weighty and important questions, and must soon agitate our public bodies all over these United States. For with the increasing dislike to Slavery, at the North generally, and the injudicious course of our Southern brethren in resolving and printing on the subject as they have done, the question is fairly before us, and we must decide, sooner or later, whether our ecclesiastical bodies have any thing to do with such questions.

But what rule or limitation would you propose? I have none in particular to offer. If there is a real, hearty love for Universalism, and a proper respect to the feelings of the brethren, and common sense among the members of our councils, we will need no arbitrary rules and regulations; but if each one is determined to get his peculiar notions, likings, or hobbies endorsed by some Convention or Association, without regard (or only a secondary regard) for the cause, or caring for the rights and feelings of his brethren, then rules and regulations will be of but little use.—The life will be extinct, and it matters little how the dead body is governed!

In short, there is no help for our cause but in a greater exercise of its spirit, and an increased regard for its prosperity among our brethren. Universalists are not apt to be won over to any measures by force-work, or resolutions passed against their wills and opinions by public bodies.

Ordination.

As our paper is circulated to some extent on Friday, although dated on Saturday, we hereby give notice that Br. R. Breare, of Halifax, N. S. will be ordained to the ministry of reconciliation on Friday evening, 20th inst., at the First Universalist Church in this city (Br. Streeter's.) Services to commence at half past 6 o'clock.

Br. A. Hartwell has engaged to preach on the first Sabbath in each month, until further notice, for the Universalist society in Mason Village, N.H.

We commend to the attention of our readers an extract from a speech of A. H. Everett, Esq. on the last page of this day's paper. It was delivered several years since in the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, in the course of a debate on the question, whether indemnification should be granted for the destruction of the Convent. We published it originally at the request of Rev. Hosea Ballou, to whose pen the remarks by which it is introduced are to be attributed.

We copy the following obituary of one of our venerable fathers in Israel, from the New-York 'Universalist Union,' of last week:

Death of Rev. Nehemiah Dodge.

Our venerable Br. Dodge is no more! He departed this life at his residence in New London, Ct., on the morning of the 3d inst., in the 73d year of his age.

His health had been declining, and the infirmities of age multyplying upon him for the last six or seven years. For some months past he was conscious that his pilgrimage was nearly ended, and he seemed to be preparing for the hour of death.

Br. Dodge was born in Canterbury Ct., on the 31 of July, 1770, and was therefore at the time of his death precisely 72 years and 6 months old, even to an hour. His parents were both members of the Baptist Church, but his mother survived his birth but a few weeks. At the age of 15 he experienced religion, and wrote a hymn expressive of his feelings at the time, which he was kind enough to repeat during my last interview with him. Though it possesses no poetical merit it has a value derived from far different considerations, and my readers will be gratified to see a verse or two of it here.

'When I was sinking into hell,
The Savior caught me as I fell,
And there revealed his lovely face,
Where I beheld his pardoning grace.

Wondering with sweet surprise I stood,
And realized the love of God—
A boundless sea without a shore,
Which I had never seen before.'

He entered the gospel ministry in the Baptist connexion, when at the age of 19. An elder brother was in the ministry before him, in the same denomination. After preaching in different places in the State of New York, Vermont and New Hampshire three or four years, he returned to Connecticut, and shortly after removed to the western part of the township of New London, now called East Lyme. Here he became acquainted with Mrs. Dodge, whom he married in 1794. In 1795 he was ordained an Evangelist by the Baptist Association held at Richmond, R. I., the late Rev. Mr. Grafton, of Newton, Mass., preached his ordination sermon. After his ordination he settled at Southington, Ct., where he labored for three years, and during this period baptized and received into the fellowship of the church, between sixty and seventy members.—From Southington he removed to Cheshire, and finally to Lebanon, Ct., where he preached for 10 years, and built up a flourishing society there. In 1815 he removed from Lebanon to New London, and soon commenced his labors with the Baptist Church and society in that place. At that time the church and congregation were in a very wretched condition, few in number and poor to a proverb. Their meeting house was unfinished—a mere shell—and barely tenantable. Mr Dodge commenced his labors here in 1815, emphatically 'without money and without price.' The church prospered under his ministry, and in a single season he added more than 50 members to it. Indeed, during his six or seven years labors there, he raised the church from a state of almost nothingness to a respectable rank for numbers and influence in the place. He was emphatically the father of it.

About 1820 or 21, however, after a thirty years ministry in the Baptist connexion, as he was preparing a sermon on the subject of christian hope, and comparing Scripture with Scripture, the great thought was forced upon his mind, that the hope of the gospel could not be more limited than the promises on which that hope rests. The truth of Universalism flashed across his mind, but he could not readily receive it. Still it gave him great uneasiness, and he spent almost his whole time over his Bible. Sometimes even when ready to retire for the night, a passage of Scripture or some new train of thought, would suggest itself, and demand his attention, and so earnest was he in his inquiry for the truth, that neither cold nor fatigue could prevent him from giving it immediate consideration, and nearly the whole night was frequently employed in this way. He resolved to seek the truth, and to follow the truth, let it lead him where it would, and to profess and preach it, let its profession cost him what it might. He did so and after a year or two of patient and faithful study of the Scriptures, he was led to receive the truth as it is in Jesus, embracing the great doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind through a crucified Redeemer.

At that time Universalism was almost unknown in New London, and the region round about.—There was but one person in the place who was a professor of the faith, and one other who had some books in favor of the doctrine, and was, therefore, justly suspected of being inclined to it. That avowed believer still lives and rejoices in the faith. She was one of Murray's earliest hearers in New England, and the seed sown by that man of God found good soil in her then youthful heart. Mr. Dodge was excommunicated for believing in universal salvation, and that too, by the very church which he had contributed so much to build up!

For about 20 years he had been confirmed in the faith of a world's salvation, and had preached the doctrine pretty widely during that time in the State of Connecticut and elsewhere. He was for a year or two, the settled pastor of Prince st. Church, in this city, and unfortunate it was for the congregation there, that he ever left. His labors, for the most part, since he became a Universalist, have been of the itinerant character, and successful. Since his return to New London in the autumn of 1841, his labors there have been greatly blessed, and are to be regarded as one of the causes of the prosperity attending our cause in that place. Instead of one solitary person as it was in 1822, who could sympathize with him in his religious views and hopes, he lived, thank God, to see several scores of good and faithful hearts in New London, earnestly engaged in the cause that he so much loved, and for which he had so faithfully pleaded. He lived to see, thank God, a Universalist Church begun in that place, and its foundation laid with every prospect of its going up and being completed, and becoming a sanctuary where God would delight to meet with his people and bless them.

It was hoped by many of our Orthodox friends in New London and its vicinity, that Br. Dodge would have renounced his faith in Universalism before he died. But the expectations of certain people seem born but to perish. He disappointed all such mistaken hopes. He knew in whom he trusted. He well knew the ground on which he stood, and a long and painful sickness, and the prospect of approaching death, had no power to shake his faith in the great doctrines of universal love, and grace, and salvation. It was my privilege to spend a couple of days with him a little more than a fortnight before his death. He spoke very freely and with the most perfect calmness of death, and expressed the most lively faith in the ultimate ingathering of the whole redeemed race in Jesus Christ. I suggested to him that in the event of his death, I should expect to hear that he had renounced his faith, and inquired of him what he had to say on that subject. I told him that it was not probable that I should again see him alive, and desired him, therefore, to say to me what he would wish to say in relation to his faith. His reply was long, for he spoke with great interest and earnestness for twenty or twenty-five minutes, and presented in a very clear and forcible manner the leading points of his whole system of faith. It embraced the paternal character of God, Christ as a universal Savior, the doctrine of rewards and punishments, and of the resurrection from the dead, and life and immortality beyond the grave. It was the faith that he had believed and preached for the last 20 years. It was this faith that sustained him under his sufferings, and helped him to contemplate death itself without fear. His last days were full of christian resignation and child-like hope, and of a peace that passeth all understanding. No one who saw him and conversed with him, could no longer doubt that 'Universalism is good to die by.' He enjoyed a heavenly frame of mind, and was anxiously but still patiently waiting for the hour of his change to come. A few days before his death, one of the lay brethren of the place was with him. 'Where two or three are gathered together in Christ's name,' said Br. Dodge, 'there he will be in the midst of them.' He then requested this brother to pray with him and his family. After prayers, he sung as well as weakness and feeble voice would allow, the following verses:

Jesus! the vision of thy face
Hath overpowering charms!
Scarce shall I feel death's cold embrace,
If Christ be in my arms.

Then while ye hear my heart strings break,
How sweet my minutes roll!
A mortal paleness on my cheek,
And glory in my soul.

It is due to the members of the new Methodist Church in New London, to state that while one or two congregations denied the use of their meeting houses for the funeral services of our departed brother, they kindly and generously, without solicitation, profered the use of theirs, and have by this act of christian courtesy, laid not only the family, but the Universalist friends there under an obligation which they will not soon forget. They will not lose their reward.

May the richest consolations of the Gospel be vouchsafed, not only to the family of our deceased friend and brother, but to all who are called to mourn the loss of those bound to them by the ties of kindred, friendship or love. T. J. S.

Meeting on Capital Punishment.

There will be a meeting in this city, on the fourth Wednesday in January, (the 25th) at 10 o'clock, A. M. at the Second Universalist Church in School-Street, to discuss the subject of Capital Punishment with reference to its abolition. All those who take an interest in the subject are invited to attend.

This is an important meeting.

The Reward of Charity.

Br. O. A. Skinner will preach the anniversary Sermon before the 'Female Charitable Society,' on Sunday evening next, in Rev. Mr. Ballou's Church in School-street, after which a collection will be taken up. Services to commence at 7 o'clock. Text, Matt. xxv. 34 to 46, 'Come ye blessed,' &c.

Notice.

The friends of Gospel Grace and Salvation in Dorchester will receive information by this notice that there will be a Sabbath School for their children, at the School-House on Little Neck, in future; and that the next Conference will also be held there on Wednesday evening next, at half past 6 o'clock.

ERRATTA. In the poetic article of 'H. B.' on the first page of last week's paper, in the fourth verse, last word of the last line, for hand read thraud.'

On the last page of the same paper, in making up the Hymn of Br. Adams, the verses were transposed. The last two verses should be the first two.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Capital Punishment.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I have seen in our Boston papers for a few weeks past, notices of a proposed meeting in that city, of all who are desirous of taking into consideration the subject of Capital Punishment. I have been glad to read these notices, and should have been more gratified to have read some truthful and stirring appeals on this subject from half a score of our talented writers. Formerly we had much in our papers in reference to this topic, and I believe some of the most conclusive arguments in favor of the abolition of Capital Punishment have come from Universalist publications.

I have no doubt in my own mind that public opinion in this Commonwealth is decidedly opposed to Capital Punishment; and I am anxious, therefore to see our Legislature following Vermont and New Hampshire in erasing from our Statute Book a law which exists in direct opposition to the spirit of the age, and which must sooner or later, as truth and goodness advance, depart to return no more.

It is to be hoped that the proposed meeting on the 25th inst. will be a full, spirited, and profitable one,—that those who attend it will come prepared to 'scatter the living coals of truth' abroad so far as their influence may extend, and strike an effectual blow for the merciful, the just, the right. It should not be regarded, I think, in any sectarian light. Let us have a gathering together of the free, the liberal and the true hearted, of all sects and parties, that in the multitude of counsel we may have safety, and promote that which is good. J. G. A.

Malden, Jan. 10, 1843.

Harvard, Mass.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—It will undoubtedly be interesting to you and the readers of the 'Trumpet' generally, to learn something of the onward progress of Universalism in this place.

During the last two years our congregation has rapidly increased, and perhaps nearly doubled in numbers. Our meetings have always been held in the large Town Hall, but the time has nearly arrived when we shall have a Temple in which to meet, dedicated to the worship of the One Father and Saviour of all.

We intend to have a good, handsome Meeting-House. It will be commenced forthwith. The money is raised; the location is obtained, (on the border of the common,) and a Building Committee is chosen to receive proposals and forward the work as expeditiously as possible.

Yours, &c. W. HARRIMAN.

Harvard, Jan. 10, 1843.

Capital Punishment.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I wish to call attention to the meeting appointed for the 25th inst., to consider the subject of Capital Punishment. It is believed that if the public mind could be aroused to an examination of this subject, the evil over which so many are mourning, could be removed. I hope, therefore, that there will be a full attendance, and that something will be done worthy the object of the meeting. Come brethren. Lend your aid to this human effort. Remember Jan. 25th. O. A. S.

N. B. Persons wishing for petitions to circulate, can obtain them at Mr. Tompkins', No. 40 Cornhill, or at the Trumpet office. Send for the petitions brethren, procure a host of signers, and send into the legislature a list of names which will arouse that body to action.

☞Would it not be well for the brethren in this vicinity to give notice of the meeting from their pulpits, next Sunday?

General Intelligence.

Philip Spencer. The Newburyport Herald says: 'we learn from unquestionable authority, the fact that when Spencer left College, a year or two since, he made a present of books to the College Library, and among them there was one called 'The Pirate's own Book,' which appeared to have been much read, from the wear to which the leaves had been subjected. The book yet remains in the Library.'

Pauper Estimate, This Annual Document, as prepared by the Secretary of the Commonwealth for the year 1842, has been published. It is an important document, the Secretary in his communication accompanying the returns, states the gratifying fact, that notwithstanding the increase of population, the number of paupers, and the expense of maintaining them, are actually less than they were five years since.

Charge of Murder. Judge Betts of the U. S. District Court, having been applied to for a warrant for the arrest of Capt. McKenzie and Lieut. Gansevoort for the murder of Cromwell, on board the Somers, has refused the application and expressed his doubts whether the civil courts can take cognizance of the matter.

The bridge over the Eastern branch of Connecticut river at Brattleborough, was carried away by the freshet on Tuesday forenoon.

Earthquake. Last night about nine o'clock, as we were standing at our case, putting a paragraph in type, our attention as well as that of other persons in the room, was suddenly arrested by the violent shaking of the stands, and at the same instant a noise was heard at the end of the building about the windows, as though struck by a sudden blast of wind. The vibration of the stands was so great as for a moment to cause a dizziness as we attempted to take up a type.—Every compositor looked round to see what was shaking his stand, and none could see a cause.—The shock continued while a person might count twenty; and for more than two minutes a slight trembling was felt.—Mrdison (Ia) News Jan. 5.

Singular Accident. The Hartford Courant says that a horse and sleigh of Gov. Ellsworth were lost in the following singular manner.—While some of the family were making a call on Lords Hill, the animal became restless and started off at full speed, running through Asylum and State streets, and continuing on his course until he had passed over the ice that lines the shores at the foot of the latter, plunged into the open Connecticut. Neither horse nor sleigh have been seen since.

Extraordinary Success. The ship Bowditch, Sowle, of this port, belonging to the Messrs. Fletcher, of this city, says the Providence Journal, sailed on a whaling voyage in July, 1841, and in thirteen months from the time of her sailing, she took on board 3500 barrels of oil, and bone to the amount of about $40,000, and 'put away for home.' The oil and whale bone, constituting her cargo is valued, at the present prices, at $50,000. She was fitted for a three years' voyage, and the Captain has disposed of her surplus provisions to other whaling ships in the Pacific, at high prices.

There are in the United States just one hundred soldiers of the revolution on the pension list over one hundred years of age. The oldest man on the list is Michael Hale, of Union county, Penn., who is in his 115th year.

A wag in Albany made a bet that he could get 500 signatures to hang a venerable Episcopal clergyman of that city. He wrote in a fair hand a long petition, too long for any body to take the trouble to read, and succeeded in getting the requisite number in a single morning.

Mr. David B. Mason, was arrested in Sandwich last week, and taken before Seth F. Nye, Esq. on a complaint of Mr. George Giddens and James S. Dillingham, for having in his possession broadcloths, flannels and other articles, which they recognized as having been recently stolen from their stores. We understand that Mr. Mason has for several winters been employed by the Pocassett Iron Co. as a wood cutter, and had erected in the woods a log cabin, in which were found the missing articles. He has been committed to the jail in this town, to take his trial at the Common Pleas Court in April next.—Barnstable Patriot.

Sad Calamity. We notice by the New York Journal of Commerce that Mr. Henry Shelton, formerly partner in the house of Shelton, Brother & Co., of this city, has suddenly disappeared in that city. He took passage in the brig Hector for Cuba, on Monday last but was missed before the pilot left the vessel. The brig put back, and the boat was lowered, but nothing could be found. We understand that Shelton had recently left the Insane Hospital at Hartford, and had undertaken this voyage, with the advice of his friends, for the recovery of his health.

Since writing the above, we learn from the N. York Evening Post that the body of Mr. Shelton has been found floating in the water near the Ocean House, in that city.

Col. Hepburn, was shot dead, a few days since in the Insurance Bank of Columbus, Geo., through a misapprehension on the part of Gen. D. McDougald, the author of the deed. Col. Hepburn having put his hand into his breast pocket, to take out his pocket book, Gen. McD., supposed he was drawing a pistol with intent to shoot him, and under the impression snatched his own pistol from his pocket and shot Col. H. dead. Gen. McD. had received a letter stating that Col. H. would make an attack upon him, to anticipate which he committed the fatal deed. Gen. McD. is a brother of the candidate for Congress to succeed Mr. Habersham. The Jury of inquest returned a verdict of accidental death.

Disappearance of Fixed Stars. More than 13 stars it is said, have disappeared within the last two centuries. One of these presented such a brilliant appearance for about sixteen months as to be visible to the naked eye at mid day. La Place supposed it was burning up, as it has never been seen since.

Attempted Bank Robbery. Another attempt (and the third within four weeks) was made last week, to enter the Waltham Bank. A boy was returning from a ball, early in the morning, and as he passed the bank, he saw flashes of light, and reports like that produced by the discharge of a pistol. He raised an alarm and several persons went to the bank, when they discovered that an attempt had been made, with gunpowder, to blow off the locks. Two or three of the outer ones had thus been successfully opened, but the inner one resisted their efforts in consequence of a strong iron bar being placed securely over the key hole. The reports were heard at a great distance. It has caused great excitement. The charges of powder were very heavy, as the windows were broken out by the concussion. The robbers made their escape.—Transcript.

An Indian Relic. Mr. Hull, superintendent of funerals, says the Lowell Courier, while at work yesterday in the burial ground in digging a grave, threw up the stone head of an Indian tomahawk. It has two edges, and a hole through the centre of the handle, most exquisetly drilled. It weighs about a pound. Its breadth, about three and a half inches, and its length about two and a half inches. It has several dark spots on one side, which, perhaps, are blood spots. It was found about four feet below the surface of the earth.—It is but another evidence of the fact, that much 'of war's vast art' was to the Indians known.

Fire. The dwelling house of Job Eastman, Esq., Town Clerk in Norway, Me., was with the whole of its contents, destroyed by fire at midnight of Wednesday the 4th inst., and the inmates Mr. Eastman, (30 years of age) his wife and grand daughter, and Mr. Shepard Richardson's wife and mother barely escaped with their lives. The fire is supposed to have caught from that grossly careless habit which many fall into of placing hot ashes in a wooden vessel.

There was no man but Mr. Eastman about the premises, and his advanced age has rendered him very feeble for some time past, consequently he was unable in this trying emergency to help himself.

Mrs. Eastman (70 years of age) with noble fortitude and with strength which the exigency of the case demanded, and which at this moment seemed given her whereby to rescue her husband from the flames, seized him in her arms and rushed from the scene of destruction, barefooted and with nothing but her night clothes on, and after making her way through the drifts of snow four feet deep, finally deposited him in a place of safety in the barn yard, not, however, until the severity of the weather, thermometer at 20 degrees below zero, had frozen her feet and legs badly.

Mr. Eastman barely saved a pair of pantaloons which he caught up in his hand and the draws which he had on when he retired to bed. The females of the house saved nothing but their night clothes. Mr. Richardson was absent for the night; he has resided in the same house with Mr. Eastman for a number of years, and assisted him in the management of the farm. Had he been present it is presumed much might have been saved, which the families are now destitute of.

The house was burned to the ground before any of the neighbors got there, and but one family knew of the almost perishing condition of those turned out of doors, until daylight, and in all probability had there not been sickness in this family by which the inmates were stirring and discovered the fire, the old gentleman and all the females would have perished with the cold in the situation and place to which they had escaped.

By this calamity the town of Norway suffers a very serious and almost irreparable loss, in having the whole of the town records destroyed, together with the law library and valuable books and papers, which it had been customary to leave in charge of the clerk. Mr. Eastman has served the town in the capacity of clerk for nearly 42 years, and during the whole of this long period, has faithfully discharged the duties of his office to the entire satisfaction of every member of the community.

And now on resigning his office and retiring from public life, as he feels it to be his duty to do, he carries with him the strong and never failing attachments of the inhabitants.

There was not a cent of insurance on the property lost.

Heavy Verdict. The last of the cloth cases was disposed of in the United States District Court, Philadelphia, on Monday. Three bales and eighteen cases of cloths, valued at $15,000, and seized as contraband, by the United States, were involved in this issue. The cloths were claimed by J. Buckley. The Jury returned a verdict in favor of the United States, with six cents cost.

A Card.

The subscriber would gratefully acknowledge the receipt of a valuable 'New-Year's Present,' accompanied with the usual compliments of the season, from the Ladies of the 'First Universalist Society in Lynn.' This beautiful gift is regarded as doubly valuable,—valuable for what it is intrinsically; but more so as a token of christian friendship. They will be assured that this renewed proof of their regards has strengthened attachments formed by a residence of three and a half years among them, and which time or distance will not dissolve. ALMANDA WILLIS.

DIED:

In Harvard, Laura Ann, only child of Mr. Warren and Mrs. Sarah M. Hayden, aged 12 weeks.

In Lynn, Jan. 1st., Mrs. ELIZA, wife of Mr. Robt. Newhall, aged 23 years. Thus early has a most interesting and excellent young woman been called to part from husband and infant, and to leave behind a numerous circle of afflicted relatives and acquaintances, who greatly lament her decease. One short year has passed, since with happy expectancy, she received the congratulations of her friends on occasion of her marriage. How soon, alas! has this glad scene been changed!—The rejoicing of many hearts has been turned into profound mourning! And the fond hopes of him, who more than any other feels the severity of this bereavement, all crushed at once! But why should we mourn for the dead? Ought we to be so selfish as to wish those even who were so dear to our hearts, to remain with us, when 'to die is gain'? When, too, it is God's will that they should go away from our presence to his own? They have gone but little before us; soon, very soon, we shall follow them.

The friends of Mrs Newhall will not soon or easily forget the affecting and impressive scene, when, but a few moments before her death, she, with pious resignation and holy hope, took leave of her husband, parents, brothers and sister. 'Weep not for me, my dear husband,' said she, 'we ere long shall meet no more to part—live a Christian life—and take good care of our babe'! She gave religious advice to all her friends who were present. As religion, in the days of her health, was to her, a sacred and blessed thing, so in this trying hour of mortal separation, it was her strength and support; and, in her estimation, the most important of all concernments to the living to prepare them to live well and to die happy. Of her, we may say, in the words of one of England's sweetest poets:

'Calm on the bosom of thy God,
Fair spirit! rest thee now!
Ev'n while with us thy footsteps trod,
His seal was on thy brow.
Dust to its narrow house beneath!
Soul to its place on high!
They that have seen thy look in death
No more may fear to die.' L. W.

In Unity, N. H. Dec. 21, 1842, of consumption, Mrs. CLARISSA M. B. HUNTON, aged 31. This amiable and exemplary lady, daughter of Bradford Bailey, Esq. of Unity, and wife of Sylvester Hunton, M. D. who on account of ill health had again repaired to Charleston, S. C. will be long and deeply mourned by her bereaved family and relations, and cherished in the most respectful remembrance by all her associates and acquaintances. She was one of the excellent of the earth,—one of the fairest and best specimens of creative wisdom and power. To say she was faultless might be extravagant praise; but to tell what were her faults, might be difficult. From all that I have seen and all I have heard, both from the worthy family of which she was a member, and many others, it is deemed a duty to speak of her in unqualified respect and admiration. Mrs. H.'s health was always delicate;—but for several months, she declined faster than she was aware of. I saw her, converse and prayed with her, in October last. She was calm, cheerful, social, comfortable. A more than earthly smile often played over her fair countenance, intermingling with accumulating death-sweats, as the parting sunbeams of day give to cold beauty to the grey drapery of coming night. But I have since seen that fair face, and no smiles were there! all was passionless, expressionless as the beautiful features of polished marble! The mourners wept. —All were mourners! But we weep not as those destitute of hope. Blessed be God! the dear loved one whom we mourn, was calm and resigned through hope; and shall we be comfortless? By no means. On the 23d of December, the writer performed the funeral services, at the house of the afflicted parents. All the weeping brothers and sisters, together with many relatives and friends, were present, and were most deeply affected. But there was one who was not there,—the feeble but devoted husband, who, from stern necessity had sought refuge in the balmy South. He was earnestly remembered, and his bereaved heart commended to the infinite mercy and compassion of God. And oh, may he send forth the spirit of truth, and consolation divine into all the wounded spirits of relatives and friends, and fill all our hearts with joy and peace in believing.

'Sweet is the scene where virtue dies,
When sinks a righteous soul to rest;
How mildly beam the closing eyes!
How gently heaves the dying breast.'

BELLS, CLOCKS, ORGANS. GEORGE H. HOLBROOK, East Medway, Mass. manufactures CHURCH BELLS, CHURCH CLOCKS and CHURCH ORGANS.

Holbrook's BELLS are well known. It is the general testimony of those who are judges, and who have had opportunities of forming an opinion, that his Bells are the best which are manufactured in the United States, both for strength and brilliancy of tone. The best Bells in Boston, New York, and other great cities, are from Holbrook's Foundry.

Mr. Holbrook's CLOCKS are well known. There are probably a greater number of tower Clocks in Massachusetts manufactured by him, than any other man. He has facilities for manufacture, which enable him not only to make good Clocks, but to undersell all other manufacturers. These are the causes of the great number he has sold.

His ORGANS may be judged of by the Organ at the Marlboro' Chapel, which is from his manufacture.

The public are assured that it will be for their interest to call, if they wish to purchase either Bells, Clocks or Organs.

EIGHT DOLLARS PER DOZEN!

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY. THIRD EDITION. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by THOMAS WHITTEMORE, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, especially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are no tunes in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of SHORT ANTHEMS, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Laug, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the LESSONS or RUDIMENTS, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent choir master of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lowell,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

DEAR SIR,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

'GOSPEL HARMONIST.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as it merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

The aged Christian's Death Bed.

'The hoary head is a crown of glory if it be found in the ways of righteousness.'

Upon that brow, no diadem
Hath shed it splendors rich and rare;
But faith beholds a radiant gem
In every silver ringlet there.

The faded lustre of that eye,
The icy coldness of that cheek,
The long drawn breath—the heaving sigh,
The tyrant's near approach bespeak.

Yet hope is in that dying smile;
In whispers soft, it seems to say,
Stay, hov'ring angels—stay awhile,
And bear my ransomed soul away.

Oh soon to holier joys he'll wake
'Mid sainted choirs. Ah! dost thou see
The silver cord's about to break,
'Tis done—'tis done—the spirit's free!

Oh let me hear that rapturous strain
That melts away in tones so sweet;
Hark! angels strike their harps again.
He casts his crown at JESUS' feet.

The Convent.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—If the following extract from Mr. Everett's remarks on the Catholic question in the Legislature, taken from the Boston Courier, of March 17th, should be deemed suitable for your religious paper, I can hardly doubt that the spirit and arguments it manifests, will be not only pleasing but profitable to your numerous readers. The first part of the orator's remarks are not omitted but for the reason that they refer to what had by others been offered irrelevant to the question, before the House, and the inconvenience of occupying too much of your paper.

Notwithstanding I offer this extract with my candid approbation of its sentiments in general, and especially of the liberality of its principles, I am free to express my regret that the exciting circumstances of a supposed injury to one of the sisterhood, was overlooked by the orator in assigning the motive which influenced to action, those who were so unfortunately and unjustly employed in the destruction of the Convent. Had it not been for this supposed injury to one of the sisterhood, there is no reason to believe that any violence would have been offered. H. B.

In the very few remarks with which I shall trouble the House, I shall endeavor, Mr. Speaker, to observe the caution which was given by the client to the Roman lawyer, and shall confine myself strictly to the merits of the question. These, Sir, appear to me to lie within a very narrow compass. The subject before us is the Report of the Select Committee upon the petition of Benedict Fenwick and others, to be indemnified for losses occasioned by the destruction of Ursuline Convent at Charlestown. The petitioners after stating in general terms the circumstances of this event, proceed to say, 'that they have been for many years past inhabitants of this Commonwealth, relying upon the protection of the laws over their persons and property, and for the purpose of said protection paying to said Commonwealth, all the duties and taxes levied upon them from year to year, that they have at all times demeaned themselves as good, obedient and peaceful citizens, performing all the duties required by law, and were therefore entitled to its full protection; that, by reason of the insufficiency of the law and its total inadequacy for their protection, they have suffered great deprivation and loss, and said Ursuline community has been rendered wholly destitute; and inasmuch as said losses and deprivations have been occasioned through the inadequacy and inefficiency of the law, whose protection from open outrage and destruction of property they have a right to demand and expect, your petitioners pray, there being no other remedy in their behalf, that they may be indemnified by the Commonwealth for the losses they have sustained, and that full provision in their behalf may be made for them.'

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the case of the petitioners as presented by themselves and in their own language. They are inhabitants of this Commonwealth, who have paid their taxes and demeaned themselves in other respects like good citizens. Having lost their property as they conceive, through the insufficiency of the law, and supposing that they have a right under such circumstances to expect and demand indemnity of the Commonwealth, they come to us for this purpose. The question for the House to decide is whether they have or have not such a right. If we think they have, we shall of course grant their petition and give them the indemnity which they expect and demand. If not, however deeply we may regret the events by which they have lost their property, we must treat them as we treat all other persons who come to us for more than they have a right to ask or we to give.

Have the petitioners then or have they not a right to expect and demand indemnity for their losses from the Commonwealth at the hands of this Legislature? This question, Mr. Speaker, which seems to me to be the only one in this case, is decided against them by the Committee. The Report takes the ground that although allegiance and protection are reciprocal, this protection is only to be given through the instrumentality of general laws:—that the citizen native or foreigner has no right to expect or demand any more of the Government than the benefit of the regular administration of these laws or in the event of their infraction such satisfaction as he can obtain through the courts in the ordinary forms of justice. The language of the report on this point is as follows:—

'In view of these facts, the petitioners ask for indemnity for the injury they have received, and they ask it as a matter of right. They contend that Government is bound to afford protection to the citizen, in consideration of his obedience and services rendered to the government, and that when this protection fails, the government is bound to make remuneration. It is true, that by the theory of our institutions, the government is bound to afford protection to the citizen, in consideration of his allegiance; and your committee suppose that this protection is afforded, to every practical extent, by the enactment, from time to time, as they shall be deemed necessary, wholesome and proper laws, with remedies for their infraction. If it so happen in any individual case, that the remedy cannot be beneficially enforced, either on account of the deficiency of proof, or of the inability of the offenders to respond in damages, this is a misfortune to which every citizen is liable, and for which the government cannot be held responsible. The petitioners have the same remedy in this case, against those who have destroyed their property, as others have in cases of private depredation. It is true they cannot discover those who have committed the act, nor if discovered is it probable they would be able to make remuneration for the losses they have occasioned. Such also is the fact in every day's experience in cases of loss occasioned by individuals, yet it is never contended, that in such cases, the government is liable to make indemnity to the sufferer on account of the failure of the remedy. Your committee cannot distinguish this class of cases from the one under consideration. They therefore cannot admit, that the petitioners have a claim, as a matter of right, upon the government, for indemnity for their pecuniary losses.'

Such, Mr. Speaker, are the views of the committee, and in these views I have no hesitation in saying that I entirely concur. It is no doubt the duty of the Government, as the petitioners suppose, to afford them protection in their persons and property. For this purpose the Government acts through several distinct departments. By its legislative department of which this House is one branch, it enacts general laws:—by its executive and judiciary departments it applies these laws to individual cases for the purposes of enforcement, prevention or remedy. When the several departments have all had their operation the action of the Government is exhausted. There is nothing farther to be done. The individual who is dissatisfied with the operation of the law as applied by the executive and judiciary departments to his particular case, cannot come to the Legislature for relief, because the Legislature, as such, has and can have no knowledge of particular cases. It would be just as reasonable in principle for an individual who might be dissatisfied with the provisions of one of the general laws, to go to the courts of justice to get it amended, as for one who is dissatisfied with the application of the law in his or in any other particular case to apply to the Legislature for a remedy. If the Legislature were to undertake to rejudge the justice of the courts, and erect itself into a High Court of Appeal from their decisions, it would not only involve itself in a chaos of interminable controversies, but would go entirely beyond the sphere of its own constitutional powers. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we as a branch of the Legislature, have, and can have no knowledge of the circumstances of this or any other individual case, and have consequently no means of affording redress for any real or supposed defect of justice.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that some of the gentlemen who have preceded me, and particularly my friend and colleague who spoke yesterday afternoon with so much feeling and eloquence, (Mr. Winthrop) have taken stronger ground than the committee, and have assumed that the partitioners have, as they suppose, a right to expect and demand indemnity. He read to us in support of this position the general clauses of the constitution and bill of rights, which declare that the citizen is entitled to the protection of the Government. But these clauses, as the House no doubt remarked at the time, state expressly that this protection is to be afforded through the agency of general laws. The argument therefore, however eloquently urged, carried its refutation with it. It is hardly necessary to add that this incapacity of the Legislature to take cognizance of particular cases is a principle of the constitution, which far from being severe, is wholly favorable to the interest of the citizen. While it deprives him of the right of coming to the Legislature to redress the course of justice, it also relieves him from the danger of special legislation against himself, and this is a matter of far more consequence. The prudent citizen has generally but little cause to complain of the ordinary course of law, but if special legislation were admitted, he would not unfrequently find himself exposed to the effects of the malice of political or personal enemies operating through the agency of the constituted authorities of the country.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I concur entirely with the Committee in the opinion that the petitioners have not, as they suppose, a right to expect or demand of this Commonwealth indemnity for their losses. Should the House take the same view of the subject, the question, as I understand it, is settled.—The Committee, however, while they decide that the petitioners have no rights, recommend that a gratuity should be given to them, and they propose, if the House should adopt the principle, to fix the amount at $10,000.

On this point, Mr. Speaker, I am compelled, though reluctantly, to dissent from the views of the Committee. It would give me great pleasure to adopt their suggestions, and when I first looked at the subject, I was strongly inclined to do so; but on examining it more nearly, for the purpose of making up my opinion, I can see no ground whatever on which a proceeding like the one that they propose, can be justified.

In the first place the petitioners do not ask us for a present; they demand indemnity as a right. This is a very different thing from requesting a gratuity. We have no means of knowing that a present would be acceptable to them; we are not informed that they have occasion for one. If they are entitled to indemnity, they ought to receive a much larger sum than the one now proposed: to offer them as a gift a small part of what they claim as a right, would be, as I conceive, a proceeding entirely irregular and at variance with all the usual forms of legislative action.

Independently of these considerations, which are perhaps of themselves decisive against a gratuity, the proposition is liable to the further and still more weighty objection, that this gratuity, if given at all, is given for the purpose of supplying the deficiency of the ordinary administration of justice. The case does not seem to me to stand where the gentleman who preceeded me (Mr. Baylies) attempted to place it, on the same ground with an application from literary institutions for grants in the way of encouragement and assistance. For such grants I am generally disposed to vote. The Committee on Education, of which I am a member, have reported in favor of two at this session, and I have concurred in these reports. I can hardly imagine a case of this kind, which I would not cheerfully support to the extent of my feeble ability. If the present petitioners had come before us to request aid as a literary institution, I cannot say that I would have granted their request, because I do not know what sort of case they might have been able to make out, but I can say with perfect truth that I believe they would have stood on stronger ground than they now do. They now come to us to claim redress for deficiences in the ordinary administration of justice. If we give them a gratuity, we still give it for the same general purpose—we still undertake to rejudge the justice of the Courts, and to render ourselves a tribunal in the last resort for appeals from their decision. This would not only be obviously inexpedient, but as I remarked before, it would be wholly at variance with the spirit and letter of the constitution. The complete separation of the legislative and judiciary departments of the government, is the greatest security for private rights, and is the last principle in our institutions which a friend of liberty would wish to see altered. To give a gratuity to one set of individuals, because they have, as they conceive, been wronged by another set, and have not been able to obtain satisfaction in the usual forms of law, would be wholly inconsistent with this principle, and would establish a precedent that might be followed by consequences of a very serious character.

We are told, Mr. Speaker, that the honor of the Commonwealth is deeply concerned in this affair; that a stain has been fixed upon us, which can only be removed by some act on our part like the one now proposed. For myself, Mr. Speaker, I am wholly unable to see in what way the honor of the Commonwealth is at all implicated. A very large majority of the citizens knew nothing of the matter, till they read the account of it in the newspapers. On what principle are they to be made responsible in honor for proceedings in which they took no part—of which they had no knowledge? The cultivators of Berkshire, Worcester and the other inland counties, were quietly sleeping in their beds; the seamen of the maritime districts were ploughing the ocean when the outrage took place. How does it concern their honor that a horde of desperados set fire, at midnight, to a building in Charlestown, and that the principal authorities of that place were not efficient enough to check their fury? The honor of Charlestown, and, to a certain extent, of its immediate vicinity, is no doubt deeply implicated. It is scarcely to be imagined how several thousand persons could have stood for hours and passively witnessed these outrages, when a resolute movement by a few effective men would, at any moment, have brought them to a close. The fact is in no way creditable to the persons present, but the whole responsibility for it rests upon them. The honor of the Commonwealth is not interested. The spontaneous and unanimous burst of indignation, which broke from the citizens of Boston the same day, at Faneuil Hall, relieves them also, as a body, from any sympathy in this transaction. At that meeting, a proposition was made, and I think adopted, to raise a sum of money, by private contribution, for the relief of the sufferers. Such a measure, without being liable to the objections which operate against a legislative grant, would have tended very strongly to soothe the wounded feelings of the parties interested, and may still perhaps be considered as expedient.

In opposing the grant of a gratuity to the present petitioners, I wish to be understood as entirely and distinctly disclaiming any prejudice against them on account of the form of their religious faith. I feel no such prejudice. It has been my fortune to pass several years of my life in Catholic countries; I have had opportunities of observing the character and operation of that form of our religion in some of its principal seats, and the effect has been to remove completely from my mind any sentiment of aversion to it, which I might have imbibed from merely Protestant associations. I have no hesitation in saying, that I consider the Catholic form of Christianity not only as the most ancient and extensive, but as in itself one of the most respectable and valuable that our religion has ever worn. Its discipline, particularly, is a system admirably calculated to carry home the influence of religion to the heart of the individual, at all hours and through all his occupations and diversions. Its doctrine is open to some objections, but even this has a very different aspect as explained by its intelligent adherents, from that which it puts on in the mouths of unenlightened bigots or prejudiced enemies. The ceremonial, with all its accessaries of architecture, music, painting, and sculpture, is truly magnificent. Deeply as I venerate the memory of the great fathers of the Reformation, highly as I prize the principles of religious liberty, which they bequeathed to us as the chief result of their efforts, I am sometimes disposed to lament the headlong fury with which they swept away all the ornamental parts of the ritual, and even destroyed the finest specimens of art, because they had been consecrated to what they regarded as an adolatrous form of worship. [The sentiment here is doubtful.]

Such, Mr. Speaker, are the views I entertain of the Catholic religion. I believe that they are now pretty general among impartial and reflecting men. There is in fact a continually growing disposition, in all parts of the Christian world, to consider religion as residing essentially in the great truths that are common to all the sects, rather than in the minor points of faith and practice, upon which they are divided. Permit me also to add, that I cheerfully concur in all that has been said by the gentleman who preceded me and others in the commendation of the high functionaries of the Catholic Church who have resided in this neighborhood, and by whom the Ursuline Convent was founded. Their influence has been uniformly exercised in the very best manner upon the large and somewhat turbulent portion of our population, with which they are immediately connected; and our community is deeply indebted to them for their services in this respect, as well as for the example of a truly apostolic life.

With these views of the Catholic religion, you will readily perceive, Mr. Speaker, that I oppose the gratuity, from no unfriendly feeling toward the faith of the petitioners. If I thought that it could be granted with propriety and safety, I would give it to them with as much pleasure, being Catholics, as I would if they were Protestants:—I may even say with more. Believing that it ought not to be granted, I must refuse it to them whether they belong to one of these denominations or the other.

Let me remark, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, that while I entertain the favorable view that I have expressed of the Catholic religion, I am well aware that it is not the view most generally entertained in this community and particularly in the country. A rooted aversion to the Romish faith is cheerished as an hereditary sentiment by a very large proportion of the people of this Commonwealth. The circumstances under which the Colony was established, and the whole course of our history, render it perfectly natural that such should be the case. The founders of the Convent were aware of this state of things when they established that institution. They came forward with the zeal of martyrs and planted the banner of their faith in its least inviting shape in the midst of what they knew to be the head-quarters of the enemy. Now, sir, I have no disposition whatever, to extenuate the outrage that has been committed at Charlestown. I view it in its true light, but while I would nothing extenuate I would also set down nought in malice, and I appeal to the good sense and correct feeling of the petitioners themselves, to say, whether the circumstances under which they introduced themselves into this community, although they cannot justify, do not, in some degree, account for such an outrage? The ardent zeal for the propagation of their peculiar form of our religion which brings them to our shores, is, I doubt not, perfectly sincere; the rooted aversion to that particular form which prevails, as I have stated throughout this community, is equally ardent, equally sincere, and, I may add, about as reasonable. Is it wonderful that the collision of these two forms of religious prejudice should produce a violent explosion? Such, sir, and no other, was the real principle that lay at the bottom of this ebullition of popular frenzy. Let us do ourselves at least this justice. It was not a sordid thirst for plunder; it was not, as the gentleman who preceded me suggested, a blind hostility of the poor against the rich, which occasioned the outrage. No, sir, deplorable as the act may have been, the motive was nothing worse than sincere though misguided religious zeal. The very same sentiment which led to the building of the Convent, has reduced it to ashes. It stood amongst us a monument of mistaken religious zeal; it has fallen a burnt-offering on the altar of the same principle.*

Let this consideration, Mr. Speaker, reconcile the petitioners, in some degree, to the disastrous result that has occurred. Let them recollect, before they complain too loudly of what they have suffered, how much their presence among us shocks the cherished feelings of our whole community. Sir, when the genuine son of the Pilgrims sees the cross of Popery blazing in golden lustre over the metropolis of Puritanism—when he sees the high places and the groves in our vicinity polluted by that worst of all abuses (as he deems it) a Nunnery, his heart dies within him. He feels as if the abomination of desolation had already got possession of the holy place. He feels as if the whole fruit of the toils, the suffering, the sacrifices of our glorious ancestors was about to be torn from their posterity. He is driven to desperation. He does not stop to inquire whether the Convent is one of Ursulines or of Carmelites. He grasps as the readiest recource at the firebrand. Violent as the act may have been, it is quite in keeping with the course of events in other ages and countries. Religion is precisely the point upon which all nations are most sensitive, and it requires a very advanced state of civilization even to tolerate the presence of adverse forms. The Turks are not the most barbarous people on the globe, but let the petitioners attempt to build their Convent in the heart of Constantinople, and see how long they would escape the bow string. Let them try it in Japan or in China, both highly civilized and enlightened communities. Why sir, I have lived myself for four years in one of the Catholic capitals of Europe, where, if I had happened to die, I could not as a Protestant have had a christian burial—where I could only have obtained it if at all, as a diplomatic privilege. Such, sir, is even now the state of feeling among the Catholics in their own principal cities in regard to Protestants. When they come among us they are a good deal better treated than we are at Madrid. They are received with every demonstration of personal kindness; they perform public worship in their own way without molestation; they erect the standard of their faith in the centre of our metropolis; they place their Convent upon the finest eminence in our vicinity. When a burst of popular indignation reduces it to ashes, the Courts are open to them. Every effort is employed by the government to avenge the violated majesty of the laws; to procure the sufferers the appropriate redress. Let this be sufficient; let them be content with justice; let them not ask us to give them a gratuity for offending all our cherished prejudices, and seriously endangering the peace of the Commonwealth.

Sir, they do not ask it; they request no favors; they conceive that they have a right to expect and demand indemnity. They come to us for that purpose. I believe that they have no such right, and for that reason I shall vote for striking out the Resolve.

*The conclusion here is doubtful. In our judgment, it was not hostility to the Catholic religion that caused the destruction of the Convent. The elopement and supposed confinement of Miss Harrison,—the report that she was insane, which the public did not credit—and the apprehension (totally unfounded) that she was buried in a dungeon, led on the infuriated mob.—Ed. Trump.

To-Morrow.

To-morrow is the coin with which the procrastinator pays the urgent demands of that detestible dun To-day, who is continually at his elbow; or it is rather his I O U, or promissory note, which he never honors, but continually renews. Time, however, saves his conscience, for no sooner is To-morrow born, than old Chronos becomes its sponsor, and names it To-day; thus aiding and abetting the quibbling procrastinator in his fraudulent pretences and evasion. The consequences of this conduct are, however, always costly, and sometimes fatal to those who indulge in it, and frequently, indeed, approach to the borders of insanity. Tom Tortoise receives a letter with the information that his maternal uncle is dangerously ill. 'Ah!' cries he, 'I suppose I must post off and see the old fogey, and exhibit my affection; so I'll pack up and be off—to-morrow!' He goes, and alas! finds the old fogey is 'gone' before his arrival, and, vexed at his delay, has left the bulk of his property to some distant relative, or some friend of To-day, who was cunningly 'doing the attentive' on the spot! A neighbor complains to old Slow, that, in consequence of a hole in his fences, the peripatetic porkers of the said Slow have been enjoying themselves in his flower-gardens, and, in their porcine ignorance of botany, mistaken some valuable bulbous roots for turnips, or other legitimate food for swine. 'Oy, oy!' grunts Slow, 'I maun see to that—to-morrow!' To-morrow comes, and with it a lawyer's letter, setting forth an awful extent of damages, and the threat of an action. A compromise is insinuated, but his dilatory disposition prompts him still to put off the evil day until it is too late, and Slow is mulcted in a round sum and considerable costs. To-morrow is, in fact, a notorious cheat—a promise-breaker, who is always coming, but never appears; therefore put no faith in him, but trust in To-day, who is a plain-spoken, honest servant, who is always at your side, and ready to obey your bidding.—London Weekly Dispatch.

The Great Sea Serpent.

An animal, which apparently belonged to this class, was stranded in the island of Stronsa, one of the Orneys, in the year 1808, and was first seen entire, and measured by respectable individuals, and afterwards, when dead and broken in pieces by the violence of the waves, was again examined by many;—portions of it being secured, such as the skull, and upper bones of the swimming paws, by Mr. Laing, a neighboring proprietor; and other portions, such as the vertebræ, &c., being deposited and beautifully preserved in the Royal Museum of the University of Edinburg, and in the Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons. An able paper on these latter fragments, and on the wreck of the animal, was read by the late Dr. Barclay, to the Wernerian Society, and will be found in Vol. 1. of its transactions, to which we refer.—We can allow space for a short abridgement of these documents, which, be it remembered, furnish an account of the animal principally after it had been mutilated; and hence we cannot wonder if the original are both imperfect and contradictory. It measured 56 feet in length, and 12 in circumference. The head was small, not being a foot in length, from the snout to the first vertebræ; the neck was slender, extending to the length of 15 feet. All the accounts agree in assigning it blow-holes, though the differ as to their precise situation. On the shoulders something like a bristly mane commenced, which extended to near the extremity of the tail. It had three pairs of fins or paws connected with the body; the anterior were the largest, measuring more than four feet in length; and their extremities were somewhat like toes, partially webbed. Dr. Fleming, in his notice of this animal, suggests that these members were probably the remains of pectoral, ventral, and caudal fins. The skin was smooth, without scales, and of a grayish color; and the flesh appeared like coarse, ill-colored beef. The eye was of the size of the seal's; the throat was too narrow to admit the hand.—Dr. Hamilton.

The Thames Tunnel.

The Tunnel has now completely reached across the river, a distance of 1200 feet—and the proprietor and engineer had the gratification, a short time since, of being the first who walked from bank to bank to the shaft on the London side. Those shafts on both sides of the river, which are intended for foot passengers, are really grand things. They are a succession of staircases going round a vast circular excavation, between seventy and eighty feet deep, and when they shall be all lighted with gas, will be among the most extraordinary parts of the whole structure. Even now they strongly realize the poetic conception of the descent into the caverns of the Egyptian mysteries; and the view of the interior, nearly a quarter of a mile in extent, lighted with a long succession of melancholy flame, would probably have suggested to a Greek the image of an entrance into Tartarus. But, in our day, the sublime is well exchanged for the practical, and this formidable-looking cavern will be stripped of its poetic associations by the passage of carters and wagons, bales of goods and herds of bullocks. Still it will be almost impossible to divest ourselves of the recollections really attached to this work. We have before us altogether a new attempt to conquer nature—a great experiment to make rivers passable without boat or bridge; a new and capable contrivance for expediting the intercourse of mankind. The stone bridge is at all times the most expensive edifice in the world, and the bridge of boats is always liable to accidents, and almost certain to be broken up in every instance of a flood. Besides this the fixed bridge blocks up the navigation of the river for all vessels beyond the size of a barge or small steamboat. Waterloo bridge cost upwards of a million—London bridge about as much more—Westminister and Blackfriar's bridges, which were built at a cheaper rate and in cheaper times, so constantly demanded repairs that they have probably cost more than either of the modern ones; but the Tunnel has an advantage of giving a passage from side to side of the Thames, where from the breadth of the river a stone bridge would have cost nearer two millions than one, and where no bridge could be thrown across without blocking up the most important part of the Thames, that portion which may be called the great wet dock of London. Yet the expense has not amounted to more than £400,000; and even this is to be remembered, as an expense greatly increased by the utter novelty of the experiment, by difficulties unforeseen in the commencement, by several irruptions of the river, by the dearness of workmen's wages, arising from the peculiar peril and singular nature of the labor, connected with an undertaking carried on at all hours, and wholly by artificial light. All this, too, in constant hazard of an influx of the river, and the various difficulties belonging to working in a mine. The weight of a vast body of water above, acting alike during summer and winter, which at any moment might break in, and against whose incursions, it was necessary to fortify the outside of the Tunnel as the interior, added greatly to the difficulties of the undertaking.

The original object of the Tunnel, was, to convey cattle, passengers and general traffic from the rich countries on the Kent side, to that great mercantile region of the metropolis—the London, and East and West India Docks. How far this will be now effected, is a question which remains to be decided by experience. There can be no doubt that if the traffic be not impeded by the fear of passing under the river, it must be immense. The inconvenience of escaping the long circuit up to London bridge, which, from the various obstructions in the streets, and the general difficulty of passing through the most crowded portion of the city, must now occupy many hours would obviously direct the whole current of the traffic into the tunnel. Hitherto, no expedient has been adopted to shorten the passage of the traffic; and the contrivance by which 1200 clear feet are substituted for at least three miles of the most encumbered thoroughfares imaginable, must be adopted as a matter of palpable advantage. Still there may be difficulties in the way which practice only can exhibit. But any fear of the structure itself we should regard as altogether visionary. The building of the tunnel seems as solid as a rock. During the whole period from its commencement, we have not heard of a single instance of its giving way, vast as the pressure was from above, and trying as were the damps, the ground spring, and the extreme difficulty of building under water. At this moment the roof is obviously as free from damp as the roof of St. Paul's!—and unless an earthquake should burst it, the whole fabric seems much more likely to last than were it exposed to the diversities of temperature, the heats and frosts above ground. The especial advantage of the system of the tunnel is; that it can be adopted in any part of the course of a river, and even in its widest part, (for few European rivers exceed the breadth of the Thames at Rotherhithe, unless where they spread into marshes and lakes,) and yet offer no impediments to the navigation.—Blackwood's Magazine.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS. 'Selections from Eminent Commentators who have believed in punishment after death; wherein they have agreed with Universalists in the interpretation of Scriptures relating to Punishment. By Rev. LUCIUS R. PAIGE. Second Edition, with revisions and additions. 358 pages.—Price $1.

This is a highly valuable work to all Universalists.—It proves by the most respectable orthodox authority, that the interpretations which Universalists have given of the passages of Scripture which relate to punishment, are correct. It is a refutation of endless misery by the testimony of the most learned writers who have believed that doctrine. The threatenings of punishment, occuring in the New Testament, which have been supposed to refer to endless misery, are explained in this work, in the very language of the Partialist Commentators. It is fatal to the doctrine of endless misery.

DODS' SHORT SERMONS. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the new stereotype edition of 'DODS' SHORT SERMONS,' with addition of several important articles. These Sermons have been regarded by the Universalist public with great favor. The first edition was taken up with avidity.—At the request of many friends, the author was induced to revise the work, and add many important essays on deeply interesting subjects; in which the author has thrown much light on subjects that have been regarded as very difficult to be understood. 'Mr. Dods,' says a distinguished correspondent, 'has done much to throw light on the sacred volume. Many of his expositions have struck us with great force. He has given us great light. Difficult subjects are explained clearly by him.'

Price of the work 75 cents. Wholesale dealers will find it to their interest to call at 37 Cornhill.

FOURTH EDITION OF CONFERENCE HYMNS. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'

Price $1,25 per dozen—12 1-2 cents single.

PAIGE'S QUESTIONS. FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'QUESTIONS ON SELECT PORTIONS OF THE GOSPELS; designed for the use of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. By LUCIUS R. PAIGE, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Cambridge.' Price 25 cents single; $2,50 per dozen.

EVERY THREATENING EXPLAINED. Universalists all know the importance of a right understanding of those parts of Scripture, commonly designated by the term THREATENINGS. Although such passages are relied on by many to disprove the doctrine of Universalism, it is well known, that, when understood according to their original intent, they furnish not the slightest evidence against that doctrine, but rather the contrary. All that is necessary to do, to convince men of this, is to persuade them to examine, without prejudice, the arguments which have been advanced on these subjects. There are two works which are particularly designed to throw light on this class of passages.

'THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM, after having given a very brief history of Universalism, —and stated the opinions entertained by Universalists, and the Scriptural arguments adduced by them to support those opinions, takes up and explains the passages which have been used to sustain the doctrine of endless misery.—In the course of the examination of these texts, the following subjects are explained:

Lowest hell.	Worm dieth not.
Perish forever.	Damned.
Day of wrath.	All likewise perish.
Wicked turned into hell.	Rich Man and Lazarus.
Fire and brimstone.	Cannot see God.
Everlasting burnings.	Shall not see life.
Everlasting contempt.	Wrath of God.
Burned, root and branch.	Resurrection of damnation.
Wrath to come.	Die in your sins.
Unquenchable fire.	Pray not for the world.
Hell fire.	Son of perdition.
Strait and narrow way.	What must I do to be saved?
Outer darkness.	Judgment to come.
Day of judgment.	Anathema Maranatha.
Destroy soul and body.	Judgment seat of Christ.
Sin against Holy Ghost.	Everlasting destruction.
End of the world.	After this the judgment.
Furnace of fire.	Fearful judgment.
Lose his own soul.	Better resurrection.
Shall not enter heaven.	God is a consuming fire.
Without wed. garment.	Sin unto death.
Damnation of hell.	Judgment of the great day.
Ten virgins.	Vengeance of eternal fire.
Sheep and Goats.	Second death.
Everlasting punishment.	Lake of fire and brimstone.
Judas.	Smoke ascendeth forever.
Eternal damnation.	Unjust be unjust still.
Fire never quenched.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS, takes up all these subjects from the New Testament, and explains them in the language of the Orthodox Commentators themselves.—That work consists of 'selections' from the most learned of the Orthodox Commentators, which show that they in their wisdom and honesty, in former times, explained the most of these subjects, almost precisely as Universalists now do.

In this view, the 'Plain Guide' and 'Paige's Selections, are companions to each other; they furnish a large amount of valuable criticism on the subjects above named.

LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

BOOK OF PROMISES. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. BULFINCH EMMONS. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

MILLER'S THEORY REFUTED. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted.

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

BALFOUR'S INQUIRIES. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, Boston, 'THREE INQUIRIES—1st. Into the Scriptural Doctrine concerning the Devil and Satan. 2d. The Extent and Duration expressed by the terms Olim, Aion, and Aionios, rendered Everlasting, &c. &c. in the Bible, and especially when applied to punishment. 3d. The New-Testament doctrine concerning the Possession of Devils. By WALTER BALFOUR, of Charlestown. Price $1.

ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM. SECOND EDITION. Just received and for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'The Ancient History of Universalism, from the commencement of the Christian Era to the time of the Reformation.' By HOSEA BALLOU 2d., of Medford. Price $1 per copy. A suitable discount to those who buy to sell again. It is a highly valuable work.

Moral and Religious.

(ORIGINAL.)

Non-Committal.

A religion that was worth the labors, and sufferings, and death of Christ, is worthy of our honest and open profession at all times and in all places without disguise or prevarication. So far, every member of every denomination, is ready to go in theory. But unhappily for the purity and simplicity of Christianity, theory and practice do not always coincide—and are by no means certain to be found united in the same person. Many a non-conformist in theory, perhaps in principle, will be found practically of most unimpeachable conformity to the dominant creed. So that whatever they may be in reality, one thing is certain—they are determined never to be hung or burned for the honor of Christianity, or the rights of conscience. They would as soon worship with the Papist as the Protestant, were the chances of reputation or interest involved—they would serve God by the acknowledgement that Mahomet was his prophet, to preserve their character for religion—and they would perform the mummery of a Pagan ritual, and pay their devotions at the shrine of an Idol, sooner than endanger a single hair of their head.

Unfortunately these men are of a class who do lead—or who aspire to lead, the public mind. They are not content to follow their own bearings alone. And though almost all men cry out against the policy, thousands from sheer indolence or want of moral courage, adopt it as the safest, or the most honorable. The odium is so softened by the sound of plausible terms, that some well-meaning persons mistake policy for charity, indifference for liberal Christianity, and skepticism for rational and unproved philosophy.

Every body has heard, if they are too young to remember—that, about the time when Mr. Jefferson was first elected President of the United States, many clergymen, especially in New England, took it upon themselves to oppose him; and among other devices, to represent that he was an infidel of the French school, and if elected would use his influence for the destruction of the Bible and the suppression of Christianity. Nothing can be more inflammatory, than many discourses which were then put forth from the pulpit—for it were a profanation to call a scurrillous political pamphlet, a sermon—and some of them were to the last degree, libellous. In a few instances these libellers, when particularly eminent or influential, were prosecuted; and among them a certain Parson ———, who ultimately made his peace with the President, quit his Parish, missionated in Canada, went to England, where he remained during the war of 1812, and returned to Canada after its close. Whatever he was before—he was now fully imbued with the spirit of Unitarianism, and became literally 'all things to all men.'

In the Summer of 1816, this man visited a family of Universalists in the State of New York, with whom he had been previously acquainted, and which at the time was boarding a Univeralist preacher. The mere forms of introduction, served to designate the religious preferences and professions of each of the clergymen, who, setting aside the disparities of age and attainments, met on equal terms. The conversation was free—the Missionary spoke of the progress of liberal opinions in Europe and in America—of the sympathies which ought to exist between Unitarians and Universalists; and of the common cause which they ought to make against an overwhelming Orthodoxy.

The coincidence of the leading doctrines of Unitarians and Universalists, was spoken of, and of course among others, that of the reconciliation and endless happiness of all the human race. He admitted his belief in the final restitution; and treated the doctrine of endless misery, as he did most of the other distinguishing doctrines of the popular theology—as only worthy of rejection or contempt. He was surrounded by personal friends and knew that he might speak freely; and without any apparent hesitation, he explained his own course under all circumstances.

Quere. 'Then you do not believe that the Bible teaches the doctrine of endless misery?'

Missionary. 'No: some of our people think that the destruction of the wicked by annihilation is taught—but for myself, I think the Scriptures clearly teach the restitution of all mankind.'

Quere. 'Then you do not suppose that the words rendered eternal, everlasting, forever, can prove endless duration?'

Missionary. No: and no man with any tolerable knowledge of the Greek language can pretend it. He must know that they are equivocal, and that the thing must first be proved to be endless in its nature, before they can so much as imply endless duration. But it has never been proved that misery is necessarily endless..

Quere. 'How then do you dispose of this matter, when you have occasion to use these terms in connexion with punishment? Your hearers attach a meaning to them which you know to be wrong—do you set them right?'

Missionary. 'That is no concern of mine. I use the terms as I find them, and leave others to understand them as they please.'

This admission is characteristic of the accommodating policy of a whole people. The fierce exclusiveness of Calvin, is not more strongly impressed upon the generations of his followers, than this easy, temporizing manner upon the Unitarian ministry. On the subject of punishment, they seem unwilling to form or express an opinion whether it is temporary or endless. A system, strictly non-committal, has been usually pursued in this matter; the purpose of which can only be guessed at, from the palpable efforts ever in progress to conciliate all parties and amalgamate them under one general denomination of liberal Christians. As if there was no liberality of sentiment—no Christian charity—no rational Christians in all the world, save among the handful of would-be philosophical Unitarians!

We honor the names of their honorable men—the world honors them, not because they were Unitarians; but for the same reason that Oberlin, Fenelon and others are honored—because they honor human nature.—But it is supremely ridiculous to put on airs, and talk of Unitarian liberality, while in the United States, they are as a sect practically intolerant as the Presbyterians. It would be amusing to hear the latter lauding the catholicism, and boasting of the negation of their faith. But they manfully avow the worst features of an exclusive creed—while Unitarians want moral courage to own their belief in the salvation which is alone worthy of God, or the grateful acceptance of mankind. The Common Brotherhood.

Reader, hast thou ever thought of the human brotherhood? Did it ever occur to thee that we are all children of one Parent, subject to like earthly afflictions, destined to one common lot in the grave, and heirs to one glorious inheritance in eternity? Thou hast said it perchance with thy lips, thou hast given it the sanction of thy head, but had thy heart any thing to do with the matter? Hath it ever come home to thee as a reality—home to thy soul—to thine actions? Hath it been a living flame in thy bosom whence kindly warmth hath flowed to those who were perishing by the wayside, perishing of cold, of hunger, and of sickness? Perhaps thou hast heard that 'prosperity hardeneth the heart,' and if thy way hath not been among luxuries, nor thy couch one of ease, thou thinkest thyself safe from the charge of forgetting or neglecting thy brother. But hath it never occurred to thee that adversity indurateth the soul, perhaps even more than prosperity, and that thou mayst be as much wrapped up in selfishness in the one case, as in the other? Ay, and perhaps more so; for happiness is social in its nature, and loveth to reproduce itself; to throw its reflection on all around, and then to bask in the light it hath created. But sorrow retireth within itself, and seeketh to draw around itself its own shadow, and little heedeth the outward world. Intensity of feeling, either of grief or joy, is selfish; but when the strength of emotion is over, the fruits of the sterner lesson are the holier, more widely diffused, and of more beneficial character.—Thus hath the poet sung—

'Sweet are the uses of adversity.'

Reader, perchance thou art asking within thyself the cause of these reflections. Be patient awhile, and listen to a tale of truth, that may throw some light upon it. It is truth, though it is related only to illustrate what hath been remarked above—and to show the means also which under Providence are sometimes permitted to dissipate the moral lethargy.

There was an individual under the pressure of severe, and, as she thought, peculiar affliction, and there seemed at that time, no light for her save what flowed from duties performed. So engrossed was she with her own feelings, she had little sympathy for suffering not in daily sight; little appreciation of the bond of human brotherhood. In the performance of the duties immediately around her, was measured all that she thought belonged to her of duty, and that faithfully discharged, her conscience was at peace. But the friend, whose painful state was the subject of her cares, was taken suddenly ill, and it seemed ill unto death. It was the day of worship; and of a whole household, there happened to be none left who could find a physician; nor also in the houses adjoining. There was no time to be lost, and this individual, having faith in the heart of humanity, ran into the street to ask that kindness of the first person she might see. A young man had just passed the house. He was accosted, briefly told the circumstances, and requested to call the family physician from a Church at some little distance. The speedy arrival of the physician told that the messenger faithfully and rapidly performed his errand of holy charity, and the appeal to his better feelings had met a quick response. Wherever his lot may be, the blessing of one heart will be around his way. Though performing but a common duty, it was done in a faithful spirit, and though his face may be through life a stranger to that individual, her prayers are ever with him.

That illness was not fatal—the angel of the grave came not then.

There was in the neighborhood, a sweet, fading flower, whom that individual had been requested to visit, but wrapped up in her own griefs, she had not done so. When she, who had so many friends, was thus thrown on the benevolence of a stranger for assistance, there came a voice to her soul, telling her that her duties had not all been done, that she had forgotten the human brotherhood, and thus was the reproof and the lesson given. Thus was she reminded of the great chain of humanity and of the sympathies and kindnesses man oweth to his fellow-man; nor was it in vain. She visited often, that sweet, fading flower, until its last, wan petals dropped upon the bier; and if she was the means of cheering some of the long hours of sickness, the blessing was given back in strength to her own heart. And she still thinketh the lesson will never be forgotten.

Reader, thou canst never do good to thy fellow-man without doing thyself a good also. Such is the all-wise and beneficent law of Him who hath linked in an indissoluble chain the great human family. The precepts of the Divine Teacher must be followed, and they will bring their own reward. If thou hast not faith, make the trial, and faith will come of itself. If thy neighbor wrong thee, or wound thee, not only, do not return it, but if thou seest him in danger of destruction, seek to draw him thence. What if thy motives, or thy actions, are mistaken? It is not thy affair. Thy motives and actions are between thyself, thy conscience, and thy God. Man hath nothing to do with them, and from God, and thine own soul will assuredly come the recompense. Do not good with the expectation that human gratitude and approbation will be the reward. Such is often the perversity of the heart, thou mayest find neither, yet in the depths of thy soul will be voices that sing of peace, and thy feet shall stand as on the Rock of Ages.

Our daily paths are full of the objects of our sympathies and good works. It is not by the giving of alms, or visiting the afflicted, that those sympathies may always be shown and applied. A word spoken in season may strengthen a failing duty, and looks of compassionate interest have been proved to be courage and comfort, to the struggling and the tried, even when gleaming on a stranger-face. We need not go out of the way where Providence hath assigned our daily walk, in order to do all that is required of us. Our Heavenly Father hath not ordained we shall seek our duties with toil and care. They are ever around us, pleading that we sin not against our own souls by denying their supplications. L. J. B. C.

Trust in God.

In youth's bright morn, when joy puts forth,
Ten thousand buds of promise fair,
Trust not those plants which spring from earth,
But let it be thy greatest care
To trust in God.

Or should thy sun of life ascend,
Upward to its meridian height;
And thou with care and toil contend,
Still let it be thy chief delight
To trust in God.

When both these stages thou hast passed,
And trembling age comes creeping on,
Though of life's seasons 'tis the last,
Yet fear not that thy joys are gone,
But trust in God.

This is a lesson all should learn,
'Tis needful when the streams of joy
Transbcend flow—and hope seems firm,
And drinks its fill—yet fills to cloy,
To trust in God.

And when upon thine earth-born joys,
Shall beat the darkling waves of woe;
And every dear delight destroy,
Still let not grief thy soul overflow,
But trust in God.

In joy or sorrow—life or death,
In darkest night—or brightest day,
Or when thou yieldest up thy breath,
Oh! then may it be thine to say,
I trust in God.

Millerism in South-Reading.

Br. Whittemore.—I desire to occupy a small space in your columns, with a recital of some of the Miller operations in this peaceful town. I shall give but a comparatively brief outline of the proceedings of his friends and abettors here, as any thing more would be neither interesting nor useful.

Such scenes as have been here enacted, under the auspices of Millerism, and through the supervision of one Martin, formerly of the medical profession, in which he says (but report says differently,) he had attained to a high degree of celebrity and success,—such scenes, we say, are revolting both to reason and humanity. Such was their character and tendency, that, while the people raved and mourned within, as desolation and madness filled their souls, Nature, usually in smiles, bowed down her clouds, during the whole drama, and wept.

We attended several of these meetings, with the laudable intention of obtaining what information we could on this subject. The principal theme of discourse was the 'Second Advent.' And while Estenlay to such perversions of Scripture as came from the chief actor in this drama, I was forced, through a sense of duty, to address him at the conclusion of one of his meetings, on the legitimate teachings of those passages which were misrepresented and twisted into his service.—But I soon found that this man, so much distinguished for his erudition and loquacity in the eyes of his peculiar friends, was confined in his greatness to this narrow theme, as defined by his great prototype, in the same field of labor—Miller. So that he retired from the field, before we had time to do anything more than to preface the remarks which we had designed to make; and with this sage and very conclusive argument, that though we might be right in head, were wrong in heart.

We thought, and observed as much at the time, that the expression savored strongly of an ancient pharisaism, by which not only this ancient class of religionists was strikingly characterized, but by which all, on whom their mantle has in more modern times fallen, are distinguished. As this giant in theology, who deemed it a mighty condescension to look down upon such pigmies in the profession as the Stuarts and Bushes; as he found it, at this crisis of our conversation, exceedingly convenient to return to the desk in search of something which he had left there, it offered an excellent opportunity, for some one of his friends to step up and volunteer his services. Consequently, one of the number, more distinguished, as the community know, for lungs than good sense, advanced without reserve or ceremony, and saluted us thus: 'We have aroused the devil—glory to God—Glory to God!' At this, a friend who stood near, observed 'that it would be useless to attempt to reason with such a man,' which feeling no inclination to gainsay, we leisurely retired from the house. At which sight, the lungs of this same meek vociferator seemed to be visited with renewed inspiration, and louder than before he exclaimed, 'Satan is going! Satan is going! Glory to God!'

I had no inclination at the time to pass this ebullition of meekness, candor and charity, to the general account of those, who were carrying on these revival operations, but rather let it pass for what it was considered worth by those that heard it. But a repetition of the same language and spirit by which it was dicta ed, induces us to give it here a public notice. We had supposed, that not another individual could be found to countenance such language, &c. but we were sadly disappointed, as facts fully proved on a following evening, when one, of the Abrahamic faith, felt his spirit stirred up within him to speak out, so great was the excitement and so woful were the effects which it was obviously producing on every hand; and to admonish the people against giving credence to notions so baneful to truth and humanity;—which were breaking up the ties of society and spreading a pall over the face of the whole community. It was then, that this self same Martin, who conducted the meetings, broke out,—'Blessed be God—the devil is aroused,' &c. &c. which we will not now repeat. Now mark. This language twice repeated in the presence of a large number of those of similar faith, was received with the greatest eclat by all. Can it be possible that such men, reflect the least upon what they are everywhere contending for, that they expect to be caught up into the clouds with Christ at his personal appearing, while the devouring element passes over the earth to the entire destruction of all the unregenerate and sinful? Do they think to rise so high as to escape unscathed, when security is wholly rested on the ground of personal goodness and purity? O, we cannot but blush for those who think and declare that they are so much better than other men, without giving the least indication of the fact, in any of those fruits, to which our blessed Saviour pointed us, as the infallible tests of true godliness in the soul. What is one of these to which we are referred? It is 'meekness'. Does this Christian quality breathe forth in such a spirit as we have just noticed? 'Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world.' With our whole soul we respond,—'try the spirits, whether they are of God.' This we have a right to do. And there never was an occasion when there was greater need of using these blessed criterions of the gospel to lead us into all truth. For never was there a time within our recollection, when there was a class of beings more clamorous about their own godliness, and reckless about the character of others, than the present: All that is loathsome and hideous in their ranks, is by use of the philosopher's stone converted into so many bright and commendable embellishments, while the more peaceful and less obtrusive virtues of those who cannot conscientiously embrace their views, are so many frightful indications of the indwelling of the 'king of darkness.' Well, it probably will be so, till the people awake to their senses.—For any attempt to reason with them, under existing impressions and circumstances, would prove utterly abortive. For as you drive them from one point to another till there is no foothold for them in Scripture, you are only destined to be met with the mighty argument, that their experience and special communications from the spirit-land teach them of the truth of this one darling theory—the winding up of the material world in 1843. And here they are ensconced behind an invulnerable bulwark, from which it would be needless to attempt to drive them. For when a class of people become so visionary and fanatical as to suppose that they are the peculiar favorites of heaven, and the objects of particular revelations, then you are of course considered too gross and grovelling, too carnal and sensual, to understand the things of light. 'Your heart is wrong'—'God has not given you spiritual visions, by which to see the truth.'

But to return. To show the utter recklessness of some of the prime movers in this work, we would observe here, that this same public declaimer, who gave a highly respected brother the euphonic appellation of devil, without the least knowledge then of his character, faith, or standing; on meeting him on the following morning, whom he had thus ungraciously appellatized, took him by the hand, and several times saluted him with the name of brother! On what ground he would lay claims to so near a relationship, with one to whom he had just before given so unpropitious a cognomen, we will leave it for those more familiar with the secrets of this new fangled notion, to describe.

We had intended to give a more extended detail of those disgusting manœuvrings which we witnessed, and which were reported to us, as they took place at these meetings; but it makes the heart sick to contemplate them; and furthermore, we suppose they are but the common paraphernalia, which attend these meetings wherever conducted in our land, therefore, we desist from this purpose, and will close by offering one more thought with the incidents which originated it. It is this,—that the Universalist method of scriptural interpretation, is the only sure and successful ground on which the doctrine of Miller can be met and refuted. The objections urged on any other ground will not serve as the least impediment to their views.

The doctrine of a temporal millennium they annihilate root and branch; it is but the merest cobweb in their way. They show by the same texts which Universalists generally adduce to prove this point, that there shall be no end to the kingdom of righteousness, which Christ shall finally cause to prevail,—though they attach many gross features to this kingdom.

Again: when it is said by those who believe in the more distant destruction of this material universe, that, 'of that day and hour knoweth no man; no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only,' it is immediately said by them, in the most exulting manner, that, by the same mode of interpretation, by which the objector would prove that no one save the Father shall ever know of that day and hour, they will establish the startling doctrine, that no man shall ever gain heaven. And then point to those very passages, one of which has been so frequently urged against the doctrine of the Restitution by Partialists, varying them however as they literally read: 1st. Addressing the impenitent and obdurate Jews—'Ye shall die in your sins; whither I go, ye cannot come.' 21. Speaking to his disciples, with allusion to the above language—'As I said to the Jews, say I unto you, whither I go ye cannot come.' Now the Orthodox objector is met at the very threshold with an argument, which according to his own standard of rigid interpretation, he cannot rebut, meet, or get round; there he is throttled in his own favorite lair—in a sad dilemma, truly. And he must either give up the argument, with which he has been wont to assail Universalism, with such peculiar zest, or abandon the ground which he has taken against the doctrine of Miller. He can hang on either horn which he may choose; we envy him not his position in either case. The advocates of Millerism seem to chuckle with peculiar delight in view of this perplexity of their brethren. A singular paradox this! It is full of instruction.

Again: It is objected by some of the Partialist faith, that the Millerites are seeking to 'frighten' people into the kingdom of God, by use of the end of the world.

We don't know when we have seen a more cutting and pointed rebuke than came from one Boutwell, whose soul, by the way, is most evidently, too big for his creed:—'The Orthodox often object to our views, because, say they, we frighten men into the kingdom of God, by preaching the end of the world.—We ask, Do not they have a hell which they use for this purpose?'

It seems to us that Millerism is to the Partialist sects a two-edged sword; and they find to their sorrow, whichever way they turn it, it still cut. This should be so; for it is their own true and legitimate offspring.—And they might as well disown their own foster mother as to deny it. It may look somewhat dwarfish and deformed to them at times, as doubtless their faith does, but this is only another feature of the same distorted fancy. Its countenance bears strong marks of semblance to its great original, and its relationship cannot possibly be mistaken.

Would the Christian world, then, settle down in a state of peace and tranquillity,—free from the baneful influence of such fanaticies, let them adopt at once that faith, which they have so long persecuted and derided, but from which, they cannot even distort aught but what would bless and tranquilize the heart of its believers. O may that time be shortly ushered in, when that truth which maketh free indeed, shall universally prevail. God speed the day! Amen.

A Reverie.

Has the Almighty thrust into the realms of space a myriad of suns and planets, and driven them on their course with a velocity which almost defies the powers of human conception—has He contrived with infinite skill a system of checks and balances which shall forever guide these ponderous globes with such frightful velocities safely and harmoniously in their orbits—has he peopled this multitude of moving masses of matter with a countless host of living beings, and does he constantly watch them with such care that even the smallest cannot escape his notice—has He brought into being an image even of himself, and crowned him with glory and honor; and endowed him with the power of reasoning even with his Creator—has He made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth—has He implanted in man a sympathy for the woes which afflict humanity, and even a regard for the pain which the brutes suffer—has He impartially meted out to each the means of enjoyment great as its nature or its state can bear'—and when His intelligent creation shall have served the purpose of their earthly existence and been gathered to the tomb, will he restore new life in a resurrection, and inexorably doom a part of the creatures of his power to a state of suffering interminable—then can the unchangeable Author of impartial love change his purpose and withhold his blessings from a portion of the race of man—then can the Author of infinite love act as infinite in devolence alone can dictate — then can the Author of harmony sublime be the Author too of discord inexplicable—then can the Author of love and sympathy become destitute of attributes which He has implanted in his offspring—then can He forever tolerate a stain upon his character which else were infinite perfection! o.

Affairs in Epping.

Mr. Editor,—An article in the last 'Trumpet,' states that the Orthodox are making a serious effort to regain their power in the town of Epping, N. H. I think the writer may well call it a serious effort, from the prospect they have of success. By a singular amalgamation of Orthodox, Baptists, Unitarians, two or three nominal Universalists, and some that believe nothing, they have succeeded in getting up a house. I understand there is a proposition to have them all join the Church now, and convert them afterwards, as their minister said (in a discourse upon the subject,) that he did not know who were regenerated in the Church! and that they might have some doubts themselves, when in fact they were true disciples, so all should join the Church to make sure. In regard to the Trinity question, it did not originate with the Orthodox or Methodist, they being violently opposed to its being introduced into the Lyceum, the Trinity side was not supported by any man from Epping. The Rev. Mr. Chapman was invited to attend but declined. They say it borders on blasphemy to discuss it; it being incomprehensible to mortal man, but we must adore where we cannot comprehend. Yours, truly, D. S. P.

Mechanism of the human foot.

There is nothing more beautiful than the structure of the human foot, nor perhaps any demonstration which would lead a well educated person to desire more of anatomy than of the foot. The foot has in its structure all the fine appliances that you see in a building. In the first place, there is an arch in whatever way you regard the foot; looking down upon it, we perceive several bones coming round from the astragalos, and forming an entire circle of surfaces in the contact. If we look at the profile of the foot an arch is still manifest, of which the posterior part is formed by the heel, and the anterior by the ball of the great toe; and in front we find in that direction a transverse arch: so that instead of standing as might be imagined, upon a solid bone, we stand upon an arch composed of a series of bones, which are united by the curious provisions for the elasticity of the foot; hence, when we jump, from a height upon the heel, a severe shock is felt; not so if we alight on the ball of the toe, for there an elasticity is found in the whole foot, and the weight of the body is thrown upon this arch, and the shock avoided.—Sir C. Bell.

A living faith is said to be the best divinity; a holy life the best philosophy; a tender conscience the best law; honesty the best policy; and temperance the best physic.

Stilling, Tholuck and the Universalists.

Prof. Stowe, the 'Herder' of the Cincinnati, Ohio, 'Watchman of the Valley' is out again in relation to German Universalists. He appears now over his own proper initial in the columns of that Presbyterian journal, of which he is an editor. 'The Universalists, I am informed,' says he, 'claim Stilling as a Universalist.' Well the Professor is not misinformed on this point; but what has he to object to this claim? Was not Stilling a Universalist? The Professor confesses, though with evident reluctance, that he was, but he seeks to qualify the fact somewhat. 'Stilling like some other good men of that dark period,' says he, 'when the light of true Christianity had almost ceased to shine, allowed his mind to be so far biassed by the corruptions of the age as to cherish the idea that at some indefinite period in the future state after ages on ages of punishment and purification as by fire, the souls of the wicked may at length be regenerated and received to heaven.'

It is possible, then, for 'good men' to favor Universalism! Let that concession be remembered. 'But it is not for his theology,' says the Professor, 'that Stilling is to be commended, but for his benevolent and devotional spirit.' Then there has been at least one benevolent and devotional Universalist? Yes, for 'with all his intellectual vagaries,' says our learned Professor, 'Stilling was, in a most eminent degree, a pious, benevolent, devotional man; and in this point of view he is to be commended.' Of course a belief in Universalism is not necessarily destructive to piety, benevolence or devotion; nay, they have at least in one instance existed 'in the most eminent degree' with a faith in the salvation of all men.

Professor Tholuck has spoken of Stilling's Universalism and Theology in a different manner. In a letter now in our possession, Prof. Tholuck speaking of Universalism in Germany, says:

'It came particularly into notice through Jung Stilling, that eminent man, who was a particular instrument in the hand of God for keeping up evangelical truth, in the latter part of the former century, and at the same time a strong patron of that doctrine.'

We cannot well see how Stilling could be 'a particular instrument in the hand of God for keeping up evangelical truth' in Germany, without at the same time meriting some commendation for his theology; but let that pass. Prof. Stowe would have us think that Stilling only indulged the idea of a universal salvation, but Prof. Tholuck says he was a strong patron of it. Whom shall we believe? Perhaps we may gain some light from Stilling's works, and fortunately the Universalist Historical Society has in its library the latest and best edition of them.

In Vol. iii. p. 35, Note (Scenes from the Realm of spirits,) referring to Isa. liii. 10, 'The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hands.' Stilling says,

'The pleasure of the Lord is the salvation and happiness of all men; this object shall through the ages of eternity be gradually attained, for the Messiah through the offering of his great sacrifice hath obtained the blessing that he shall live forever and shall through eternity enjoy the fruit of what he sowed in tears, because his offering will never cease, to save unhappy men, so long as there are any.'

So ibid. p. 39, he says:

'But what means still be hidden in the depths of the divine wisdom and love, for the purpose of ultimately saving the millions of wretched spirits, (for they will certainly be saved,) the great future will develope, and will be to us all a rich source of inconceivable happiness.'

And in a note upon this remark he asks;

'Shall evil be as eternal as God?—God forbid! everlasting love will finally conquer all, and then will God be all in all. He who is made more carnally secure by this principle, is not fit for the kingdom of God.'

So again on p. 73 of the same work, having called Jesus 'the extirpator of sin,' he adds in a note.

'This Saviour, who is now regent of the world, eradicates all sins by this, that he knows how to overrule every sin of every man, so that in the end clearly benevolent consequences shall flow from it, consequences that shall tend to the glory of God and to the happiness of man.'

From these passages it will, perhaps, appear that Stilling indulged rather stoutly the idea of the final salvation of all men. But our learned Professor is not willing to let Stilling off so easily. He tells us, therefore, that 'he believed most devoutly in all manner of ghosts and apparitions, and wrote large volumes to show that they often appeared, and showed why they appeared; and published a labored work entitled Theorie der Geisterkunde, which literally translated, is Theory of Ghost Science.' But suppose we grant all this in just the sense in which our author wishes it to be taken; will it thence follow that Stilling's theology was despicable or that his judgment was weak and childish? If our Professor thinks thus, we pray him to remember how many of the great lights of orthodoxy have shown themselves as devout believers in 'all manner of ghosts and apparitions' as Stilling ever was, and who had neither his piety, benevolence, nor devotion, to recommend them. The truth is, our learned author is not just. He condemns 'intellectual vagaries,' in a Universalist which have been all but universal among his own party. It is nothing with him, for a sound believer in endless misery to believe at the same time in ghosts and apparitions, but it condemns forever any one who holds Universalism.

In conclusion we would inform Prof. Stowe that the Universalists are by no means satisfied with claiming Stilling as a pattern of their doctrine. We can furnish him, if he desires, with other names, but he cannot be ignorant that the doctrine of Universalism is not so heretical in Germany as in our own country. What says he of Rheinhard, of Schelliermacher, and DeWette? What does he think of Olshausen's orthodoxy on the eternity of punishment? nay what thinks he of Dr. Rnapp? But enough for the present. Of Tholuck we shall have a word to say before long, nor shall Prof. Stowe's quotation from Rev. M. H. Smith, be entirely overlooked.

Second Coming of Christ.

This is a subject which now greatly agitates the public mind. The abettors of the Miller mania insist that the Second Coming of Christ has not yet taken place, but that it will take place in the course of the present year. There is no error so great, that it will not find advocates. People at a distance can with difficulty estimate, the amount of excitement there is upon this subject, in this vicinity; and it must be true, although doubtless the leaders know better, that many believe the absurd theory.

It is worthy of remark, that the Partialists seem generally to agree that the Coming of Christ is yet future. They all seem to be in the same condemnation here. If they had read their Bibles with honesty of intention, they would have learned that the Second Coming of Christ took place long ago. But they have not learned, and, what is worse, they will not learn, or at any rate will not acknowledge the truth on this point. The truth is they want some leading point for excitement. They are never easy without excitement. Many make use of the Miller theory, who confessedly have no faith in it, to create excitement; and if they disavow that theory, it is with the express reservation, that the Second Coming of Christ is near, and for aught they know even at the doors. The following paragraph, from the 'Christian Watchman' of this city, is a specimen of the manner adopted by those who wish to avoid the responsibility of the Miller theory; but still desire to keep up an excitement in regard to the Second Coming of Christ.

The second advent of the Son of God is explicitly stated in the Scriptures, and it is a doctrine which all the pious embrace with a steadfast hope; his appearing in the majesty of his divine nature, attended with the holy angels, as the final Judge of all, is an event upon which they love to dwell. This doctrine as generally held by evangelical christians, may be summarily stated, as follows: Christ will make his appearance in the glory of his Father, attended by all the holy angels; the dead will be immediately raised and assembled at the judgment seat; the earth will be burned up; the righteous and the wicked, having each received their final sentence, will pass, the one into the presence of God, to enjoy forever the smiles of his love, and the other, unforgiven, into an eternal banishment from him. The precise time when this momentous event will occur, though it is generally believed to be at no very distant day, has not been, as is generally held, explicitly revealed. It is believed to have been left, much as has been the close of life in reference to each individual; the event is certain, but the precise time of its occurrence is unrevealed. Individuals have arisen, however, at different periods, professing to have ascertained the precise time of this event, and many seasons have been fixed upon, some of which have already passed. At the present moment many minds are much excited in the expectation of realizing the fulfilment of this predicted event, as fixed by Mr. Miller in the early part of the present year. We are not satisfied ourselves that this event is thus near, and yet, according to the generally received opinion, it may occur thus early.

Thus it will be seen, the editor of the 'Watchman' desires to avoid the responsibility of the Miller theory; but still he labors to keep up the excitement by asserting that the Second Coming of Christ is yet future, and perhaps very near.

We desire to repeat in this place what we have often said before, (and we do it with the most solemn assurance of its truth,) viz. that the Second Coming of Christ is not future, but is passed. There is no truth more clearly proved by the Scriptures than this; and it is a matter of astonishment that the partialist clergy do not see it; and a still greater matter of astonishment, if they see it, that they continue to contradict it. In the one case, what are we to think of their discernment? In the other, what are we to think of their honesty?

Let us see what Jesus said in regard to the Second Coming, for his word ought to be considered sufficient to settle the question. In the first place, see Matt. xvi. 27, 28. 'For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' Now notice particularly that the Saviour says, 'There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' To 'taste of death,' is a Hebraism, signifying to die; and hence the meaning of this passage is, there be some standing here which shall not die, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom. Here it is evident, beyond possibility of mistake, that the coming of the Son was to take place during the natural lives of some of those who stood near him at the time he uttered these words.

Whenever the evangelists give an account of this conversation of our Lord with his disciples, as to the subject under consideration, they give it precisely in the same manner. See Mark viii. 38; ix. 1,—'Whosoever, therefore, shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels. And he said unto them, Verily, I say unto you, that there be some of them standing here which shall not taste of death till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power.' See also Luke ix. 26, 27,—'For whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels. But I tell you of a truth, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God.' Here, in each instance, the evangelists have recorded the explicit assurance of Jesus, that his coming to judge and recompense men according to their works, would take place while some of those people lived who stood near him when he spake. What can be more plain than this subject?

On other occasions, Jesus embraced opportunities to impress upon the minds of his disciples the same fact with respect to the coming of the Son of man. And in one particular instance, he pointed out John, his beloved disciple, as a person who should live until his coming took place. The account of this is recorded in John xxi. 21, 22, 23. 'Peter seeing him, saith to Jesus, Lord, and what shall this man do? Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me. Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die: yet Jesus said not unto him, he shall not die; but If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee.' Agreeably to this account, John lived until after the destruction of Jerusalem. Again, in Matt. x. 23, we have the following words: 'But when they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I say unto you, ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of man be come.' Here is an unconditional assurance from the lips of the Saviour, that, pursued by their angry persecutors, the disciples would not traverse all the cities of Israel, before the coming of the Son of man took place. Now, why ought the Second Coming of Christ to be considered an event yet future? Is not the fulfilment confined by the words of the Great Teacher, to time long ago passed by?

We have never seen an article written by mortal man, which conveyed a greater amount of information in the same space, than the following extracts from the works of the illustrious Lightfoot. We seriously believe it is our duty to republish these extracts as often as once a year, and in fact it ought to be done once a month, until the Miller mania ceases. Dr. Lightfoot was one of the most learned men in Biblical knowledge, especially in things appertaining to Jewish economy, that ever lived. It is true he believed in the doctrine of a future judgment and endless misery; but burdened and hampered as he was by that theory, still he had a mind to see and a heart to acknowledge, that the texts which are relied on to prove that the Second Coming of Christ is yet future, do by no means sustain such a position. Let it be remembered, that Dr. Lightfoot was not a Universalist, but a believer in endless misery. He was one of the Westminster Assembly of divines—the body which framed the Westminster Assembly's Catechism, so well known in this country. He was a man of untiring industry, deeply learned, a giant in theology, whose head seemed to be a fountain of Jewish literature. Let the reader remember these facts, and then let him ponder, and study with great care, the sentiments of the following extracts.—Thus he will see (for he cannot fail to see) that the language now applied to the future coming of Christ, and a supposed destruction of the material earth, had its fulfilment long, long ago, and has no reference to future time whatsoever.—Read carefully; study critically.

'Our Saviour saith, Matt. xvi. 28. 'There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.'—which must not be understood of his coming to the last judgment; for there was not one standing there, that could live till that time:—nor ought it to be understood of the resurrection, as some would have it; for probably not only some, but, in a manner, all that stood there, lived till that time. His coming, therefore, in this place, must be understood of his coming to take vengeance against those enemies of his, which would not have him to rule over them, as Luke xix. 12, 27.

'Perhaps it will not repent him that reads the Holy Scriptures, to observe these few things:

'1. That the destruction of Jerusalem and the whole Jewish state, is described, as if the whole frame of this world were to be dissolved. Nor is it strange, when God destroyed his habitation and city, places once so dear to him, with so direful and sad an overthrow; his own people, whom he accounted of as much or more, than the whole world beside,—by so dreadful and amazing plagues, (Matt. xxiv. 29, 30) 'The sun shall be darkened, &c. Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man,' &c.; which yet are said to fall out, within that generation, (ver. 34.—2 Pet. iii. 10) 'The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat,' &c. Compare with this Deut. xxxii. 22; Heb. xii. 26; and observe, that, by elements, are understood the Mosaic elements, (Gal. iv. 9; Col. ii. 20;) and you will not doubt, that St. Peter speaks only of the conflagration of Jerusalem, the destruction of the nation, and the abolishing the dispensation of Moses.

'Rev. vi, 12, 13: 'The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, &c. and the heavens departed as a scroll, when it is rolled together,' &c.—Where, if we take notice of the following plagues, by which, according to the most frequent threatenings, he destroyed that people, viz. the sword, (ver. 4,)—famine, (ver. 5, 6,)—and the plague, (ver. 8,)—without comparing those words, 'They say to the mountains, fall on us and cover us,' with Luke xxiii. 30;—it will sufficiently appear, that, by those phrases, is understood the dreadful judgment and overthrow of that nation and city. With these also agrees that of Jer. iv. from ver. 22 to 28, and clearly enough explains this phrase. To this appertain those and other such expressions, as we meet with; (1 Cor. x. 11.)—'On us the ends of the world are come';—and (1 Pet. iv. 7.) 'The end of all things is at hand.'

'2. With reference to this, and under this notion, the times, immediately preceding this ruin, are called the 'last days,' and the 'last times,' that is, the last times of the Jewish city, nation, economy. This manner of speaking frequently occurs; which let our John himself interpret, (1 John ii. 18;) 'There are many antichrists, whereby we know it is the last time;' and that this nation is upon the very verge of destruction, when as it hath already arrived at the utmost pitch of infidelity, apostacy, and wickedness.

'3. With the same reference it is, that the times and state of things immediately following the destruction of Jerusalem, are called, a 'new creation,' 'new heavens,' and a 'new earth,'—(Isa. lxv. 18;) 'Behold, I create a new heaven and a new earth.' When should that be? Read the whole chapter; and you will find the Jews rejected and cut off; and from that time is that new creation of the evangelical world among the Gentiles.

'Compare 2 Cor. v. 17; and Rev. xxi. 1, 2; where, the old Jerusalem being cut off and destroyed, a new one succeeds; and new heavens and a new earth are created.

'2 Pet. iii. 13: 'We, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth:'—the heavens and the earth of the Jewish church and commonwealth must be all on fire, and the Mosaic elements burnt up: but we, according to the promise made to us by Isaiah the prophet, when all these are consumed, look for the new creation of the evangelical state.

'4. The day, the time, and the manner, of the execution of this vengeance upon this people, are called, 'the day of the Lord,' 'the day of Christ,' 'his coming in the clouds, in his glory, in his kingdom.' Nor is this without reason; for from hence does this form and mode of speaking take its rise:—

'Christ had not as yet appeared but in a state of humility: contemned, blasphemed, and at length murdered, by the Jews: his gospel rejected, laughed at, and trampled under foot: his followers pursued with extreme hatred, persecution, and death itself. At length, therefore, he displays himself in his glory, his kingdom, and power; and calls for those cruel enemies of his, that they may be slain before him.

'Acts ii. 20: 'Before that great and notable day of the Lord come.' Let us take notice, how St. Peter applies that prophecy of Joel to those very times; and it will be clear enough, without any commentary, what that 'day of the Lord' is.

'2 Thess. ii. 2: 'As if the day of Christ was at hand,' &c. To this, also, do those passages belong, (Heb. x. 37,) 'Yet a little while,—and he that shall come, will come:'—(James v. 9:) 'Behold, the Judge is at the door:'—(Rev. i. 7; 'He that cometh in the clouds:'—and (xxii. 12;) 'Behold I come quickly.' With many other passages of that nature, all which must be understood of Christ's coming in judgment and vengeance against that wicked nation; and in this very sense, must the words, now before us, be taken, and no otherwise, 'I will, that he tarry till I come:'—'For thy part, Peter, thou shalt suffer death by thy countrymen, the Jews; but as for him, I will that he shall tarry till I come and avenge myself upon this generation; and if I will so, what is that to thee?' The story that is told of both these apostles, confirms this exposition; for it is taken for granted by all, that St. Peter had his crown of martyrdom, before Jerusalem fell; and St. John survived the ruins of it.'—Works xii. 433—436. Again, the same writer says, 'In such a sense are such phrases as these to be understood; 'upon whom the ends of the world are come,' (1 Cor. x. 11.) Not the very last times of the world; for the world hath lasted sixteen hundred years since Paul spake that; and how long yet it may last who knoweth? but the end of that old world of the Jewish state, which then hasted on very fast. In the same sense are the words of our apostle, [this extract is from a sermon on 2 Pet. iii. 13,] in his First Epis. chap. iv. 7, 'The end of all things is at hand;' not the end of the world, but of that city, nation and economy: the like is that (Jas. v. 9), 'Behold the Judge standeth before the door,' and divers other of the like nature. . . . . The state of the church and gospel after that dissolution of that old world, is called, sometimes, 'the world to come,' (Heb. ii. 5;) sometimes 'new heaven and new earth,' as in the text (2 Pet. iii. 13;) sometimes 'all things new,'—as 'old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new,' (2 Cor. v. 17.) So that, by this time, you see plainly the meaning of our apostle in this place. In the verses before, he speaks of the dissolution of the Jewish church and state in such terms as the scripture useth to express it by, as if it were the dissolution of the whole world; and, in the words of the text, of the new face and state of the church and the world, upon the dissolution, when a new people and a new economy took place.' Works, vi. 293. See, also, iii. 184, 314, 315, 320, 327; and xi. 303, 304, 404, in which last place he states that the phrase 'day of judgment' is applied to the destruction of Jerusalem.'

Ordination of Brs. Breare and Stevens.

On Friday evening, of last week, the ordination of Br. Robinson Breare, of Halifax, N. S. and Br. H. P. Stevens, of Provincetown, Mass., took place in the First Universalist Church in this city. The causes of the ordination, as laid before the ordaining council, were as follows: Br. Breare is located in a far distant province, where there is not, so far as we know, a single preacher of the universal reconciliation except himself. Judging, as he did, that he ought to be reordained, or rather, ordained to a different ministry from that into which he had been formerly inducted, he saw none so favorable an opportunity for the service, as during his visit to Boston. Br. Stevens is settled at Provincetown, the farthest town on Cape Cod; and the pressing wants of the Society there, required his immediate ordination. Being in the city, and learning that an ordaining service was to be performed, he took the advice of his brethren, appeared before the council, stated his case, and the council voted to accede to his wishes.

The services, as we have said, were performed in the First Universalist Church, almost upon the very spot on which Murray and very many of the Fathers have stood, to proclaim the words of eternal life. Although it was a secular evening, still the house was very full. All the pews were taken up, and some persons occupied seats in the aisles, and others were obliged to stand. We judged there were about 1200 persons present.—All seemed to listen with the most devout attention, while the services were performed in the following order:

1. Anthem, from the Choir.
2. Reading Select Portions of Scripture, Br. J. Prince, of Essex.
3. Introductory Prayer, Br. T. J. Greenwood, Marlboro'.
4. Hymn.
5. Sermon, Br. S. Streeter, of Boston, from 1 Cor. ii. 4, 5. 'And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit, and of power: That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.'
6. Consecrating Prayer, Br. T. Whittemore, of Cambridgeport.
7. Delivery of the Scriptures and Charge, Br. H. Ballou, of Boston.
8. Right Hand of Fellowship, Br. O. A. Skinner of Boston.
9. Concluding Prayer, Br. A. P. Cleverly, of Chelsea.
10. Anthem, 'Go ye into all the world,' &c.
11. Benediction.

These two brethren who were thus consecrated to the work of the ministry, will bear away with them from Boston the best wishes, and the most ardent prayers of the brethren here. Br. Breare is about to return to Halifax, the place where he was brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. There are a few believers in the great salvation there. In these few he will find friends, brethren, ardent coadjutors; but all around him the world is cold and distant and forbidding.—He has resolved to devote himself wholly to the work of the ministry, to consecrate all his mental and moral powers to that great work. May the Lord bless him, and go with him, and make his path plain, and crown his labors with success, and give him many souls as the seals of his ministry. May the truth mightily prevail in Nova-Scotia. May a new era begin there; may the day for Zion's glory there arise. O may the pure doctrine of divine grace, in all its loveliness and power, so captivate the hearts of the people, that many souls may be found, who shall espouse the great truth of the world's redemption.

Capital Punishment.

Gov. Morton's Speech—recommendation of the abolition of the punishment of death.

The abolition of Capital Punishment is a subject which has most deeply affected the hearts of philanthropic citizens in every part of the Commonwealth. More generally than at any former period, does this subject now agitate the public mind. The sentiments of Gov. Morton touching this matter, may be found in the following extract from his late Speech to the Legislature:

'Upon the subject of Capital Punishments, and of Incorporations for the transaction of private business, I ask your attention to the views heretofore presented by me. My conviction of their soundness and justness has been confirmed by reflection and observation.

The history of criminal jurisprudence shows that the mitigation of punishment does not increase crime. On the contrary, crimes are found to be most numerous where penalties are most severe. All unnecessary severity is vengeance rather than punishment. Not only benevolence and humanity, but justice and expediency, enforce the argument in favor of lenity. I therefore renew my former recommendation, that the punishment of death be abolished in all cases, unless the Legislature should deem it more wise to commence the experiment with the exception of aggravated murder. I am also of opinion that a general melioration of the criminal code would better comport with the present spirit of penal legislation, and tend to diminish, rather than increase, the commission of offences.

Rev. O. A. Brownson and Rev. J. F. Clarke, Unitarian clergymen of this city, are the principal writers in the new Unitarian paper published in this city, entitled the 'Christian World.' They will probably give to the paper its distinctive character.

Worshippers of Elder Knapp.

One of the few good things which in a course of years have proceeded from the pen of Rev. P. R. Russell, will be found below. Mr. Russell is a great enemy of Universalists, as much so as Saul of Tarsus was of the Christian Church.—But we forgive him, on the old ground, that he knows not what he is doing. When he says a good thing, we are pleased to copy; because, whatever he may think of us, we are no enemy to him. We are pleased with the general tenor of the following remarks; and we think Elder Knapp and the Baptists, are worthy of the rebuke which is administered.

'When the Elder left Salem, a vast crowd is said to have followed him to the cars, and four hundred persons accompanied him, as a kind of escort to Boston. I was grieved to hear of this. It looks too much like the man-worship of party politics; too much like empty and foolish parade. Such homage should not be offered to mortals, and if offered should be peremptorily declined.—Elder Knapp should have declined the escort of four hundred, and saved his own character and the cause of God from reproach. There is but one step, it is said, from the sublime to the ridiculous. Satan is always busy with useful ministers of the gospel, and not unfrequently turns their usefulness and popularity into a means of their own destruction. When the devil can encircle a preacher of the gospel with a crowd of fawning flatterers to pamper his vanity, a great point is gained; and the preacher soon becomes a fallen man.'

We give on our outside to-day, from the 'Universalist Union,' an excellent article from the pen of Rev. T. J. Sawyer, in regard to that eminent German Universalist, Jung Stilling. He was an eminently pious and good man; and the Partialists of this country have been of late praising him greatly for his Christian life. Let it be remembered that he was a Universalist; and this fact will fully prove, that Universalism is consistent with a life of ardent piety and devotion.

Elder Knapp's Claims Disputed.

Almost every body in New England has heard, that Elder Knapp, the famous Baptist revivalist, was the originator of the Washingtonian Temperance Reformation in Baltimore. The story originated with the Elder himself. He has boasted almost every where, that he was the cause of the beginning of that great movement. We pronounced this statement one of the Elder's large stories, and cautioned the community not to believe it. We have now the means of convincing all, even the most hard to be convinced, that such a pretension is a mere deception practiced upon the credulous. The leading Washingtonians in Baltimore have made a movement upon the subject, and they fully and explicitly deny that Elder Knapp had any agency in the matter.

Below will be found a letter from the Rev. J. Shrigley, of Baltimore, besides a statement from the original founders of the Washingtonian Society in that city. Those men are not Universalists, but Partialists. Still they know that the story is false; and they feel it their duty to come out before the world, and contradict it.

Unfounded Claims—Washingtonian Movement in Baltimore.

Baltimore, Jan. 11, 1843.

My Dear Friend and Brother:—I was very much surprised to see, by an article in the 'Trumpet' of Dec. 31, that Elder Jacob Knapp has asserted that he was 'the cause of the beginning of the Washingtonian movement in Baltimore.' Now this is truly astonishing! And I am wholly unable to understand for what purpose Mr. K could make such a statement, unless it was a desire to have his name connected with one good movement before he shall have lost the esteem of all virtuous minds. Every person who is conversant with the history of the Temperance movement in the United States, knows very well that Mr. Knapp was not the cause of the grand Washingtonian movement, which originated in this city. He had not the least influence, either 'directly or indirectly,' in the organization of the Society which originated here; and it is folly in him to attempt to set up a claim for the honor of what he has not the least right or title to whatever.

To satisfy myself, and to furnish your readers with indisputable evidence of the falsity of Mr. Knapp's statement, I addressed a note to W. K. Mitchell, Esq., the very worthy President of the Washington Temperance Society in this city, and have received the following communications, which you are desired to lay before your readers, that the original founders of the Society may not be ungenerously robbed of the honor to which they are so justly entitled.

The gentlemen whose names are annexed, are now ranked among our most respected citizens, and the utmost reliance may be placed in their statement. That they may not be suspected of any peculiar religious partiality for kindly giving me the certificate found below, it is but just to say, that neither of the gentlemen is a professed believer in the doctrine which distinguishes us from some other denominations of Christians.

You will allow me to tender my compliments to W. K. Mitchell, Esq., for his prompt reply to my communication, and believe me to be very truly and affectionately your brother,

J. SHRIGLEY.

Baltimore, Jan. 11, 1843.

DEAR SIR:—I have received yours of the 9th inst. and take great pleasure in communicating to you the information you desire, of which the accompanying certificate and book will I hope be conclusive and satisfactory.

I have received several communications on the subject from individuals with whom I had no personal acquaintance, and of whose responsibility I had no knowledge. But the request, coming from a gentleman so well known and so highly esteemed, is one which affords us much pleasure to satisfy.

Very respectfully your ob't servant,

W. K. MITCHELL.

To Rev. J. Shrigley, Baltimore.

CERTIFICATE.

'Baltimore, Jan. 11. 1843.

'We, the undersigned, survivors of the original six founders of the Washington Temperance Society, certify, that Elder Jacob Knapp had no agency in the formation of the Washington Temperance Society, and that its formation cannot with truth or justice be attributed in any manner to his influence or exertions, directly or indirectly. The act was spontaneous among ourselves, without the agency of any known human influence, and we can ascribe it only to the manifestation of the beneficence of the Divine Author of all good.

The origin, history and characteristics of the Society are truly and fully explained in a book published by John Zoy, a member of the Society, and entitled, 'The Foundation, Progress, and Principles of the Washington Temperance Society of Baltimore, and the influence it has had on the Temperance movements in the United States.'

W. K. MITCHELL,
JAMES MACURLEY,
Signed, DAVID ANDERSON,
ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL,
JOHN F. HOFS.

We are happy to learn that Br. Josiah Gilman, late of Tyngsboro', Mass. has accepted an invitation to remove to the town of Atkinson, N. H. and take the charge of the Universalist Society in that town, and others in the vicinity. A further notice of our correspondent's letter in our next.

What we did not say.

The following paragraph is from the pen of Br. Drew, of the 'Gospel Banner':

The rebuke that Br. Bacon administers to the editor of the 'Trumpet' for having lately assailed Dr. Channing's good fame, in saying there was no 'moral greatness' in the man, is deserved.—We are not willing that our Unitarian brethren, or the public in general, should suppose that Universalist editors are disposed to detract from the well merited fame of that great and good man.

'Let the righteous smite me, and it shall be an excellent oil,' saith the good Book: that is, it shall heal and not wound.

But Br. Drew has made a mistake. The editor of the 'Trumpet' has never said 'there was no moral greatness' in Dr. Channing. What we did say was this: ☞'There was no moral greatness in the manner in which he avowed Unitarianism twenty years ago, being driven out by opponents, after long concealment,'—a very different thing, Br. Drew, from what you attribute to us. So, we see, stories never lose any thing by being circulated.

Our declaration concerning Dr. Channing we now affirm to be strictly true, notwithstanding what has been said. We will accord to every man what we regard to be a just meed of praise; but we always wish to judge from facts, and not to say things because others say them. In regard to Dr. Channing we shall speak our own convictions. Nobody else is responsible for them; and nobody else is obliged to believe what we say, except so far as we prove it. At the proper time, we shall substantiate our declaration.

The Convent Question.

The 'Boston Pilot,' the Catholic journal of this city is becoming raving mad upon the Convent question. We have no controversy with that paper. We shall pursue our own course, and be turned neither to the right hand nor the left by what its editor may say. He accuses us of 'falsehood;' he speaks of a 'villianous paragraph in the Mercantile Journal.' The Selectmen of Charlestown at the time the Convent was destroyed are called 'a precious clique of ignorant bigots.' The 'Trumpet' is charged with a 'scandalous departure from justice and decency;' of being 'too supremely ridiculous and contemptible to merit the semblance of an answer;' and at the close of the article the editor is charged with being 'so wanting in moral honesty as to attempt to endorse the outrages of ruffians by the employment of falsehood.'

We cannot esteem it necessary to make the slightest reply to language like this. What a spirit! Why not be more mild and christian-like? We are desirous that Catholics and Protestants should be all equally under the protection of the laws; and that there should be no special legislation either for the benefit of the one or the other. Let the Catholics have all the opportunities for redress of grievances that Protestants have. If a Protestant Meeting-House should be burned down by a mob, would the Legislature pass a special act of remuneration? Dwelling houses have been attacked and destroyed; but the Legislature passed no act of remuneration.—If a man attack me on the highway, and take my purse, the law does not remunerate me. If the midnight incendiary burns my house, the law does not remunerate me. It will lend me the full power of its assistance to detect the offender and bring him to justice; but it will not bear my loss. Would it be any more a duty to remunerate for the destruction of a Convent than a dwelling house? If the principle be a just one, let it be carried out into all cases of suffering by violence; and do not let us favor some and neglect others.

In this country, Catholics and Protestants all stand on the same ground. For ourselves, we are friends to the broadest religious liberty; and we would be glad to see religious liberty enjoyed in Catholic countries as it is among us. We have always condemned the conduct of the mob that destroyed the Convent, as we do that of all mobs. It is capable of no defence. It was base, cowardly, wicked; and we regret that the guilty were not detected and punished. Such are our views.

Installation.

At the recent session of the Essex County Quarterly Conference, Br. M. B. Newell was installed as pastor of the Church and Society in Annisquam, (Gloucester,) Mass. The order of exercises were as follows:

Reading of the Scriptures, by Br. J. Gilman.
Prayer, by Br. G. G. Strickland.
Sermon, by Br. J. H. Willis.
Installing Prayer, by Br. T. P. Abell.
Charge, by Br. J. Gilman.
Hand of Fellowship, by Br. G. G. Strickland.
Address to the Society, by Br. J. Allen.
Benediction, by the Pastor.

May the smiles of the Great Head of the Church rest upon this union; and may both pastor and people ever have occasion to remember with gratitude and joy, the event which bound them together in their present relation.

Not only the above, but the other services were thought interesting and profitable. Indeed it was one of the happiest meetings. But few ministers were present, yet there were a multitude of people. At every service the house was filled, and, sometimes, more than filled. Sermons were preached by Brs. Strickland, Abell, Willis and Gilman; and there were also three or four very edifying free Conference meetings. The weather was exceedingly pleasant, and nothing occurred to mar the general joy of the occasion.—Peace and plenty to the people of rock-bound Annisquam.

Elder Knapp's fame in New-Hampshire.

The independent editor of the 'New Hampshire Courier,' does not hesitate to express his opinion freely, concerning the Baptist revivalist, Elder Knapp, and the effect of his late visit to that State. This editor had been much blamed, because he did not praise and flatter the Elder, while he was carrying on the revival in Concord. The following paragraph is from a late number of the 'Courier':

When we first alluded to Mr. Knapp, while he was with us in this place, we said as little adverse to him as we could with any degree of reference to truth if we spoke of him at all. The unchristian bitterness which many attempted to display because we did not praise a man for whom we did not honestly entertain a very favorable opinion, convinced us fully that the days of man-worshipping had not passed, nor were the Catholics the only denomination of Christians who believed in real Popes and sin-forgiving Priests. We knew, however, the time would come when good sense and sound reason would triumph over the wild spirit of denunciation and sectarian bitterness; and we have evidence every day that the attempt to read whole denominations out of the pale of Christian brotherhood, will be frowned down by a liberal and Christian community.

Is it right to expose them?

The question sometimes arises, is it right to expose the cases of iniquity which occasionally occur in men of high standing in society? The heart is sometimes pained with the fall of some distinguished revivalist, who brings a disgrace on himself and all with whom he is connected.—Then again there are cases like that of Elder Thurston, of Lowell. Is it wise to name these cases? Does it do any good? Does it show a proper spirit?

We reply, that it depends much upon the spirit in which it is done, and the object which is held in view. If the object be to injure the unfortunate individuals who have fallen, it is altogether unjustifiable. There must be some good object in view, there must be some necessity for the publication, or it is not justifiable. If it be merely to gratify a bad public taste, the motive must be condemned.

Let us look at the Bible. Do not the sacred writers expose the wickedness of bad men? Did not Jesus do this, even in regard to persons of high standing in society, and holding high offices in the ecclesiastical establishments of that age? He did; but he did it in a meek and benevolent spirit, and for a good purpose. It is often necessary to put the public on their guard against bad men, that the world may no longer place confidence in them, and be deceived and injured by them. This forms a justifiable reason for exposure; the object which is had in view is benevolent. So, saith the Saviour, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' It is necessary to observe the conduct of the distinguished advocates of any system, that we may know what are the tendencies of the doctrines they defend. We are told that Universalism is an exceedingly bad doctrine. Judge of it by its legitimate tendencies. We are told too, that the prevailing Partialist doctrines are of very good tendency; that they preserve men from evil, and keep them in the true and living way. But all this must not be taken for granted. We must judge of those doctrines by the lives of the most eminent of those who believe them—those who feel their influence most—those who are the most active in the promotion of them. Again: It ought to be remarked, that many regard the excitements called revivals of religion as of very doubtful tendency. We do not deny that they bring large harvests of nominal professors into the Partialist churches; but upon the whole, is their tendency good? Do they encourage purity of mind? We must refer to facts to settle these questions. But let it be always borne in mind, that the innocent are never to be condemned for the conduct of the guilty. Because there have been alarming and humbling instances of wickedness in the Partialist ministry, it by no means proves that all are alike wicked. There are many excellent men who give their patronage to Partialist doctrines; but the true reason is, not because the doctrines are good, but because such men are deceived, and are yet in darkness in regard to the true gospel.

Such are some of our views on the above very important subject; and we commend them to the attention of our readers.

Millerism—the Schools being stopped.

In a certain town in New Hampshire, not 30 miles from the capital of that State, a town of some note, which sends two Representatives to the General Court, there has been a wild scene caused by the Miller fanaticism. The editor of the 'New Hampshire Courier' says,

A young gentleman of our acquaintance, an excellent teacher, commenced keeping a school on the 8th ult., at which time there was in the district but little, if any, excitement about the 'end of the world.' The people were kind, the scholars obedient, and the school pleasant; but there soon came into town a Baptist minister, who had embraced Millerism, and by day he preached in the meeting-house, and evenings in the school-house—and such was the excitement before Christmas, or in about fifteen days after the school commenced, that it broke up the school entirely, and the teacher left, without one word of complaint having been uttered or any dissatisfaction felt towards him by parents or by scholars. A singing school taught by a worthy person, shared the same fate. All work looking to coming years is at an end there; and the logs cut for the mills are not to be drawn, nor wood for another summer drawn to the doors.

The Committee who engaged the teacher, had the grace to give him the following certificate, to show that the school did not stop for want of qualification in the teacher. The 'Courier' withholds the names of the parties and of the town.

CERTIFICATE.

'To all whom it may concern:—

This may certify that I, ——— ———, of ———, N. H. was a committe chosen by the people of this District (No. 8 north), to employ a person to teach our school the present winter;—that I engaged Mr. ——— ———, of ———, to keep the same, agreeing to give him $18 per month, and his board;—that I consider Mr. ——— to be a young man of good moral character, and well qualified to teach, and that no fault has been found with him as a teacher; but that in consequence of nearly all in this District believing in the Second Advent doctrine, that the end of all things is near at hand, even at the door, we thought proper that the school should be discontinued in order that our children may attend to the salvation of their souls.

This writing is given to clear Mr. ——— from any suspicions that may arise, that the school has been discontinued from any deficiency of duty or ability on his part. ——— ———, Committee.

———, Dec. 26, 1842.'

'The New Englander.'

We ventured, a few weeks since, to put our subscribers on their guard against a new publication which has made its appearance in Connecticut, entitled the 'New Englander.' No one would suspect any thing sectarian in a work with such a title; but it is rankly sectarian, and peculiarly bitter against Universalism. We are happy to see, that our remarks are approved by Br. Sanford, of the 'Universalist' of that State.

We agree with Br. Whittemore in saying that Universalists may expect a determined enemy to their faith in this publication, lately commenced New Haven. A good Orthodox friend of ours, in who is an agent for the work, handed us the first number of it the other day, and asked us to give it our support as a valuable literary quarterly or tri-monthly. On reading it, our answer was, 'if it were a valuable literary work, it should have our patronage; but it is too blue with the old Connecticut Orthodoxy to meet our approbation;' and we say this that our Universalist friends may know what estimate we put upon it. If they want to see how they work it in these days to prop up Orthodoxy, and to fight Universalism, they had better subscribe for it; otherwise, it will be of but little service to them, as they can find better literature in other periodicals. The January number has a long article against Universalism,—a review of Mr. Smith's book. It contains also an article in defence of capital punishment. We have no doubt that the work has been got up for the express purpose of propping up the old Calvinism of New England, under the specious pretence of being devoted to general literature.

Tippling Justified.

The following article is from the 'Boston Notion,' and is said to be from the pen of its editor:

'A good article is like a glass of whiskey punch—or a timber doodle—sharp, sweet, and spirited. But, partial as we confess ourselves, to either of these delightful beverages, no man, we think, unfurnished with the bowels of a New York magistrate, would stick eternally to the same liquor. For our own part, we covet variety in our tippling—a little preliminary Sauterne and a reasonable suffusion of Maderia, before we venture, without compass or quadrant, on the magnum mare of the timber doodle. At such times, we derive considerable enjoyment from a peppered spatch-cock, or a devil'd biscuit, which no one, better than ourself, knows how to prepare.'

We deeply regret that such sentiments should be admitted into any journal, especially one in this good city of Boston. We are not at all acquainted with the art of tippling, and therefore do not understand the application of the phrases above used. But the appalling fact stares every one in the face, that it is a justification of the art of tippling. Let the editor of the 'Notion' then be written down, as a man who is willing to publish such sentiments as the foregoing.

We deeply regret to see the multiplicity of proofs, that sound Temperance doctrines are fast losing their hold upon the public mind. It seems to us, (we hope it is not so,) that the march of the Temperance cause is retrograde. Can it be possible that any good man will lend his influence to bring upon the country again the evils of rum-selling and drunkenness, as they have existed in former years?

Election Sermon.

Rev. Edwin H. Chapin, of Charlestown, has been elected by the House of Representatives of this State, to preach the Election Sermon at the organization of the Government in 1844. We are happy that the choice has fallen on a gentleman so well capable of doing honor to the Commonwealth.

The 'Western Luminary' comes to us in a new dress, and is decidedly improved. It is published at Rochester, N. Y. for $1,00 per year, and is conducted by several brethren of known talent and experience. It is devoted to the doctrine of Universalism in its doctrinal and moral bearings.

Sears' New Monthly Family Magazine.

We have received the first number of this new Magazine, from Saxton, Peirce & Co. the Boston publishers. From every indication, we should judge it will be a very useful work. As to the sentiments of the editor on all subjects, we cannot speak; we shall wait for them to be developed; but the appearance of this Magazine shows that no pains or expence are to be spared to render it worthy of patronage. It will contain many engravings. The editor promises to keep his Magazine 'free from all sectarian spirit,' and he solicits the patronage of 'ministers and Christians of all denominations.'

Meeting at Danvers.

Conference Meeting at Danvers—Expected gathering of believers from Salem, Marblehead, Lynn, Danvers, &c. &c.

It is proposed to have a Union Meeting at Danvers on Wednesday next. Brethren and friends of our common faith are especially invited to be present. The clergy are assured that their services are desired. It is hoped, that the meeting will be equal to the late deeply interesting Conference at Marblehead. There will be services morning, afternoon and evening. Brethren, go for the purpose of enjoying a rich spiritual blessing.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Essex Quarterly Conference.

The Essex County Quarterly Conference met on the 18th inst. in Annisquam. After choosing Moderator and Clerk, the Council proceeded to despatch the little business which happened to come before it. It was left with the Standing Clerk to make arrangements for the next regular meeting of this body, as no applications were received in reference to the place of adjournment. Our friends who may be desirous of having the Conference meet with them in April next, will please communicate, at an early day as may be convenient, with T. P. ABELL.

Rev. E. Dow.

Hanson, Jan. 9, 1843.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I wish to say a word or two in the 'Trumpet' touching the case of Br. E. Dow. I suppose that Br. Browne, of Nashua, alluded to me, instead of S. C. Hewitt. On my way to Vermont last October, I called on Br. Dow, and urged by him, put up with him over night. I remained with him till noon the next day. This if my memory serves me was the 20th of Oct. We had a friendly and pleasant interview—conversed much upon various topics. During the evening he informed me that his mind had undergone a change, and that he began to doubt whether he could be properly denominated a Universalist. I requested him to communicate himself freely to me that I might know what his peculiar views were. He did so. But he never intimated to me that he had discarded any of the fundamental principles of Universalism. Indeed, I told him after a conversation of three or four hours, that I could not see, for my life, that his present views and opinions conflicted, in the least, with the main and principal sentiments deemed sacred by us as a denomination of Christians.

Wherein he seemed to think that he differed from us, materially, was in relation to the principle of 'eternal life' and the effect that the conduct of men here would have upon his future destiny. Having reasoned and reflected much upon the subject, he was about ready (his mind then was not fully established however) to adopt the conclusion that one man who should make a wise use of his talents here, who should improve and expand his mind in religious knowledge, would be in advance of another who should neglect to do this But at the same time he held, if I understood him, that all men would be happy; and happy according as they had cultivated their intellectual and moral powers. But as his mind was in a rather unsettled state, he did not know as he ought to continue to preach, and thought he should retire from the ministry when his contract was fulfilled, which he made with the committee of his society. I gave him to understand that I saw no serious objections in the way—he could continue to preach, and dwell on those truths upon which his mind was fixed; and at the same time he could proceed in his investigations and be governed by the light as it might break into his understanding.

These remarks seemed called for from me, lest some might suppose that I advised him to preach after I knew he had in part, and was about to discard altogether the principles of Universalism. If I have stated any thing not strictly true, Br. Dow will please correct me in the spirit of love. He has my best wishes for his future prosperity and peace. I can truly say, I wish him a happy New Year. But if, as report says, he has renounced the doctrine, the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation, it must be one of despondency and gloom—of sorrow and mourning. For sure I am, there can be no peace—no abiding joy—no solid comfort in believing that the chain which binds humanity together is to be snapped assunder, and a part of God's own family be infinitely and eternally wretched. E. HEWITT.

To the Ministers.

I wish to call the attention of some of the ministering brethren residing within the limits of the Boston Association, to a subject which came up before the Essex Conference at its session, a few months since, in Haverhill. This subject may be seen by reading the following resolutions, which were passed by that body at the session referred to:—

'Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the widow of our departed Br. Henry M. Nichols, of West Haverhill, in her recent severe affliction, and also with the Society of which he was Pastor; and it is our earnest prayer to God that they may be consoled and sustained by the gospel which he so faithfully preached.

'Resolved, That in this instance we feel it our duty to put into practice the resolutions passed at a former session of our Conference, and approved by the Boston Association, in reference to supplying for a space of time, the desks of infirm and deceased clergymen of our order; that we will endeavor to supply the desk of Br. Nichols for six months, so that his salary may continue to the aid of his widow and children.'

The last resolution, I regret to say, has been complied with, 'in this instance,' by but a very few of our ministers living within the bounds of the Association or the Conference. If there are any others, however, who may be disposed to assist the 'widow and fatherless' of a beloved and faithful brother, I will make the necessary arrangements for them, if they will inform me at what time they can the most conveniently render their services. Brethren, think on these things.

Haverhill, Jan. 19, 1843. T. P. A.

General Intelligence.

Temperance Convention at Weymouth. Notwithstanding the very bad travelling, and the uncomfortable weather, there was a goodly number of Washingtonians and other Temperance men present at the Norfolk County Temperance Jubilee. A spirit of union, zeal and perseverance characterized their doings at the Convention.

An excellent spirit prevailed throughout the proceedings, and of a character to produce good and satisfactory results. The morning was devoted in discussing the resolutions prepared by the committee, which was kept up with good spirit—exhibiting a zeal in the cause of temperance that should characterize all meetings of the kind.

The hour of dinner having arrived, the members of the convention repaired to the public house of A. B. Wales, and partook of an excellent repast. Mr. Wales has made great sacrifices for the cause of temperance, and should be encouraged by all who wish well to the cause. I am informed that Mr. Wales's was the second house in the county that gave up selling liquor. I was delighted to see what was exhibited on the occasion—that of the members not confining themselves to paying Mr. Wales the bare amount for his dinner, but a large number paid double price and some treble, which drew from Mr. Wales a very appropriate acknowledgement.

After the repast, the convention repaired to the Universalist Church, and listened to an address from Isaac H. Wright, of Roxbury, which was to the point, and replete with sound argument.—Mr. Wright has an off hand style of delivery, peculiarly attractive, and on this subject seems not only happy himself, but renders others so. It was very gratifying to see so large a collection of Washingtonians; and in the midst to behold that unwavering and untiring friend of temperance, Deacon Grant of Boston. How few there are that would leave the quiet of home and travel a distance of twenty miles and expose themselves on a very stormy day, with the worst of travelling, to attend a Temperance meeting, thereby to promote the cause of humanity.—Would that others would copy from Deacon Grant, always exhibiting a consistent zeal, worthy the great and holy cause of temperance.—Mercantile Journal.

Fires. A barn was burnt in or near Cambridge on Friday evening, about half past 8 o'clock.

About 12 o'clock, same night, the car-house of the Charlestown Branch Railroad was broken into and an attempt made to set fire to it on the inside, which did not succeed. An attempt made on the outside at the same time, was more successful; but an early alarm given by the watchman who discovered it, prevented any serious damage.

On Saturday evening, between 6 and 7 o'clock fire was discovered in the second story of No. 16 Central street, occupied by Messrs. David Thacher and Thomas A. Delano, dry goods dealers.—The fire was extinguished with little damage to the building, but the stock must have been much injured. The stock of Mr. Daniel Bartlett, on the first floor, was considerably damaged by water. The cause of the fire is unknown, although a quantity of lucifer matches were found upon a shelf very near the place where the fire appeared to have commenced; and it is thought by some that they may have been ignited spontaneously.

On Sunday evening, about half past 9 o'clock, fire was discovered in the Soap Manufactory of Chs's Valentine & Co. in Cambridgeport, which was entirely consumed, with nearly all its contents. Insured at the Mutual Manufacturers' Insurance Company, Worcester, for $6000 on the building and $6000 on the stock.

Daring Attempt. On Wednesday evening, about 8 o'clock, says the Keene (N. H.) Sentinel, Mr. Wyman, the keeper of our jail, took a light, and, in company with his little son, 12 years old, entered the large area of the jail to lock up the prisoners, four in number. Mr. W. had locked the door inside, when suddenly he was attacked, (four clubs having been provided and concealed) knocked down, the light extinguished, and at the same time his son was also silenced by one or more strokes of a club. The noise alarmed the inmates of the house, and their cries soon brought assistance, and the three prisoners were then ironed, and safely locked up. Mr. W. has some bad cuts on his head, and many other wounds but not dangerous. His son was also very badly hurt, by blows on the head.

A remarkable Woman. The Westchester Jeffersonian says that there is an old lady residing at Kennet Square, in that county, who is 95 years of age, and can read the finest print without the aid of spectacles. Her memory is surprising, and she can entertain one by the hour in recounting anecdotes and incidents of the revolutionary era, to which she was an eye witness, and which she delights dwelling upon.

A Remarkable Fact. Mr. Barnard stated in a speech in Congress, that in the United States 90 out of every 100 who buy and sell become bankrupts; in England 35 out of every 100. In the United States the creditors received an average of about 8 per cent from the estate of insolvents: in England they receive 55 per cent.

Burglary. The Pontoosuc Factory in this village, says the Lenox (Mass.) Eagle, was entered on Monday morning, and 12 pieces of broad cloth worth about $600, stolen. The Agent of the Company having accidentally discovered two men near the factory engaged in carrying away pieces of cloth, aroused several persons, who started in pursuit. The burglars were arrested, brought before Calvin Martin, Esq., and on Wednesday committed to await their trial at the next February Court. Their names are John Millar (formerly employed by the Pontoosuc Co.) and Benj. Gledhill.

Another Defaulter. A letter carrier, employed in the City Post Office in Washington, D. C., lately absented himself from that place, having been detected in embezzling funds to an amount variously estimated at from five to fifteen thousand dollars.

An Alarming Circumstance. Mr. John Worcester, formerly of Lowell, Mass., for the last 18 months a resident of this city, in the employ of Jacob Worcester, his brother, left here on Friday at 3 P. M., in his usual good health, and without any preparations to go far, and has not since been heard from. Alarm was felt for his safety on Saturday, every inquiry and search was made, particularly upon the ice in the creek, and his friends have reluctantly come to the conclusion, without any positive proof however, that he went on the ice in the creek and went through; the ice, being found on examination, open in many places.—Buffalo Cour.

A Dashing General Thief. On Saturday, Jesse R. Rhodes, all sorts of a thief, with a dash of literature, sentimentality and matchless hypocrisy in his composition, was arrested by Constables Clapp and G. Andrews. On Thursday, Daniel Fairchild missed several tubs of butter from an entry in Fanuel Hall Market. He had no doubt that they had been disposed of by the thief at some store and he looked high and low for them, and on Saturday forenoon he happened into J. L. Riddle's auction room, and there discovered three of his tubs of butter among the things in general to be sold that day. Mr. R. was not able to give the name of his butter customer, but agreed to point him out if he made his appearance during the approaching sale. Clapp and Andrews were then sent for, and attended the sale, and it was but a short time before a well dressed gentleman joined the crowd, and was pointed out as the owner of the butter. Terror seized him as Clapp asked him if he had any butter to sell. 'What do you take me for?' he stammered out, and Clapp coolly replied—'What do we take you for? Why for a thief to be sure, and you must go with me up to my office. Your name, my friend, unless I 'm greatly mistaken, is Rhodes; and if I'm right, it is unnecessary that I should tell who I am,as we have met before.'

Rhodes now perceived it was all over with him and was anxious to be got out of the way as quietly as possible. He expressed great horror at the idea that his arrest would get into the newspapers, and refused to tell where he boarded. He was taken to Clapp's office, Franklin Avenue, and there searched. Among his papers was found a letter addressed to 'Col. Rhode's at Mrs. Dame's, Sewall Place.' Mr. Clapp then went to Mrs. Dame', and asked if a Mr. Rhodes boarded there. She replied that a gentleman calling himself Col. Rhodes, formerly of the U. S. army, and a graduate from West Point, boarded with her, and that he was now a merchant on Central wharf, in company with a Mr. Bartlett. Mr. Clapp soon explained the scrape that the colonel had got into, and was conducted to his room, where he found three trunks filled with an indescribable collection of plunder:—three miniatures albums, bibles and other religious books; certificates of his good character in his own handwriting; carpenter's tools from a jack-planedown to a brad awl; canes with and without swords, and umbrellas; new door keys and lumps of indigo in any quantity, and even painter's brushes. This ill-assorted plunder was taken possession of by Messrs. Clapp and Andrews, and carried to their office. The miniatures were, upon inquiry, ascertained to belong to Mr. S. L. Gerry, artist, and were stolen from his door in School street, two years ago. At Mrs. Dame's he had stated the miniatures to be representatives of members of his own family—one a likeness of his deceased mother, and the other two likenesses of his two brothers, a clergyman and a lawyer! The carpenters' tools were found to belong to a Mr. Hutchinson, and the new keys had been stolen from some new houses building in Essex stret.—One of the bibles was stamped 'Marlborough Chapel,' and a small vol me of a devotional character, belonged to the Rev. Mr. Hague, and must have been stolen during an interview the prisoner had with Mr. H. in his parlor, while he was on probation as a candidate for admission to his church;—and this fact brings us to a successful deception practised by Rhodes upon Mr. H. About four months ago, he made advances to Mr. H., in the character of a convert,and sustained the part with singular success; he gave interesting accounts of his spiritual experiences and change of affections, and exhibited gratifying evidence of regeneration. During his many nterviews with Mr. H. he gave him the impression that he belonged to a somewhat numerous and respectable family of the name of Rhodes, in Rhode Island, with some of the members of which Mr. Hague had become acquainted while he was settled in Providence. At any rate, so completely had he won upon Mr. Hague's good opinion, during his four months probation, that the latter had no doubt that he was a sincere and reliable convert; and as such he recommended him for membership and he was regularly baptized on the first of this month, and admitted into full communion. He exhorted in experience meetings with convincing effect, and had at his tongue's end a complete vocabulary of spiritual sayings; and, as no member of the church who had heard him knew any thing of his real history, it was taken for granted that he was a man of general respectability. In his last address which was delivered on Friday evening last, he claimed acquaintance with the ill-fated Spencer, having known him in some of his early wicked courses. Loudly did he thank the Lord that he had been saved from the destruction which had overtaken the friend of his youth.—'But for the Providence of God,' said he, 'I might like poor Spencer, have died at the yard-arm, instead of being permitted to address you now, and proclaim that my Redeemer liveth, and bless him for what I feel he has done for me.'

His claim to an acquaintance with Spencer is a piece of consummate romance, since for several years past, with a brief intermission, Rhodes has spent his time in the state prison.

As his manners were in good keeping with his professed sentiments, and his conversation peculiarly plausible, it is not at all surprising that Mr. H. was deceived by his arts.

As soon as Mr. Hague heard of Rhode's declaration that he had been acquainted with Spencer, he appointed a meeting with him for the purpose of inquiring why he had concealed the fact until after his admission to the church, as such concealment might be a reason for eclesiastical investigation.

Mexican Indemnity. The terms of payment of the Mexican indemnity have been agreed upon. The payments are to be made in ten half yearly instalments, with 8 per cent interest on the principal. In case any delay occurs in meeting the payments, as they fall due, an additional ten per cent is to be added to the principal.—Provisions are made for the considerations of such claims as have not yet been presented or adjudicated, by appointing commissioners to examine into them. The payments as they fall due, are guaranteed by a mortgage upon the internal revenues of the republic, on which no prior lien exists.

Counterfeiters. A gang of counterfeiters were arrested at Albany, Ia., on the 11th inst., in whose possession were found $12,000 on the Missouri Bank, $5,500 on Indiana Bank, $2,200 on Trust Municipality of New Orleans, all counterfeits.

From Campeachy. News has been received from Campeachy as late as the 3d inst., by the schooner Friedland, Capt. Smith. The news confirms the intelligence previously received, of the continued ill success of the Mexicans in their enterprises against that city. It is even intimated that the latter will be compelled to abandon the siege, and return from the expedition.

Snow in Tennessee. The Nashville Union of the 9th inst. says:—'For many years there has not been so much snow on the ground in this vicinity, as there is at this present writing. It commenced falling on Saturday evening, and was next morning, from ten to thirteen inches deep on a level.'

It is said that Mr. Bancroft has just sent to the press the fourth volume of his valuable 'History of the United States.'

Proposed Mechanics' Hall. We are very glad to know that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association have authorised a committee to procure a lot of land for the erection of a building for their accommodation; and if a suitable site can be procured and agreed upon, we presume the work may be commenced next spring. At present the Association is obliged to hire rooms for their schools, for their meetings, &c., and still have no place for the deposit of a book, a model or an implement. Their writing and drawing schools are in different parts of the city, and both seperated from their own place of meeting.—Bunker Hill Aurora.

An Old Servant. We find among the recent 'doings' at Washington, that a resolution was adopted, instructing the committee on Revolutionary Pensions to inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to John Cary, who says, that he was the body servant of General Wasington, and was present with him at the defeat of Braddock and the surrender of Cornwallis, and that he is 112 years old.

Mansfield Coal. Many of our readers doubtless recollect, that some six or eight years since, coal was discovered in the town of Mansfield, in this State. Considerable sums of money were expended, at that time, in opening mines in that vicinity; but the coal beds then discovered, were not of sufficient thickness to pay the expenses of working them. In July last, operations were again commenced by four men; and at the present time, they have excavated to the depth of about fifty feet, where the layer is from three to four feet in thickness, about the ordinary depth of coal beds in Pennsylvania and the Western States. The editors of the Boston Daily Mail, in a recent number, stated that they were then burning the coal, and they pronounced it nearly equal to the best Anthracite of Pennsylvania.

The Geological character of this locality, is such as always promises encouragement to the miner. There is a continuous chain, of what are called Transition rocks, extending from Roxbury into the State of Rhode Island; and it is in the Transition strata, that the productive coal beds of this country occur. There is only one other portion of the State, where a Geologist would think of searching for coal. Along the Connecticut river, there is a narrow strip, belonging to what is called the Secondary formation, a class of rocks that often abound in coal. All the rest of the State consists of what are denominated Primitive rocks in which no coal ever is found.

The strata that extends through Mansfield, have been opened at several localities, in Rhode Island; and large 'quantites of coal have been obtained, but the beds discovered hitherto, have been found to be of an inferior quality. There is a good reason to believe, however, that a better variety exists, at some locality, in this Transiton range; and the recent operations at Mansfield promise encouraging results. These mines are situated so near the Boston and Providence Railroad, that every facility is offered for transporting the coal to market. Copper, it is said, accompanies the coal, similar to that of Cumberland, R. I., which gives additional inducement to the miner. The discovery is, every way, deserving of attention; if further results prove equal to present expectations, it must add greatly to the resources of this portion of our State. The present time, when labor is comparitively cheap, would seem to be a favorable period to test the practicability of working mines like these.—Quincy Aurora.

An American Slaver on the Coast of Africa.—The Governor of the Colony of Liberia, in a despatch addressed to the Executive Committee of the American Colonization Society on the 9th of June last, states that on his arrival at Bassa Cove, which place he visited in Feb., 1842, he found anchored there a fast sailing schooner belonging to New York. The Captain refused to pay any port charges, in defiance of the authorities, who had no means of forcing a compliance with their regulations. The supercargo of the vessel was a Spaniard. The Governor told him he knew him to be a slaver, and ordered him to leave the settlement. The vessel soon got under way and stood up the coast, but in 10 or 15 days returned, and in 12 hours took in a cargo of 250 slaves and put to sea.—Transcript.

The Methodists. A new Methodist church has recently been organized in this city, and there appears to be much trouble amongst this sect. One paper says, 'the old Methodists sneer at the secession. They will find it a grave matter; the defection is wide spread and serious. We have long told our readers that such a feeling, though smothered and concealed, everywhere prevailed in New England.'

Fire at New Orleans. On the 9th inst. a fire broke out at 123 Chartres street. The Commercial Coffee House, the Exchange Restaurant and the Broker's Coffee House, were consumed.—That splendid structure, the St. Louis Hotel, was again saved from destruction.

The Time prolonged. It is understood that Miller and his associates have recently carefully renewed their calculation upon which they found the prophecy of the near approach of the end of the world, when an error was discovered in the footing of one of the columns of a thousand years. This is a very important discovery just now—it will dispel the uneasiness about so sudden a go-off, and give promise that we are yet to witness the filling of many a bubble, and realize the enjoyment of many a pame before the and of all things. The 'ascension robes' with which many of the Millerites on Long Island have provided themselves are not likely to be wanted —N. Y. Jour. Com.

A story we have somewhere read, of a blind man carrying a lame one, was a few days since forcibly brought to our recollection in the following manner: As we were walking in the upper part of the city we observed two men dressed as mechanics or laborers; our way lying some distance together, we addressed to one of them some unimportant remark. The manner in which it was received, induced us to look more closely at them, when we observed that each was laboring under a terrible deprivation, distressing to each, but differing in its nature; one of them was blind, the other was deaf and dumb. The sense in which either was deficient was enjoyed by the other. He who was blind could hear and speak for both, while he went confidently on his darkened way, under the guidance of his silent companion. It struck us that their communication with each other must of necessity be restricted and uncertain; yet they seemed, and doubtless were, happy in each other's companionship. We looked from one to the other and thought that there was presented to us an instructive lesson.—It taught us to look with less of a repining spirit upon those ills of life which occasionally beset our path, and to feel in a higher degree, that holy feeling of charity toward our fellow men, which more than any other, seems to lift our fallen state, up to a communion with him who taught us 'love thy neighbor as thyself.' Go then on thy way, silent and dark instructors, and may the sorrows of this world press lightly upon thee, until in the fulness of time, thy senses shall all be made perfect, 'where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.'

A most amusing incident is related in the St. Louis Gazette. Not long since, while the water was running so deep in the streets of that city as to render them almost impassable, especially for ladies, a very pretty young Miss stood at a corner, apparently at a loss how to cross over. At this time a young man walked up, and seeing her predicament, without waiting for an introduction picked her up, and placed her safely on the other side. Not a word was spoken until the young lady was placed on the sidewalk, when she turned round, and sneeringly exclaimed: 'You impudent puppy!' 'I beg your pardon, Miss!' exclaimed the gentleman with the greatest coolness imaginable, again taking her up and placing her where he first found her.

MARRIED:

By Rev. O. A. Skinner, Mr. Thomas D. Strand to Miss Sarah Stackpole. Mr. Winthrop Smart, jr. to Miss Sarah E. Bancroft.

In East-Cambridge, Mr. Nathaniel J. Hadley to Miss Elizabeth Redding.

In Duxbury, by Rev. John F. Dyar, Mr. Stephen Holmes 2d. to Miss Mahala Bartlett, both of Kingston.

DIED:

In Malden, Mrs. SARAH, wife of Mr. George T. Barney, aged 20. In this death an only and affectionate child, a faithful wife and mother has been suddenly called from the endearments of home to that house appointed for all the living. A large circle of friends are thus left to mourn that their bright hopes in her have been so early and suddenly cut off. May the consolations of the gospel give them assurance and peace, and inspire them with that hope which looks beyond time and death, to the fadeless joys of life immortal.—Com.

In Provincetown, Jan. 7, Mr. STEPHEN P. NICKERSON, son of Capt. Jonathan Nickerson, aged 27. It is not only due to our departed brother to say, that he sustained in life a good moral character, but he lived and died in the enjoyment of the gospel of Jesus Christ. He indeed lived in the possession of a gospel hope—a hope of living beyond the grave, and this blessed hope sustained and consoled him during his sickness; and it was as an anchor to his soul in the last trying moments of dissolving nature. May the same lively hope and living faith of the gospel which supported this beloved son in life, support also the mourning parents, brothers and sisters, and all the friends who are called to mourn in consequence of this event of divine Providence.

BELLS, CLOCKS, ORGANS. GEORGE H. HOLBROOK, East Medway, Mass. manufactures CHURCH BELLS, CHURCH CLOCKS and CHURCH ORGANS.

Holbrook's BELLS are well known. It is the general testimony of those who are judges, and who have had opportunities of forming an opinion, that his Bells are the best which are manufactured in the United States, both for strength and brilliancy of tone. The best Bells in Boston, New York, and other great cities, are from Holbrook's Foundry.

Mr. Holbrook's CLOCKS are well known. There are probably a greater number of tower Clocks in Massachusetts manufactured by him, than any other man. He has facilities for manufacture, which enable him not only to make good Clocks, but to undersell all other manufacturers. These are the causes of the great number he has sold.

His ORGANS may be judged of by the Organ at the Marlboro' Chapel, which is from his manufacture.

The public are assured that it will be for their interest to call, if they wish to purchase either Bells, Clocks or Organs.

EIGHT DOLLARS PER DOZEN!

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY. THIRD EDITION. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by THOMAS WHITTEMORE, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of SHORT ANTHEMS, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per Dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Lang, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the LESSONS or RUDIMENTS, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

DEAR SIR,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

JOTHAM S. FRENCH.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

'GOSPEL HARMONIST.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

Lines

Written on reading the 'Hero of Truth,' dedicated to 'Rev. Hosea Ballou.'

Dear father! Sacred words that bring
Sweet memories of the past,
It gives me joy that poets sing
Thy noble worth at last.

Well hath the poet twined the wreath
Of fame around thy brow,
And all will own that well thou dost
Deserve to wear it now.

No chivalric renown is thine,
Secured by deeds of strife;
For Truth has ever been the shrine
Of thy devoted life.

So lofty are the strains in which
The poet sings thy praise,
That strong must be affection's power
My humble voice to raise.

Whilst others sound the note of fame,
Mine be a daughter's part,—
To cherish with thy honored name,
The virtues of thy heart. C. W.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION,

Between Rev. Luther Lee and Rev. Eli Ballou.

QUESTION. Do the Scriptures teach that any part or portion of mankind will be endlessly punished for the sins committed in this life?

Mr. Lee to Mr. Ballou....No. 11.

DEAR SIR: Your paper containing your last letter did not reach me, but I have obtained a copy of the letter through the medium of the Trumpet, and proceed to reply to it.—You say,

'I would ask our readers, what does Mr. Lee's last letter contain, that bears the semblance of an argument in favor of the endless duration of punishment?'

My first positions are 'the semblance of argument,' and my last letter was a fair and full refutation of your reply to those positions. If then you say the truth when you deny that my last had the semblance of argument in favor of endless punishment, yours of which it was a refutation could not have had the semblance of argument against endless punishment in reply to my argument first put forth. My positions were direct on the point, and if yours was a reply to those positions, my last being a refutation of such reply, must also be in point; therefore if, as you say, my last contained no argument on the question, it follows that your last was wide of the mark, and my fault, of which you complain, is that of following you where, according to the rules of discussion, you had no right to go. You may take which horn of the dilemma you please; admit that my last was in point, or admit that your last, to which it was a full reply, was wide of the point.

But let us look at the facts in the case. I commenced my argument by introducing the word everlasting, 'these shall go away into everlasting punishment,' as proof of endless punishment. To this you replied that that 'everlasting punishment' spoken of in the text did not refer to a future state, that it had exclusive reference to the punishment which came upon the Jews in the destruction of Jerusalem. This every one must see, if true, was a full refutation of my argument; but I proceeded and proved, especially in my last, that the text does not refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, when lo! you discover that that has not the 'semblance of argument in favor of the endless duration of punishment.'—What wonderful logic! If this question has nothing to do with endless punishment, why did you introduce it? And why have you insisted upon it so long? And having harped upon it, until in my last I showed your positions perfectly absurd and subversive of common sense as well as of the Scriptures, when, wonderful to relate! you just find out that it has nothing to do with the question in debate.

Another sophism of which you are notoriously guilty is found in these words: 'The gathering of the Roman legions, composed of soldiers of all nations would justify Christ in using a similar expression;' that is, in saying with reference to the destruction of Jerusalem 'When the Son of man shall come in his glory, all nations shall be gathered before him.' If then a few legions of soldiers selected from among different nations—not all nations literally, but only all nations hyperbolically—can justify the expression 'all nations shall be gathered before him,' where is your proof that all will be saved? With this latitude of construction it will appear that all nations, all the families of the earth, all men, the whole creation, &c. &c., which Universalists perpetually quote in proof of the salvation of all men, may mean no more than some of all nations, families &c. Indeed if there were a text which expressly declared that all nations shall finally be made holy and happy, it would not prove universal holiness and happiness, if, in Scripture language, all nations means no more than some of all nations. It would prove no more than that a part of the human family will be saved, a part bearing a proportion to the whole family of man, equal to the proportion which the Roman army bore to all the nations from which they were selected.—Now, sir, I believe in a more extensive salvation than this. How true it is that error destroys itself; in attempting to raise a defence on one point, it tears up the very foundations in another position.

But there is another fatal error in this view you take of the gathering of all nations before Christ. You make the Roman army to constitute the 'all nations' spoken of by Christ.—This cannot be, for the 'all nations' to be gathered at the coming of Christ are to be separated, judged, rewarded and punished, which was not true of the Roman army; they were only the instruments of punishing the Jews on that occasion; it is a part of the gathered nations that are sent away into everlasting punishment, whereas the Jews only went into punishment at that time who were not gathered.

You have still another exposition which is not only absurd in itself but entirely subversive of your previous positions. You say:—

'I admit that ALL NATIONS without exception were at that time, placed under the authority of the Son of man. He became the judiciary and executive of God's moral government. This is what is meant by all nations being gathered before him.'

On this I beg leave to remark,

1. It is subversive of what you have contended for above. If as you say, 'this is what is meant by all nations being gathered before him,'—all nations cannot mean the Roman army, as you have contended during the whole discussion, unless you limit God's moral government to the Roman army. What think you, did the moral government of God extend beyond the rank and file, trench and redoubt of the camp of Titus? You have unequivocally contended that by the gathering of all nations was meant the besieging of Jerusalem by the Roman army, and quoted the prophet Zechariah to prove it; but now you say it means the placing of all nations under the authority of Christ as 'the judiciary and executive of God's moral government.' Thus I have driven you to abandon your entire position on this point, for the text cannot mean both, unless God's judiciary and executive administration is confined to the Roman army.

2. Your new position on this subject is no less false than the one you have just abandoned for its sake. It is not true that 'all nations were, at that time, put under the authority of the Son of man,' as you assert. Jerusalem was destroyed about 37 years after Christ ascended to heaven, where Stephen saw him sitting at the right hand of God, hence he had acted as the executive of God's moral government for so many years previous to the time when you say all nations were put under his authority. Let us see if this view is not sustained by scripture. Before Christ ascended to heaven, he said to his apostles, 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations.' It is clear from this that all nations were placed under his authority at the time or immediately after his resurrection from the dead. It most likely took place when he ascended to heaven after his resurrection, and before his final ascension noticed in Acts i. 9. When Jesus was first risen from the dead he said, John xx. 17, 'Touch me not for I am not yet ascended to my Father;' and again he said, Luke xxiv. 39, 'Handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones.' From this it is plain that Jesus did ascend to heaven to his Father between these two revelations of himself to his disciples, and at this ascension no doubt the transfer to him of all power in heaven and in earth took place. This accords with Eph. iv. 8, 'When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.' The same point is proved by the words of Christ to John, Rev. i. 18, 'I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold, I am alive forevermore, and have the keys of hell and death.' This expression, 'have the keys of hell and death,' denotes his authority, as the 'executive of God's moral government.' But the former text is sufficient, in which Christ declared nearly forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, that all power in heaven and in earth was given unto him. In view of these facts, how you can maintain that 'all nations were put under the authority of Christ at that time,' that is, at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, must constitute one of the greatest wonders of Universalism. When you say that all nations were put under his authority 'at that time,' you virtually affirm that they were not under his authority before that time, in which you contradict the words of Christ in that he declared that all power in heaven and in earth was given unto him. And this authority he had already exercised by commissioning his ministers to go and teach all nations.

My last had the effect I intended it should, that is, make you ashamed of your making the destruction of Jerusalem the judgment of the last day. You have contended during the whole discussion, that Matt. xxv. 31–46, is a description of the destruction of Jerusalem, and was fulfilled by that event; but now you abandon it entire. You say in your last, 'I now make no application of it.' All your labor then is gone. Thus,

'Restless mortals toil for nought.'

But you call on me to prove my application of the text. This sir, I have already done, and may be found in Nos. 3, 5 and 7, but particularly in No. 7. The arguments not only prove that the event predicted did take place at the destruction of Jerusalem, but also that it has not taken place since, and cannot until the end of time. All those texts which connect judgment with the resurrection, which speak of the judgment of the dead and connect judgment with the passing away of the heavens and burning up of the earth, all prove the point. I will refer you to only one consideration urged in No. 3. The everlasting punishment spoken of in Matt. xxv. 46, is such as 'was prepared for the devil and his angels.' This proves it to refer to a future state. Now if the orthodox notion of devils be correct, this argument must be perfectly conclusive; and if you object to this I will defend it in six letters more, in which I will confine myself to the existence of orthodox devils, if you will continue the discussion.—Unless you will meet this point, I shall have proved that Matt. xxv. 31–46 refers to a future state. But, sir, need I any further proof? I undertook to prove endless punishment, for which I quoted, 'these shall go away into everlasting punishment.' You replied that the text did not refer to a future state, but to the destruction of Jerusalem. This we have been disputing ever since; but now you have backed out of your exposition, and that too without giving any other exposition. This leaves me master of the field with my argument as first stated, in full force.

In answer to some questions I asked concerning your views of Christ's second coming to judge the world, you say,

'I believe his second coming or appearing in his kingdom is a progressive work—that it commenced during the generation in which Jesus lived, and will continue until he gives up the reconciled kingdom to God. When the second coming of Christ shall have been finished, there will be no more sin, nor death, nor punishment, nor misery.'

In No. 6, you quoted Matt. xxiv. 34, 'Verily I say unto you, that this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled.' This text, you then insisted, proved that the coming of Christ, the gathering of all nations, the judgment, and rewarding and punishment spoken of in Matt. xxv. 31—46, took place during the natural life of some then present, but now, according to the new light into which you appear to have been driven by my arguments, all these things will not be fulfilled until after the final resurrection. Now you make the destruction of Jerusalem the commencement of 'all these things.' The scene and work which you then contended would all be fulfilled while some of that generation should be alive, you now contend will last until immortality shall break in upon the world with the universal reign of salvation. Do you not think that our readers will see this plain contradiction? The view you now take of the coming of Christ sweeps all you have heretofore contended for on this point, and leaves the destruction of Jerusalem nothing more to do with it than the burning of Moscow or the late dreadful earthquake in Hayti; indeed your new view makes every event, great and small, that has or will transpire under the government of God, from the ascension of Christ to the end of the time, a part of Christ's second coming. How does this compare with those scriptures which represent him as a man gone a journey, to come a set time; which represent him coming as a thief in the night, at an hour when we think not, suddenly as the lightning from heaven, as being revealed from heaven in flaming fire, as descending with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, as descending in like manner as the apostles saw him go up into heaven? These are all scriptural representations of his coming to judge the world. But again how does your new view compare with those texts which represent former generations as mingling in the judgment with those of Christ's time? And what does that text mean which says, 'Judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come,' (1 Cor. iv. 5) if the coming of the Lord is all the time taking place?

You complain because I do not advance in the argument. I have advanced so as to drive you from all your positions. But had I left the points which I have so thoroughly discussed, you would have said I have abandoned them, and complained because I would not thoroughly discuss them. But I am satisfied, for if my efforts have done no other good they have exploded the theory with which you commenced making the judgment to take place at the destruction of Jerusalem. This has long been the hobby of Universalists, and I designed to use it up and drive you from it, and I have succeeded. This is my last, and I have done unless you will agree to continue the discussion.

Yours, as ever, LUTHER LEE.

Mr. Ballou to Mr. Lee....No. 12.

DEAR SIR: So conscious are you of being off from the question we agreed to discuss, that you even refuse to publish it in your paper containing our last letters. You feel ashamed to let your readers know what the question is, you are pretending to argue. The truth is, the discussion of all the points in the argument between us, was properly finished in letter 8, and since then, you have made no advance in the argument, but have merely struggled in the strong cords of truth with which you are bound.

In your first letter, you cited in proof of 'endless punishment,' Matt. xxv., 46, 'these shall go away into everlasting punishment.'—You assumed without an attempt at proof the application of this passage to the immortal state, or to the close of Christ's reign, and also contended that the word 'everlasting' here signified endless duration. I denied your application of the text to the immortal state on the authority of Christ's words in Matt. xvi. 27 28, and xxiv. 34. I said nothing of Jerusalem's destruction. You first commenced on that topic.

2. I denied that the words rendered everlasting and eternal, signify endless duration when applied to punishment. You alledged that endless was the proper gramatical meaning of these words, and when I denied this, your only answer was they signify eternal, when applied to God, and, as no word, ever is or can be used to express more than its proper meaning, therefore eternal is the proper meaning of these words, and that they must be understood in their proper sense when applied to punishment, unless I could show that they were used in a forced or accomodated sense when thus applied. I met this argument by showing by the highest authority, that 'the radical and proper meaning of olam and aion (words translated everlasting and eternal) is an indefinite duration of time,—that the mere force of these terms is insufficient to prove the endless duration of ANYTHING whatever,' even of God himself—that these words signify eternity when applied to God, not from the proper force of the words themselves, but because the subject, in this case, requires such a meaning,—and that these words are used to signify more than their radical and primitive meaning when applied to God, just as you use the word 'day' to signify more than its common meaning, in the phrases 'day of judgement, day of grace, day of probation, &c.' This fairly met your argument, and how well or ill, each of us sustained our positions on this point, is left for our readers to judge. Without claiming any credit to myself, I think I never witnessed a more signal failure than you have made on this part of the argument. You even refused to tell me how you would translate the Gr. phrases 'and further,' and 'beyond it' added to aion when that term is applied to the reign of God! I also involved you in a dilemma as follows: you contended that the word aionios properly expressed the whole existence of God and that it is used in its proper sense when applied to punishment; hence as God is unbegining and unending, therefore punishment must be unbegining and unending.

In conclusion, I will add, it is evident from another consideration that the long enduring punishment of Matt. xxv. 46, will not be endless, from the fact, that the Greek word kolasis, here translated punishment, signifies properly correction or chastisement. The word was originally used as peculiarly applicable to the pruning of fruit trees, which as all know, is designed for the improvement of the tree. Grotius and Wittenbach both affirm that the Greeks and the ancient philosophers meant by kolasis 'that punishment which tends to the improvement of the criminal.

In all your six letters you have only relied on this one text in proof of endless suffering. You did, indeed, in letter 7, cite the sin against the Holy Spirit, the case of Sodom and Gomorrah, and 2 Thes. i. 9. To these I made brief replies, and you entirely abandoned the texts—said not a word more about them—and hastened back to your favorite 'hobby,' Jerusalem's destruction.

3. As I denied your application of Matt. xxv. 46. to the immortal state, it became your logical duty to prove your application by direct testimony or argument. I ask our readers to look back over your letters, and see if you have one direct argument to this point. I have called your attention again and again, to this defect in your reasoning, but I have been answered only by your repeated supposed objections, to what you supposed to be the Universalists' views of Jerusalem's overthrow. Every one must see that this was not proving your own application. In this respect, your course has been both illogical, unmanly and unfair. I ask, where is Mr. Lee's argument to prove that Matt. xxv. 46 applies to the immortal state? Where have you shown that the 'coming of the Son of man' is yet future, and to take place at the end of his reign? No-where. Let this be remembered.

You and I agree, that 'these' were to 'go away into everlasting punishment,' [aionion kolasin.] when the 'Son of man' should 'come in his glory, and sit upon the throne of his glory,' &c. You have admitted that 'the coming of the Son of man in his kingdom,' is a past event, and you dare not deny, that this coming was 'second' to his first coming: and, when I ask you to show the difference between 'coming in his kingdom in Matt. xvi. 28, and 'sitting on the throne of his glory,' in Matt. xxv. 31, you answer me only by a studied silence.

The state of the argument between us on this point may be exhibited as follows:

MR. LEE'S PROOF.

1. 'These shall go away into long-enduring punishment, when the Son of man shall come in his glory, and sit upon the throne of his glory,' Matt. xxv. 31.

2. Begged assumption that this coming of the Son of man is yet future.

3. Objections against the Universalist view of the coming of Christ.

MR. BALLOU'S GROUND OF DENIAL THAT THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST IS YET FUTURE.

1. 'There be some of them that stand here which shall not taste death, until they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom,' Matt. xvi. 28. Mr. Lee admits that this coming took place long ago, and he cannot show that the coming in Matt. xxv. 31, is a different coming from his 'coming in his kingdom,' in Matt. xvi. 28.

2. 'And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory; . . . this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled.' Matt. xxiv. 30, 34. Mr. Lee admits that the coming of the Son of man, here mentioned, took place long ago; this coming was 'second' to his first one, and is the same coming mentioned in Matt. xxv. 31.

3. James said, when he wrote his epistle, 'the coming of the Lord draweth nigh . . . . the judge standeth before the door.' James v. 8, 9. Also Matt. x. 23; John xxi. 22, 23; Mark viii. 38, and ix. 1; Luke ix. 27, and xvii. 30.

I will now proceed to notice some of the errors in your last letter.

1. I have not 'contended through this whole discussion, that 'all nations' mean the Roman army.' You objected to my view of Christ's second coming, that 'all nations were not gathered' at Jerusalem's destruction. In reply, I cited certain passages to show what this expression might mean, so to obviate your objection. In this, I succeeded. I have carried the idea from the beginning of our controversy, that Christ, at the beginning of his reign, did commence judging all nations.

You say, 'It is not true that all nations were at that time, put under the authority of the Son of man.' I shall not dispute with you about the precise point of time, when the 'Son of man came in his kingdom,' and all nations were put under his authority. I believe, however, that his kingdom was not fully established until Jerusalem's destruction—until the complete end of the Jewish age, polity, rites, ceremonies, &c. Be that as it may, I have fully proved, that the judgment mentioned in Matt. xxv. 31–46, took place in the commencement of Christ's reign, and not at the end of it, as you vainly assert. He came in his kingdom during that generation, before some who then lived 'tasted death,' and commenced rewarding men according to their works,' and the destruction of the Jews was the retribution he rendered to them for their iniquities. Whether they were destroyed at the precise moment when Jesus became the executive of God's moral government, or whether the train of events here predicted, were nearly forty years in being fulfilled; in either case, it happened at, or in the beginning of his reign, and in connection with his 'coming in his kingdom.'

I have never abandoned the idea, that the 24 h and 25th chapters of Matthew entire, relate particularly to the 'coming of the Son of man in his kingdom'—the destruction and dispersion of the Jews—and that that people are still suffering the results of the sentence then pronounced upon them. When I said, 'I now make no application of it,' I did not mean to be understood, to abandon my application, but only to make no application for the time being, in order to make you do your duty, and prove your own application, without any reference to Jerusalem's overthrow; but this you dared not undertake.

I still contend that the language 'this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled,' proves that the coming of Christ,—the gathering of all nations, and the 'going away into long-enduring punishment, took place during the natural life of some then present.' But though they went into that punishment before that generation passed, yet neither myself nor any other Universalist, ever contended that the 'everlasting punishment' came to an end during that generation.

In my last, I find I was not as precise in expressing my views of the second coming of Christ, as I ought to have been. I will try again. I believe that the coming of Christ 'in his kingdom,' took place during the generation in which Jesus lived, but his appearing in his kingdom has continued ever since, and I will continue until he delivers up the kingdom to the Father. I have not admitted and do not believe, that any will be miserable after their resurrection to immortality. Am I NOW sufficiently explicit to be understood? Jesus was like 'a man gone a journey to return at a set time,' because his coming was then future, and to be at a set time. The apostle said, 'Judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come,' because his coming was then future, though near at hand. Your proof text in Matt. xxv. 46, is not connected with the resurrection of the dead. Nothing is said of the resurrection, either in the 24th or 25th chapters of Matthew; nor, is any division of the human family subsequent to the resurrection to immortality, taught any where in the Bible.

You say, 'the fact that the everlasting punishment was prepared for the devil and his angels, proves it to refer to a future state.' You add, as if conscious of your shameless begging of the question, 'if the orthodox notion of devils be correct.' Here your argument rests on an 'IF,' and you know that you had stated this argument before in No. 3, and that I had met you on this point in letter 6,—denied that 'the orthodox notion of devils, is correct,' and stated my position on this subject. Why then do you assume what you know I deny, and reason from assumed, unproved and unprovable premises.

You say,

'I [you] am satisfied, for if my efforts have done no other good, they have exploded your theory with which you commenced making the judgment take place at the destruction of Jerusalem.'

I reply, your 'efforts' have not, and never can explode the fact, that a very great and terrible judgment or retribution, did come upon the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem. Your 'efforts' have not exploded the fact that this judgment happened at or in the commencement of Christ's reign, or the setting up of his kingdom in the earth; and that this is the subject of discourse in the 24th and 25th chapters of Matthew. Your 'efforts' have not proved, and do not seem very likely to prove, that the judgment mentioned in Matt. xxv. belongs to the end of Christ's reign.

Neither myself, nor any other Universalist, ever pretended that Christ judging the world, or his day of judgment CLOSED with Jerusalem's destruction. We say that judging and reigning are synonymous,—that Christ commenced his universal reign or judgment, at his 'coming in his kingdom,' during the generation in which he lived—that the destruction of the Jews took place about this time, and that it was a retribution to them for their sins—that they, as a people, were judicially excluded from the blessings of the gospel, and sentenced to a 'long-enduring punishment'—that as a people, they remain in that exclusion from the gospel, in the said punishment, even until now, and will so remain until the 'fulness of the Gentiles be come in'—then 'the deliverer shall come out of Zion, and turn away ungodliness from Jacob, and so all Israel shall be saved.' See Romans xi. I believe Christ's day of judging or reigning over the world in righteousness, commenced about the time of Jerusalem's overthrow, and his 'day of judgment,' or his reign, will continue, until he gives up the kingdom to the Father. The destruction of the Jews and their exclusion from the gospel—was the first retributive administration of importance under Christ's reign, of which we have any account. This took place in the beginning of his reign—not at the end of it—and is the subject of discourse in Matt. xxiv. and xxv.

I wish our readers to remember that you have in this controversy, taken the absurd position, that 'God could not have prevented the existence of those who will be endlessly miserable, without preventing the existence of the happy.' Thus, you suppose, God was absolutely compelled to create those whose existence he knew would prove an endless curse to them, or else forego the creation of those who will be happy. Thus, you limit the Almighty, and suppose him necessiated to create millions, unwillingly in itself considered. You make him dependant on man's will, and an object of pity, because he could not do as he desired! I ask you, was God good to the known subjects of endless misery, in creating them? i. e. good to them? not to the saved? We read, that God's 'tender mercies are over all his works.' Are his 'tender mercies' over an 'endless hell' of unmitigated, ceaseless torture, from which no good to the sufferers can ever accrue?

You may proceed on with the discussion of our present question, as you propose, if you choose, and I will copy your letters and reply. I do not, however, think it best to occupy six letters in discussing the existence of devils, so far as that subject is connected with our question. You must confine yourself to the existence of the devil [ho diabolos] mentioned in Matt. xxv. 41. For many reasons, I shall have no discussion with you on the demoniacs of the New-Testament; as that is a distinct subject, from the devil or satan, and is not at all connected with the question of endless misery. Yours for the Truth's sake,

ELI BALLOU.

Montpelier, Jan. 7th, 1843.

Animal Magnetism.

A most extraordinary surgical operation has been performed, the particulars of which will be found detailed in a couple of columns of the London Morning Herald of the 26th ult. Jas. Wombell, about 42, a laboring man, had it suffered for a period of about five years with a painful affection of the left knee joint. He was admitted into the hospital at Wellow, in Nottinghamshire, and it was decided that amputation should take place above the knee joint, and it was accordingly done while the potient was under the influence of mesmeric sleep! On the first of October this wonderful operation was thus performed, as given in the words of the Mesmerizer, one Mr. W. Topham, a lawyer of the Middle Temple London:—'I again mesmerized him in four minutes. In a quarter of an hour I told Mr. W. Square Wood (the operator) that he might commence. I then brought two fingers of both hands gently in contact with Wombell's closed eyelids, and kept them still further to deepen the sleep. Mr. Ward, after one earnest look at the man, slowly plunged his knife into the centre of the outer side of the thigh, directly to the bone, and then made a clear incision round the bone, to the opposite point, on the outside of the thigh. The stillness at this moment was something awful. The calm respiration of the sleeping man alone was heard, for all others seemed suspended. In making the second incision the leg was found to be more inconvenient than it had appeared, and the operator could not proceed with his former facility. Soon after the second incision, a moaning was heard from the patient, which continued at intervals, until the conclusion. It gives me the idea of a troubled dream; for his sleep continued as profound as ever. The look of his countenance never changed for an instant; his whole frame rested, uncontrolled, in perfect stillness and repose; not a muscle was seen to twitch.—To the end of the operation, including the sawing of the bone, securing the arteries, and applying the bandages—occupying a period of more than twenty minutes, he lay like a statue. With strong sal volatile and water, he gradually and calmly awoke, and when asked to describe what he had felt, thus replied: 'I never knew any thing more (after his being mesmerized) and never felt any pain at all; I once felt as if I heard a kind of crouching.' We asked if that was painful? he replied, 'No pain at all. I never had any; and knew nothing, till I was awakened by that strong stuff.' The 'crouching' was the sawing of his own thigh bone. The first dressing was performed in mesmeric sleep, with similar success and absence of all pain. This case is so important that I have condensed its principal features, and when I consider the gravity with which the operation was surrounded, the numbers who were present, the unquestionable rank and respectability of the professional gentleman and the utter absence of all affectation, I must candidly admit that scepticism is staggered, and we are no longer in a position to deride or despise influences so extraordinary, important and practical.

GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM, FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM—designed to lead inquirers to the belief of that doctrine, and believers to the practice of it.' By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. This work consists of 408 pages, handsomely bound; and will be sold at the low price of ONE DOLLAR a copy.

I. It gives a brief history of the doctrine from the earliest ages, and notices of its most eminent defenders.

II. It clearly and particularly sets forth the sentiments of Universalists.

III. It gives the evidences of Universalism as contained in the sacred Scriptures, by which it is infallibly proved that said doctrine is the doctrine of the Bible.

IV & V. It explains all the principal passages, both in the Old and New Testaments, which have been used to disprove Universalism, amounting to upwards of ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY, in which all the different subjects are discussed, wherein light is so much needed,—such as the words rendered 'hell,' 'the lake of fire,' 'the furnace of fire,' 'unquenchable fire,' 'everlasting fire,' 'everlasting destruction,' 'eternal judgment,' 'coming forth from the graves to condemnation,' the 'sin against the Holy Ghost,' 'day of judgment,' 'destruction of the soul,' 'kingdom of heaven,' &c. &c.

VI. It answers the common objections to Universalism.

VII. It points out the moral tendency of Universalism, and the duties of those who believe in that benign and heart-cheering sentiment.

VIII. It furnishes a Constitution for Universalist Societies, and advice in regard to the formation and management of the same; showing the only way in which they can enjoy prosperity. It also gives all the laws of the Commonwealth in regard to religious Societies.

IX. It gives directions in regard to the formation of Churches,—presents a plan of Church Government,—gives scriptural views of the Lord's Supper,—and a form of the administration of that service, for the benefit of young clergymen.

X. This chapter is on the evidences of revealed religion; and presents entire that masterly work, which never has been answered, and never can be refuted, Leslie's 'Short Method with the Deists.' Never but one Infidel attempted to answer it, and he gave up the task in despair.

This work is bound firm and strong, because we wish Universalists to lend it freely among their opponents.

MILLER'S THEORY REFUTED. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted.

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

FOURTH EDITION OF CONFERENCE HYMNS. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'

Price $1,25 per dozen—12 1-2 cents single.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS. 'Selections from Eminent Commentators who have believed in punishment after death; wherein they have agreed with Universalists in the interpretation of Scriptures relating to Punishment. By Rev. LUCIUS R. PAIGE. Second Edition, with revisions and additions. 358 pages.—Price $1.

This is a highly valuable work to all Universalists.—It proves by the most respectable orthodox authority, that the interpretations which Universalists have given of the passages of Scripture which relate to punishment, are correct. It is a refutation of endless misery by the testimony of the most learned writers who have believed that doctrine. The threatenings of punishment, occuring in the New Testament, which have been supposed to refer to endless misery, are explained in this work, in the very language of the Partialist Commentators. It is fatal to the doctrine of endless misery.

DODS' SHORT SERMONS. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the new stereotype edition of 'DODS' SHORT SERMONS,' with addition of several important articles. These Sermons have been regarded by the Universalist public with great favor. The first edition was taken up with avidity.—At the request of many friends, the author was induced to revise the work, and add many important essays on deeply interesting subjects; in which the author has thrown much light on subjects that have been regarded as very difficult to be understood. 'Mr. Dods,' says a distinguished correspondent, 'has done much to throw light on the sacred volume. Many of his expositions have struck us with great force. He has given us great light. Difficult subjects are explained clearly by him.'

Price of the work 75 cents. Wholesale dealers will find it to their interest to call at 37 Cornhill.

PAIGE'S QUESTIONS. FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'QUESTIONS ON SELECT PORTIONS OF THE GOSPELS; designed for the use of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. By LUCIUS R. PAIGE, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Cambridge.' Price 2 cents single; $2,50 per dozen.

LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

BOOK OF PROMISES. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. BULFINCH EMMONS. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

DAVIS' IMPROVED OXYGENATED SOAP. The Oxygenated Soap, as a Cosmetic and for Shaving, stands unrivalled. It is a composition in which pure Caustic Alkali is exhibited in its mildest form, united with a large portion of oxygen—a substance so well known to be essential to life, that it has obtained, in its gaseous forms, the name of Vital Air.

In external applications, especially when aided by the cleansing virtues of soap, it has a beneficial effect. It renders the skin soft and pliable, and preserves it in a healthy state; it gives it the bloom and purity of youth, and by its invigorating and strengthening qualities, enables the skin to perform its functions, known to be so necessary in the economy of nature for the preservation of beauty and the enjoyment of health. It removes all cutaneous eruptions, and is recommended as the best remedy for roughness of hands, Freckles, &c. that has ever been offered to the public.

This celebrated article is for sale in any quantity, on reasonable terms, at Messrs. THOMAS WHITTEMORE, 37 Cornhill; W. C. Stimson & Co's. south side Faneuil Hall; J. P. Hall Union street; Brewster, Stephen & Cushing, Washington st; A. G. Peck & Co, cor. of Kilby and Water st; Lowe & Read, Merchants-Row; J. Kidder, Court st; Lewis & Co Trott & Bigelow, State street. The End of the World.

A SERMON,

Delivered in Cambridgeport, on Sunday, Jan. 26, 1840.

BY THE EDITOR.

It will be remembered by a large part of this numerous congregation, that I gave public notice a few days since, that, at this time, I would deliver a discourse on the meaning of the scriptural expression, the 'END OF THE WORLD.' It may be thought strange by some, that I should select, as my text, the words which I have read. 'What have they to do with the end of the world?' it might be asked. 'Take heed that no man deceive you!' What connexion has this with the subject which the speaker proposed to discuss?' I reply, that it has a very direct connexion. It is an admonition which the Lord Jesus gave his apostles, at the same time when they inquired of him, 'What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?' Observe, the end of the world. That was the point on which they desired information; and the Saviour immediately replied, 'Take heed that no man deceive you.'

The same language I now address, my hearers, to you. Take heed that no man deceive you. 'Deceive us on what subject?' saith the hearer. I reply, Take heed that no man deceive you, on the very subject about which Christ was speaking; take heed that no man deceive you, in regard to the coming of Christ and the end of the world. The admonition was important then, while the event was yet future, but not far distant; it is important now, for, although the event to which the Saviour referred, has long since passed, yet there are those who misapply the language he used, and who would have us believe, that he predicted the destruction of the material universe, which they say is very shortly to come to pass. In this way they fill the hearts of many with injurious anxiety and dread. I say, therefore, my hearers, unto you, 'Take heed that no man deceive you.'

But the hearer will inquire, 'Do you think anybody wishes to deceive us?' I reply, I know not. I would fain indulge the hope, that no one has such a design. I do not desire to judge rashly. You are all aware, that it has been proclaimed, with a great deal of confidence, that the material universe is to be destroyed in the year of our Lord 1843.—Some people have, perhaps, sincerely believed this, and to them it has been a subject of the most thrilling anxiety; many others, it may be, have professed to believe it, for purposes which it is not expedient here to name. It has been publicly proclaimed in our peaceful village, by a person who is an utter stranger to almost the whole of us,* and who has availed himself of the opportunity, to speak in terms of high reproach of a portion of our fellow-citizens, who, we trust, are not less disciples of the Saviour than himself. As the multitude have always been accustomed to run greedily after any wonderful and strange thing, however improbable in itself, so it is not surprising that large numbers have attended the Lectures of the individual referred to.

But the hearer will still be disposed to ask the speaker, 'Do you not think the man is sincere?' I reply again, I do not know. A man may be in a very great error, and yet be very sincere. A man may be much deceived himself. You are in danger of being deceived by two classes of persons. First, by those who are dishonest, and who intentionally deceive the community; and, secondly, by those who are credulous, who are readily deceived themselves, and who, of course, very honestly deceive others. Now it makes no difference to which of these classes the man may belong, who has recently addressed the citizens of this village. It does not mitigate the deception at all, because the man who has deceived you is himself in an error. What advantage is it to you, if you are in error, that the individual who led you into it was as honest in the deception as yourself? Are you any the less deceived on that account? You are not. I say then unto you again, 'Take heed that no man deceive you.'

Some persons take the ground, that altho' they do not themselves believe that the material earth will be dissolved, in 1843, yet it will do no hurt for people in general to believe it; because, if the end of the world should take place at that time, people will be prepared, having believed it beforehand; and if it should not take place in the specified time, no harm will ensue from their having believed it, as they ought to be prepared at all times. But is this sound reasoning? Are you satisfied with it yourselves?

Let us try this kind of apology for deception. You tell your neighbor, that within three years his house will be burned, and that perhaps his wife and children, and it may be even himself, will be destroyed in the flames. You see that it distresses him, that it gives him many sleepless nights and anxious days. When you are asked, 'Why do you torment your poor credulous neighbor in this cruel manner?' you reply, 'O, it is best for him to be prepared; his house may be burned down; who can say it will not be? and if he believes it, he will certainly be prepared; and then if it is not burned down in that time, he suffers no injury, because he comes off so much better, than he expected to.' Would you be satisfied with such a miserable apology for deceiving and tormenting the credulous?

Suppose you should go to a happy, affectionate, confiding family of children, and make them believe that within three years their parents would die, and they would be left orphans, and be thrown upon the stinted charities of this cold world for their subsistence. If you were the father, would you not demand an explanation of the man who should thus trifle with the happiness of your family, and sport with the fears of your credulous children? Suppose he should say, 'O, it is best for your children to be prepared. You may die, and they may be left orphans within three years. If they believe that this event shall happen, they will prepare themselves, and be always ready; and then, if the event should not happen, it will not injure them to have been prepared, and they will be very agreeably disappointed in the end.' Would you be satisfied with this lame justification of the deception? No, you would not. As the guardian of the best interests of your children, you would say to the deceiver (whether he were himself deceived, or whether he were intentionally deceiving others), 'Sir, you must not destroy the peace of my house, by these tales of horror. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.'

But suppose it should be true, that interested sectarian leaders should tell these tales of terror merely to raise an excitement, of which they might avail themselves for their own sectarian advantage, and to spread their own peculiar views of religion, what would you say to them? Would you say, 'it is best to believe,'—'it is best to be prepared.' No, you would say, away with the deception, away with the deceivers.

Of one thing I am certain, and of this all of you must be equally certain, viz. there can be no case in which ERROR is better than TRUTH. Truth is the agent of God for the conversion of men; and nothing can compare with it. Error is always bad, always injurious, always deceptive; but truth is lovely, consistent, beneficial, and always leads the confiding soul aright. Take heed, therefore, that no man deceive you.

We proceed now to a more particular examination of the scriptural phrase, 'THE END OF THE WORLD.'

The questions put to our Lord by his disciples were these: 'When shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?' Matt. xxiv. 3. To what things did they refer by these things. Let us go back to the closing part of the 23d chapter of Matthew, and we shall get a very satisfactory answer to our questions. The 23d chapter of Matthew contains the striking maledictions which the Saviour uttered against the Scribes and Pharisees, the ruling powers of the Jewish church. He was then in the temple. He concluded his addresses to the Jews by saying: 'Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes; and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar.'—Matt. xxiii. 34, 35. He then gave the Pharisees the assurance which he afterwards gave his disciples [Matt. xxiv. 34], that these woes should surely come on that generation.—'Verily, I say unto you, all these things shall come on this generation.' v. 36. He then uttered that touching apostrophe to Jerusalem, which we hear so frequently quoted: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.' ver. 37—39. Thus we see, although the Jews did not then believe on him, yet the time shall come, as the Saviour declares, when they shall say, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.' v. 39. Jesus then left the temple, and of course he had concluded his discourse to the Pharisees. xxiv. 1. His disciples then came to him to show him the buildings of the temple; for they had inferred from the terrible malediction he had pronounced upon the Pharisees, that the city was to be destroyed. They seemed to think it almost impossible that the temple could be brought down. Somes of the stones of which it was built were of immense size, and others were very costly and beautiful. But the Saviour teaches them, that neither the labor nor expense which had been bestowed upon the temple could save it. 'Verily I say unto you, there shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down.' ver. 2. This seems to have filled the disciples with astonishment, and to have created a very strong desire in them to know when these remarkable events would transpire. They therefore came to Jesus privately, as he sat upon the Mount of Olives (from which they had a full view of the city), and said, 'When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?' ver. 3. When shall these woes come, which you have denounced upon the Jews? Such is evidently the intent of the question.

Now look at another thing. It seems perfectly evident, that the questions of the disciples had reference to events that were to take place at the same time. Those things of which they inquired, viz. the dreadful judgments which Christ had denounced upon the nation, were to transpire at the same time with Christ's coming, and the end of the aion, world, or age. Some suppose that the disciples inquired, 1st, about the destruction of the Jews,—'when shall these things be?' and 2d, about the destruction of the material universe,—'what shall be the sign of thy coming, and the end of the world?' But this supposition is clearly shown to be wrong in two ways; 1st, the other evangelists [viz. Mark and Luke] in giving the questions, put them in such a form as to show, most evidently, that the disciples referred in their questions to things that were simultaneous. See Mark xiii. 4, and Luke xxi. 27; and 2d, the Saviour, in answering these questions, shows that he supposed that the events were to take place at the same time. The judgments of the Jews, the coming of the Son of man, and the end of the aion, age, or world, were all to transpire at the same time. But once more, in regard to the questions. The disciples had evidently two objects in view, for they put two distinct questions, 1st, as to the time, and 2d, as to the signs. 'WHEN shall these things be? and what shall be THE SIGN of thy coming, and of the end of the aion,' world, or age. All these things were to happen at the same time; and the disciples wished to know when they should come, and by what signs they should be certain of their approach.

But it may be asked, what should have led the disciples to connect the coming of Christ with the destruction of Jerusalem, since Jesus had not connected the two events. This question is founded on a mistake; for Jesus had repeatedly connected his coming with the destruction of the Jews. See Matt. xvi. 27, 28. 'For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works.' Here the coming of Christ is closely connected with the impending judgment; and that that judgment was then near at hand, and was to happen during the lifetime of some who heard the Saviour speak, is evident from ver. 28: 'Verily, I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' Here remark first, the coming of Christ is inseparably connected with the retribution that was coming upon the Jews; and 2d, we are expressly told, it should happen during the natural lives of some of those persons to whom the Saviour then spoke. See also Mark viii. 38; ix. 1; Luke ix. 26, 27, and John xxi. 22, 23. Let it be remembered, then, that the judgments of God upon the Jews, the coming of the Son of man, and the end of the aion, world, or age, were events that would all transpire at the same time.

We shall proceed then to notice the Saviour's answer to the two questions of his disciples, viz. in regard to the time, and the signs; and we shall see that he, throughout the whole answer, shows that his coming to take vengeance on the Jews, and the end of the aion, would surely take place in that generation, and were events for which that generation ought to watch closely.*

Jesus said, in reply to the questions of his disciples, 'Take heed that no man deceive you. For, many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many. And when ye shall hear of wars, and rumors of wars,† see that ye be not troubled; for all these things must come to pass, but THE END is not yet.' What end? Answer: the end of the aion, or Jewish world, or age. Let the reader peruse carefully from the 7th to the 13th verse, and then he will find the Saviour says again, 'But he that shall endure unto THE END, the same shall be saved.' Here we inquire again, what end? And the same answer must be returned; the end of the Jewish world, or age, of which the disciples spake in their questions to the Saviour.—Now, see the 14th verse: 'And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall THE END come.' What end? The end of the Jewish world, or age. Hence, it is true, that the gospel was preached in almost every part of the habitable world, before the end of the Jewish age. There certainly was a very general preaching of the gospel before that time. Paul, speaking of the success of the first preachers of the gospel, said, 'Their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.' Rom. x. 1. See also Rom i. 8. And again, in Col. i. 23, Paul says, the gospel 'was preached to every creature which is under heaven.' This very general preaching of the gospel took place before the destruction of the Jews; and fully verified the prophetic declaration of the Saviour. Let us proceed with the account in the 24th of Matthew: 'When ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, [see Dan. xii. 11,] stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth let him understand,) then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains; let him which is on the house-top not come down to take any thing out of his house; neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. And wo unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day: for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor never shall be.' vs. 15—21. All these warnings clearly have reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, which took place shortly after Christ spake, and not to any event, which is now future. They refer evidently to some calamity, that then was about to fall on Judea. 'Let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains.' Why was that province particularly referred to, if Christ was teaching the destruction of the whole world? and why flee to the mountains? Would the disciples be any safer in the mountains, than in the city, if the whole world was to be destroyed? The man in the field was directed not to return to the city of Jerusalem,—Would he be any safer in the field, than in Jerusalem, if the destruction of the whole world was referred to? Females, in the situation referred to by the Saviour, suffered greatly during the seige of Jerusalem; but if the whole world were to be burned up, we know not why they would suffer more than others. The disciples were to pray that their flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day,—an admonition we can clearly understand, as applicable to the destruction of Jerusalem, as their flight in the winter would be much more difficult, and a Sabbath day's journey being a short distance, they could not reach a place of safety, without violating the holy day. And verse 21, surely, has exclusive reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, at which there was a TRIBULATION greater than any that ever had been, or shall be. See these words: 'For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world TO THIS TIME, NO, NOR EVER SHALL BE.' A clear proof, that the Saviour was not speaking of things to take place at the end of time, because he takes a prospective as well as a retrospective glance. The tribulation was greater than any that ever HAD BEEN, or SHOULD BE.* If it be said, this has reference to the end of time, then let the clergy be careful not to declare a greater tribulation in eternity.—It makes the common error of future and endless wrath but the more apparent, if the words we are considering be applied to the end of time. Daniel applies the same words to the destruction of Jerusalem, xii. 1. The Saviour still continued to speak of those days of tribulation, from verse 21—29; and in ver. 28, the Roman armies are compared to eagles, on account of the strength and greediness, with which they would go to the slaughter, and because they always carried the figure of the eagle on their standards.

In verse 29, Jesus says, 'IMMEDIATELY after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken.' Here the same tribulation is referred to, mentioned in verse 21, which was greater than any that ever had been, or ever should be. Now mark: 'IMMEDIATELY after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened,' &c. Whatever this language was employed to signify, the events were to take place 'IMMEDIATELY after the tribulation' mentioned, verse 21; and that tribulation the Jews endured, during the Roman war.—What, then, took place immediately after that tribulation, to which these metaphors may be applied? I answer, the overthrow of the whole Jewish polity; and for this purpose the Son of man came. Archbishop Newcome says, ''And† SOON after the tribulation of those days, there shall be signs in the sun, which shall be darkened, and in the moon, which shall fall from heaven; and upon the land distress of nations and perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and expectation of the things which shall come upon the land; for the powers of the heavens shall be shaken.''

'The style is here very Eastern, and imports that the Jewish rulers, and their church and nation, should be involved in ruin; and that this should be effected SOON after the commencement of the troubles alluded to; or in a time, which, considering the difficulties of the undertaking, might properly be called SHORT. It is the language of prophecy, to which the Jews were accustomed. The fall of Babylon is thus foretold by Isaiah: ‡'The stars of heaven and the constellations thereof, shall not give their light: the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine.' And he speaks thus of Idumea: 'All the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree. For my sword shall be bathed in heaven; behold it shall come down on Idumea,' &c. Isa. xxxiv. 4, 5. Ezekiel thus expresses the destruction of Egypt: 'When I shall put thee out, I will cover the heavens, and make the stars thereof dark; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee.' (Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8. See also xxiv. 23.) Joel uses this language of the same event which our Lord predicts. 'I will show wonders in the heavens, and in the earth; blood and fire and pillars of smoke.—The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of Jehovah come.' And God says in Haggai: 'I will shake the heavens and the earth; and I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms; and I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen.' (Hagg. ii. 21, 22. See also Isa. li. 16; Dan. viii. 10.) Our Lord adds, that there should be straitness of calamity among those nations (Matt. xxiv. 7) which rose against each other, with inextricable necessity, every object of terror striking them, every element seeming armed against them; men nearly expiring through fearful expectation of what impended over their country: for the whole frame of the Jewish constitution, both civil and religious, should totter to its foundation.' ('Observations,' pp. 273—275.) Bishop Lowth says: The Hebrew poets, to express happiness, prosperity, the instauration and advancement of states, kingdoms and potentates, make use of images taken from the most striking parts of nature, from the heavenly bodies, from the sun, moon, and stars; which they describe as shining with increased splendor, and never setting; the moon becomes like the meridian sun, and the sun's light is augmented sevenfold (see Isa. xxx. 26); new heavens and a new earth are created, and a brighter age commences. On the contrary, the overthrow and destruction of kingdoms, is represented by opposite images; the stars are obscured, the moon withdraws her light, and the sun shines no more; the earth quakes, and the heavens tremble, and all things seem tending to their original chaos.' Note on Isaiah xiii. 10. Let it be remembered, then, that the falling and dissolution of the heavenly bodies are used by the sacred writers as emblems of the overthrow and destruction of rulers and kingdoms.

When the Jewish nation and church were overthrown, as foretold in the above strong metaphorical language, then the coming of the Son of man took place. See verse 30:—'THEN,' [that is, immediately after the tribulation of those days,] 'shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory.'—Hence we see, that the coming of Christ took place at the same time with the destruction of Jerusalem; hence we shall perceive, if we continue to follow the train of the Saviour's prophecy, that he still continues to speak of the destruction of Jerusalem. But of this in another place.

What was meant by the coming of Christ? Not a personal appearance of the Saviour, for no such appearance took place at that time. It was a coming of Christ in the glory of his Father; a coming in the display of divine power, that was then seen; a coming in the judgments that were then sent upon the earth. Any remarkable interposition of divine Providence, or display of divine power, in the punishment of any people, was called by the Old Testament writers, the coming of God. The New Testament writers borrow the same phraseology; and hence, they call the manifestation of divine power and the visitations of the judgments of God upon the Jews, the coming of the Son of man. It was language perfectly well understood. Archbishop Newcome says: 'I think that any signal interposition in behalf of his church, or in the destruction of his enemies, may be metaphorically called, a COMING and a parousia of Christ.'* We see, then, that the coming of Christ, his SECOND coming, certainly took place, at the time of the destruction of the Jewish state.

Hence our Saviour proceeds to say concerning his coming, at the destruction of the Jews, in order to show the certainty of its near approach, 'Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors.' And then, precisely as he had told the Pharisees, Matt. xxiii. 36, so he tells his disciples, XXIV. 34, 'Verily, I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled.' Now, what can be plainer than this? That generation, then on the earth, should not pass away, until the coming of Christ took place, and all the things of which he had prophesied in the 24th of Matthew, were fulfilled. Mr. Miller was obliged to avoid the true and natural sense of these words, for they stood forth as a direct contradiction of his theory. He, therefore, states, that Christ was not speaking of the generation then on the earth, but of the generation of his elect, believers; and he meant, that they should never pass away from the earth, until his coming took place. But this cannot be the meaning of the passage. Jesus meant, the generation on the earth during his personal ministry; and he intended to declare, that that generation should still survive until his coming took place. How can anybody deny this? Did he not say, in another place, 'There be some standing here, that shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom,' Matt. xvi. 28. How will Mr. Miller get along with this? Some standing here! To whom was he then talking, who should not die before the coming of Christ took place? Here there can be no mistake, or evasion. He was speaking of the generation then living, and his coming took place before they died. Again; in Matt. x. 23, he tells his disciples, (to comfort them in their persecutions,) 'When they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I say unto you, ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come.' What will Mr. Miller do with this? The disciples, fleeing before their bloodly persecutors from city to city, should not have gone over the cities of Israel, before the coming of the Son of man took place.—Here it is plain as the sun at noonday, that the second coming of Christ took place many years ago, at the destruction of Jerusalem.—This overthrows completely Mr. Miller's whole theory, for he contends that the second coming of Christ is yet future. It is hardly necessary to confirm any thing by additional testimony, which is already made so plain;—but we can show, that Commentators of the very highest character agree with us in this view of the matter. Dr. Whitby says,—'These words, this age or generation shall not pass away, afford a full demonstration, that all which Christ had mentioned hitherto, was to be accomplished, not at the time of the conversion of the Jews, or at the final day of judgment, but in that very age, or whilst some of that generation of men lived; for the phrase never bears any other sense in the New Testament, than the men of this age.' (Paraphrase and Annot. on Matt. xxiv. 34.) Hear what Lightfoot says on this matter.—After quoting the words, This generation shall not pass, &c., he adds, 'Hence it appears plain enough, that the foregoing verses are not to be understood of the last judgment, but as we have said, of the destruction of Jerusalem. There were some among the disciples, (particularly John,) who lived to see these things come to pass. With Matt. xvi. 28, compare John xxi. 22. And there were some Rabbins alive at the time when Christ spoke these things, that lived till the city was destroyed, viz. Rabbau Simeon, who perished with the city; R. Jochanan ben Zaccai, who outlived it; R. Zadock, R. Ismael, and others.' (See 'Exercitations' upon Matt. xxiv. 34.) With this, Hammond, and all the best Commentators, we have seen, agree. It cannot, therefore, be doubted, that the second coming of Christ took place in that age; before the generation wholly passed away, which was on the earth at the time of our Saviour's personal ministry. It is impossible to prove any thing more clearly than we have proved this fact, from the sacred Scriptures.

Although the Saviour knew, that his coming would take place in that generation, still the precise day and hour he did not know;—and hence he exhorted his followers to constant watchfulness. See verses 36—39. At verse 41, he says, 'Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left.' Here is a clear reference to ancient Jewish customs. The women, in the days of Christ, were obliged to perform many menial services, and among others, that of grinding grain. They had little portable mills, which were turned by two persons.—But we have no such things now. The improved state of society has relieved female hands of this service, and men employ the wind, the water, the fire, for such purposes. Mr. Miller regards the introduction of steam into general use, as a proof, that the end of the world is near; and yet he applies the coming of Christ to this age in which we live; whereas, that coming took place at a time when women were obliged to do the grinding of the grain. There can be no question, that the coming of Christ mentioned in Matt. xxiv. took place at the destruction of Jerusalem.—As Mr. Miller's theory assigns that coming of Christ to the year 1843, it is evident, that his theory is utterly exploded.

But let us advert to the phrase, END OF THE WORLD, as it is used in some other parts of the Bible; and see, if its use there will agree with the sense which we have seen it evidently should bear in Matt. xxiv. Turn to Matt. xiii. 39—42: 'The harvest is the END OF THE WORLD, and the reapers are the angels. As, therefore, the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of the world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.' And verses 49, 50, as follows: 'So shall it be at THE END OF THE WORLD; the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.' Here we have a furnace of fire! and a furnace of fire at the end of the world! Now, the objector will say, this end of the world could not have happened at the destruction of Jerusalem, because the wicked were to be cast into a furnace of fire, at the end of the world, and nobody was cast into a furnace of fire at the destruction of Jerusalem. We agree with the objector, that the end of the world, and the casting of the wicked into a furnace of fire, were simultaneous events;—they both transpired at the same time; and the one subject will assist in explaining the other. Where, then, was this FURNACE OF FIRE? We shall appeal to the Scriptures for an answer to this question; and we think the reader will confess, that what is said in the Bible in regard to the FURNACE OF FIRE, will confirm the opinion we have expressed, in regard to the end of the Jewish aion, world, or age.

First, we will show, that it was the custom of the sacred writers to speak of any place of affliction and suffering as a FURNACE. Thus Egypt was called a FURNACE, because the Jews suffered great afflictions there. 'But the Lord hath taken you, and brought you forth out of the IRON FURNACE, even out of Egypt.' Deut. iv. 28. Let the reader also consult 1 Kings viii. 51; Isa. xlviii. 10; Jer. xi. 4. So the great afflictions and tribulations suffered by the Jews in Jerusalem, caused the sacred writers to represent that city as a furnace; and it was a common practice to represent the divine judgments under the figure of fire, so the city of Jerusalem, at the time of its destruction, at the end of the world, and the coming of Christ, was called a furnace of FIRE. We beg the reader's attention to a few passages of Scripture. We rely solely upon the testimony of God's word; we know nothing about this subject, except so far as we gain instruction from the sacred oracles. We read as follows: 'Through the wrath of the Lord of Hosts is the land darkened, and the people shall be as the fuel of the FIRE.' Isa. ix. 10. Again: 'But if ye will not hearken unto me, to hallow the Sabbath day, and not bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched.' Jer. xvii. 27. Here it is evident beyond a doubt, that FIRE is employed as a metaphor to represent the divine judgments which God threatened to send upon the house of Israel for their sins.

But is Jerusalem ever called a furnace of fire? See Isa. xxxi. 9: 'The Lord's fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem.' Here a furnace of fire is the metaphor; and we are told that it signifies the city of Jerusalem.—See also Ezek. xxii. 18—22, where it is expressly asserted that Jerusalem is a furnace, and that the people were blown upon with fire, and melted there. 'And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Son of man, the house of Israel is to me become dross: all they are brass, and tin, and iron, and lead in the midst of the furnace: they are even the dross of silver. Therefore, thus saith the Lord God, because ye are all become dross, behold therefore I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem, as they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it to melt it; so will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury, and I will leave you there and MELT YOU [that is, in the midst of Jerusalem]. Yea, I will gather you, and blow upon you in the fire of my wrath, and ye shall be melted in the midst thereof (that is, in the midst of Jerusalem]. As silver is melted in the midst of the furnace, so shall ye be melted in the midst thereof; and ye shall know that I, the Lord have poured out my fury upon you.'—Does not this passage assist us remarkably in coming to a correct conclusion concerning the

*Miller, the author of the absurd theory of the end of the material universe in 1843, was invited into Cambridgeport by certain persons connected with the Baptist Society. The Baptist Meeting-House was opened to him, and the Baptist clergyman took a seat with him regularly in the pulpit, and took part in the services.—So far as we know, no other clergyman in the town of Cambridge gave the slightest countenance to Miller's vagaries.

*We are sometimes told, that it avails nothing to show that Matt. xxiv refers to the destruction of Jerusalem; and that in order to overthrow Miller's theory, we must show that his calculations, in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, are erroneous. To this we reply, that it is necessary, of course, to show that his calculations on that prophet are erroneous, and this has been completely done, by Mr. Skinner, in his third Lecture. But still, it should be remembered, that one of Mr. Miller's principal positions is, that the coming of Christ, mentioned in Matt. xxiv, is yet future; and that the end of the aion, age or world, there mentioned, is the end of the material universe, which, in his opinion, is to transpire in the year 1843. This is, in fact, THE PRINCIPAL position he has taken. See his Lectures, ed. of 1840, pp. 13—16. He maintains, that the second coming of Christ is yet future, and not to transpire until the year 1843. Now, if we show, that the second coming of Christ took place at the destruction of Jerusalem, we overturn his whole theory. He allows that it is the second coming of Christ which is mentioned in Matt. xxiv. If then, we show, that the coming of Christ, mentioned in that chapter, took place at the destruction of Jerusalem, we overturn his whole theory. For nothing can be more certain than this, that if the second coming of Christ took place at the destruction of Jerusalem, nearly 1800 years ago, it is not still future, and therefore WILL NOT HAPPEN IN 1843. And, as he allows, that the end of the aion, world or age, mentioned in Matt. xxiv, took place at the second coming of Christ, then, if we prove that the end of the aion, world or age, took place at the destruction of Jerusalem, we do fully and utterly explode his system. That this is done in these pages, no man of sense, after a candid reading, can for a moment doubt.

†Mr. Miller judges this to be a proof, that the end of the world or age, did not transpire at the destruction of Jerusalem, because there were no wars or rumors of wars after the death of Christ before the destruction of that city. He says, Jerusalem was destroyed in the first war of any note after Christ's prophecy. We reply, that his assertion is notoriously untrue. There were continual wars and rumors of wars for several years previous to the overthrow of the Jews. Let any man consult the commonest authorities on this subject, and he will be satisfied of the truth of our declaration beyond a doubt. See Newcome's 'Observations,' Charlestown, 1810, pp. 212—238. The whole space here referred to in that valuable work, was taken up by its author in giving an account of the wars and rumors of wars, that took place between Christ's prophecy and the destruction of Jerusalem. See also my 'Illustrations of the Parables,' pp. 328—350, where several other authorities are referred to. So much for Mr. Miller's ignorance of history.

*Mr. Miller must be careful, in preaching the end of the world, that he does not threaten a greater tribulation, than that which befell the Jews at the destruction of their city, and thus contradict the declaration of Christ.

†Matt. xxiv. 29.—Mark's expression is, 'but IN THOSE DAYS, after that tribulation,' &c. Hence it follows, that the words cannot be applied to the day of judgment in the future state.

‡Isa. xiii. 10, where see Bishop Lowth.

*Although this may at first strike the mind of the reader as a strange figure, yet it is one frequently used at the present time. How common it is to say of a great bereavement, which a family has been called to meet, it is a very afflicting visitation of Providence,—God has visited them with afflictions:—He has laid his hand heavily upon them. See Isa. xxiii. 17; xxvi. 21; Jer. v. 9; vi. 15; xxvii. 22; xxix. 10; Micah i. 3; Acts xv. 14; 1 Peter ii. 12.

subject of the furnace of fire? The furnace of fire was the city of Jerusalem, at the time of its destruction. The whole nation of the Jews was gathered there at that time, and melted as the metal is melted in the midst of the furnace. At least, so saith the prophet Ezekiel, or God through that prophet.

As we have already seen, we read in the thirteenth chapter of Matthew, that the END OF THE WORLD, or age, and the casting of the wicked into the furnace of fire, are simultaneous events. 'So shall it be at the end of the world,' said the Saviour. 'The angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire.' This was to happen at the end of the world, or age; and as it did happen at the destruction of Jerusalem, the proof is conclusive, that the end of the world or age, and the coming of Christ, took place at that time.

But perhaps the candid inquirer will ask, why the period at which Jerusalem was destroyed was called the end of the world? We answer, the Jews were accustomed to divide time into two great eras, viz. the age under the law, and the age under the gospel. The Jewish age or world closed when the city and nation were destroyed; at which time the gospel age or world began. The ministry of Christ took place towards the end of the first age; hence we read, 'Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin, by the sacrifice of himself.' He appeared near the close of the Jewish world, or age; and his second coming was precisely at the close of that age. This fact, which we have here disclosed, explains many passages of Scripture, in which we read of the last times, last days, &c., meaning the last days of the Jewish age, or world. So John says, 'Little children, IT IS THE LAST TIME: and as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many Antichrists, whereby WE KNOW THAT IS THE LAST TIME.' 1 John ii. 18. It is indisputable that John, the beloved disciple, lived in the last times. Paul says, 'God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath, in these last days, spoken unto us by his Son.' Heb. i. 1, 2. The second coming of Christ took place at the same time. Indeed, some of the Christians, remembering what Christ had said, became impatient for his coming, and thought he delayed it. St. James addresses such, when he says, 'Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.' Jas. v. 7, 8. Here the Christians are addressed precisely as though the coming of Christ was at hand, and they expected to see it, and had grown impatient in waiting for it. Did James tell them they were in great error, for that the second coming of Christ would not take place for almost eighteen hundred years? No; he said, 'the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.' This must have meant his second coming, for his first coming took place before that time. Here, then, we have the plainest proof,—proof that no man can put aside,—that the second coming of Christ took place nearly eighteen hundred years ago.—Now as Mr. Miller pretends, that the second coming of Christ is to happen in A. D. 1843, we have fully, completely, and utterly exploded his system; and that is what we proposed to do.

The Trumpet and Magazine.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 4, 1843.

A Universalist Converted.

We find the following article in the columns of the last week's 'Puritan,' the illustrious journal conducted by Rev. Parsons Cooke & Co.,—the same Rev. divine who went into a discussion with the editor of the 'Trumpet,' and who backed out for want of argument before the number of letters which he had pledged himself to afford were furnished. As we are desirous that our readers should see the nature of the arguments with which our Partialist friends are satisfied, we give the article entire:

'I HAVE THROWN IT AWAY.'—Mr. H. was wasting away with consumption, when the writer called to see him. How do you feel, sir, respecting death? 'I think it will be well with me; I am a Universalist. It is now more than twenty years since I adopted this belief, I should like to have you explain to me some texts.' Well, I replied, I shall be happy to hear them. They were read by the sick man, and I gave what I supposed to be the correct interpretation. We conversed together freely, but kindly. On taking my leave, I remarked to him that I hoped he would examine well the foundation on which he was resting, and left with him a tract adapted to his condition. A week passed, and I called again. How do you feel now, Mr. H.? 'Very differently. I've thrown away Universalism, and am determined to seek something more substantial.' My visits were repeated from time to time, and often did he allude with contempt to that system of belief, while tears of penitence flowed from his eyes: 'I've thrown away that good-for-nothing' —— but in vain did he seek to find expressions to convey his utter abhorrence of the delusion, which had well-nigh ruined him forever. This man confessed that, though he had been a Universalist for more than twenty years, he never felt satisfied. There was, he said, always a hollow place. It is hoped that he not only abandoned a false belief, but embraced the doctrines of the cross. T. Y.

This is the kind of chaff with which the Partialists catch unwary birds—such are the traps with which they catch converts. Let us inquire,

1st. What proof is there that this story is true? None at all. We have good reason to believe, that our Partialist friends often feign stories that have no foundation in fact. They feel themselves justified in doing it, because, as they say, they do it to save souls. How are we to know, then, what stories are true, and what are false? We must judge from the reasonableness and probability of the account. Then look at the story before us. Does it bear a single mark of truth? What was the Universalist's name?—Where did he reside? When did these alleged facts transpire? We are permitted to know none of those things—every possible circumstance that would lead to a detection, if it be a falsehood, is kept from sight. Who was the writer of the story? Why did he not give his name? Was he afraid of being called on for the name of his convert?

But surmounting all these obstacles, and supposing the story to be true, what does it amount to? Should it constrain any Universalist to renounce his opinions? Is there a single scriptural argument in it? Does it contain an argument from any source whatsoever? Not at all. But there is evidence to show that the convert was not changed by the reading of the word of God. When he called the clergyman to converse with him, did the clergyman say to him,—'Read the Bible,—search the Scriptures,—govern your faith by the word of God?' O no; but, forgetting the Bible altogether, he put into his hands an Orthodoz tract—a little futile publication, entirely antipodal (we have no doubt,) to the truths revealed in the good Book. Thus we see this convert was not made by reading the word of God. His faith was not founded in the wisdom of God, but in the wisdom of man. Now is it our duty to follow such an example? Shall all Universalists turn to reading Partialist tracts?

But again, the above account represents the convert to be destitute of good sense. He says, while he professed to believe in Universalism he was never happy. Did he really believe it? or did he profess to believe while he had no faith in it? If the former, he must have been happy; and if the latter, all his uneasiness is easily accounted for. In the latter alternative, he was never a Universalist; but a mere Partialist hypocrite, pretending to believe what he did not,—like the jackdaw, that arrayed himself in peacock's feathers, and sought to get into better company than he had been accustomed to. But the convert says that all the while he professed Universalism, he always felt a hollow place.—Yes, we have no doubt of it; and we are quite sure that hollow place was just under his hat. And having come to such a conclusion, we shall leave the 'Puritan' to enjoy its convert, and as many more of the same kind as it can obtain. We are perfectly willing to do all in our power to bring men to the knowledge of the truth; but argument cannot reach such men as the editors of the Puritan, and the convert whom they have gained.

Meetings on Capital Punishment.

The friends of the abolition of capital punishment have just reason to be pleased at the very rapid prevalence of just views on this subject in community. The Message of Gov. Morton, an extract from which we gave last week, is but a reiteration of the sentiment of a majority of the citizens of the old Bay State.

A meeting to take this subject into consideration was holden at the Meeting-House of the Second Universalist Society in School Street, on Wednesday of last week. The following named gentlemen were chosen as officers:—Hon. Robert Rantoul, of Beverly, President; Dea. Jas. Dennison and Nahum Capen, Esq., of Boston, Vice Presidents; Rev. John G. Adams, of Malden, and Rev. F. F. Thayer, of Gloucester, Secretaries;—Sam'l E. Cones, Esq. of Portsmouth, N. H. Rev. Messrs. S. Cobb, of Boston, E. G. Brooks, of East Cambridge, E. H. Chapin, of Charlestown, and Hon. F. B. Fay, of Chelsea, Business Committee.

After prayer by Rev. Mr. Chapin, of Charlestown, the meeting proceeded to the consideration of several very important resolutions. We have not room for sketches of the debates; but the following are the resolutions:

Resolved, That the efficacy of criminal law depends less upon the severity of punishment than the certainty of infliction.

Resolved, That capital punishment by cheapening human life, and training the feelings of the heart to the infliction of violent death on a fellow being, fosters the very disposition which acts in the commission of capital crime, and thus promotes the evils which it is designed to prevent.

Resolved, That the excessive severity of the law operates to the total impunity of a great proportion of offenders by deterring humane persons from prosecuting, and by holding out a temptation to Jurors to disregard their oath rather than be accessary to Judicial murder.

Resolved, That one great and important objection to capital punishment is the chance of its infliction upon those who are innocent, and who by the imperfection of human tribunals, and an unfortunate combination of circumstances, may be condemned.

A meeting was holden on Friday evening in the Hall of the House of Representatives. Mr. White, of Taunton, was called to the Chair, and Mr. Prince, of Essex, (both members of the House) was elected Secretary. The meeting was addressed by several individuals, who spoke with great power and effect on this interesting topic. Among others who defended the entire abolition of capital punishment, we may mention the Hon. Isaac H. Wright, of the Senate, Rev. Mr. Chapin of Charlestown, Nahum Capen, Esq. of this city, George Bradburn, Esq. of Nantucket, Mr. Peirce, formerly teacher of the Normal School at Lexington, and others.

After a very interesting and profitable discussion, the meeting was adjourned to be holden in the same place on the following Wednesday.—There is not a more appropriate place in the city for a discussion of this important matter than the Hall of the House of Representatives. It is not only a convenient Hall in a central location, but many members of the Legislature listen to the arguments here who might not hear them if the meetings were holden in another place.

We have but little doubt, that some very essential modification of the laws in regard to capital punishment will be made at the present session of the Legislature.

Insanity in Massachusetts.

We have received a Memorial in behalf of the insane, from the pen of Miss M. L. Dix, No. 85 Mount Vernon Street, Boston, addressed to the Legislature of Massachusetts. This lady has taken great pains to visit the insane, in the prisons, houses of Correction and Alms-houses, thro'out the State. She is moved with a strong benevolence, equalling almost that of John Howard, or that of Mrs. Fry, of London. She asks no praise for her exertions,—she wishes to be forgotten in some great public sympathy for the insane. No one who reads the Memorial can doubt, that the insane suffer much in the various towns. It is true, that our Lunatic Hospital at Worcester, is a fine Institution,—an honor to the State; but it does not more than half supply the public necessities. There should be a suitable retreat for insane paupers in each County, under the charge of some judicious, humane person, that these poor creatures may no longer suffer in prisons, or under the charge of inexperienced persons in the poor-houses of the towns. Insanity is increasing in this State. Intemperance, it is true, does not supply so many subjects as formerly; but Millerism and the doctrine of endless misery, more than make up the compliment. O how many poor creatures have been deprived of their reason, through the influence of false theology. Our fair authoress speaks of one ruined being in Newburyport, confined in a dungeon, whose mind runs on hell, and the wrath of God—poor thing, he has had his head turned by the force of human creeds. While she was present, he exclaimed, 'Why am I consigned to hell? dark—dark—I used to pray, I used to read my Bible—I have done no crime in my heart. I had friends; why have all forsaken me? My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?'

Dr. Watts doubted Endless Misery.

Dr. Watts; his high credit; doubted endless misery; extracts from his 'World to Come'; examination, &c. &c. &c.

There is no English divine whose memory is cherished through England and America with more affection than that of Dr. Isaac Watts. He was a sweet poet. His psalms and hymns yet hold as high a place in the church as they ever did; they form an essential part of divine worship; nor is there any prospect that they will be wholly superseded at present, if ever, by the labors of any other man.

But there are great blemishes in Watts' hymns. They were written, many of them, in the early part of his life, before he had reflected on some subjects so fully as he did in subsequent years.—We have no doubt, had Watts written his Psalms and Hymns during the last five years of his life, they would have been free from many blemishes which now appear. We refer, among others, to such passages as these.

'On wings of vengeance flies our God,
To pay the long arrears of blood.'

* * * * * *

'What! to be banish'd from my life,
And yet forbid to die!
To linger in eternal pain,
Yet death forever fly.'

* * * * * *

'They shall be taken from my sight,
Bound fast in iron chains,
And headlong pleng'd into the lake
Where fire and darkness reigns.'

* * * * * *

'Far in the deep where darkness dwells,
That land of horror and despair,
Justice has built a dismal hell,
And laid her stores of vengeance there.
Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks and fiery coals
And darts t'inflict immoral pains,
Dipp'd in the blood of damned souls.'

Let the above suffice. It seems, at times, that Watts' genius luxuriated in the terrors of hell.—No man could set them forth with more power. And at times he seemed desirous to get sinners into endless fire, rather than have them converted.

'May I with these forever dwell,
Who here were my delight,
While sinners banish'd down to hell,
No more offend my sight.'

Notwithstanding this apparent malevolence, yet when Watts was on a theme of mercy and love, his strains were inimitable. None can excel him.

But at the time he wrote his book, entitled the 'World to Come,' his mind had undergone an essential change. The subject is brought up to our mind at the present time, by the recent republication of that work in Dayton, Ohio, a notice of which we have seen in the 'Star in the West,' from the columns of which the following extracts are made. We give the American editor praise for publishing the work without expunging the passages referred to. He had more independence than the Andover publishers, for they do not hesitate to cut and clip to answer their own purposes, and that too sometimes without giving the American public the slightest notice of what they have done.

We maintain that when Watts wrote his 'World to Come,' he had reflected more fully on the subject of endless misery; and although he had not been brought fully to disbelieve that doctrine, yet he had doubts of the strict eternity of misery—he could not believe it would continue as long as God exists. Here what he says:—

'The last discourses of this book, especially the 'eternity of the punishments of hell,' have been in later and former years a matter of dispute; and were I to pursue my inquiries into this doctrine, only by the aids of the light of nature and reason, I fear my natural tenderness might warp me aside from the rules and demands of strict justice, and the wise and holy government of the great God. But as I confine myself almost entirely to the revelation of Scripture in all my searches into the things of revealed religion and Christianity, I am constrained to forget or to lay aside that softness and tenderness of animal nature which might lead me astray, and to follow the unerring dictates of the word of God.'

'I must confess here, if it were possible for the great and blessed God any other way to vindicate his own eternal and unchangeable hatred of sin, the inflexible justice of his government, the wisdom of his severe threatenings, and the veracity of his predictions; if it were also possible for him, without this terrible execution, to vindicate the veracity, sincerity, and wisdom of the Prophets and Apostles, and Jesus Christ his Son, the greatest and chiefest of his divine messengers; and then, if the blessed God should at any time, in a consistence with his glorious and incomprehensible perfections, release those wretched creatures from their acute pains and long imprisonment in hell, either with a design of the utter destruction of their beings by annihilation, or to put them into some unknown world, upon a new foot of trial, I think I ought cheerfully and joyfully to accept this appointment of God, for the good of millions of my fellow-creatures, and add my joys and praises to all the songs and triumphs of the heavenly world in the day of such a divine and glorious release of these prisoners.

But I feel myself under a necessity of confessing, that I am utterly unable to solve these difficulties according to the discoveries of the New Testament, which must be my constant rule of faith, and hope, and expectation, with regard to myself and others. I have read the strongest and best writers on the other side, yet after all my studies I have not been able to find any way how these difficulties may be removed, and how the divine perfections, and the conduct of God in his word, may be fairly vindicated without the establishment of this doctrine, as awful and formidable as it is.

'The ways, indeed, of the great God and his 'thoughts are above our thoughts and our ways, as the heavens are above the earth'; yet I must rest and acquiesce where our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father's chief Minister, both of his wrath and of his love, has left me in the divine revelations of Scripture; and I am constrained therefore to leave these unhappy creatures under the chains of everlasting darkness, into which they have cast themselves by their wilful iniquities, till the blessed God shall see fit to release them.

This would be indeed such a new, such an astonishing and universal jubilee, both for devils and wicked men, as must fill heaven, earth, and hell, with hallelujahs and joy. In the mean time it is my ardent wish, that this awful sense of the terrors of the Almighty, and his everlasting anger, which the word of the great God denounces, may awaken some souls timely to bethink themselves of the dreadful danger into which they are running, before these terrors seize them at death, and begin to be executed upon them without release and without hope.'

Here Dr. Watts confessed that the doctrine of endless misery was opposed to the 'softness and tenderness' of his nature. And who gave him that 'softness and tenderness?' It was the great God. And did God give his creatures a tenderness he does not possess himself? No. And could God do that which is opposed to his own tenderness? No. Then the doctrine of endless misery must be false.

Dr. Watts did look forward with some hope to the termination of the torments of the wicked.—To him endless torture was 'awful and formidable.' He thought he was unable to disprove it from the Scriptures, but his heart found it very difficult to acquiesc. But the result of all his reasoning concerning the wicked was this: 'I am constrained to leave these unhappy creatures under the chains of everlasting darkness, into which they have cast themselves by their wilful iniquities, 'till the blessed God shall see fit to release them.' 'This,' he says, 'would indeed be such a new, such an astonishing and universal jubilee, both for devils and wicked men, as must fill heaven, earth and hell, with hallelujahs and joy.'—Did he not then hope for it?

Hear him again:

'I grant that the eternity of God himself, before this world began, or after its consummation, has something in it so immense and so incomprehensible that in my most mature thoughts I do not choose to enter into those infinite abysses; nor do I think we ought usually, when we speak concerning creatures, to AFFIRM POSITIVELY, that their existence shall be equal to that of the blessed God, especially with regard to the duration of their punishment. Perhaps this sort of language may carry in it something beyond what we are called to discourse about, at least in this mortal state, and therefore such comparisons are more safely omitted.' See also Modern History of Universalism, p. 115.

It will be seen from the above, that Dr. Watts did not believe that the wicked would be punished as long as God shall exist. He did not know that men will exist at all as long as God shall exist, but especially would he not affirm, that their punishment shall continue as long.

Again he says,—

'But I would remark here still, that these ages, both of reward and punishment, which are pronounced concerning saints or sinners, do but begin in their perfection at the end of this world; and thence it follows, that they must enter far away into the eternity of God's existence yet to come. And the saints will be made happy, and the sinners will be punished, for long ages after the end of this world, and all the ages of it.

And though God, by his Spirit, has not been pleased to make this comparison expressly, nor assert our duration commensurate with his own, yet he is pleased to express the duration of the punishment of sinners in the same common language and phrases, whereby he expresses his own duration, and the happiness of the saints: and hereby he encourages us to express these punishments by the same common words in our language too, rather than venture to cut them short by a Greek or Hebrew criticism, without any divine warrant or necessity.

Now are there any sinners so void of understanding, of so daring and desperate a mind, as to venture their 'eternal all' upon such a poor criticism of words? Even upon supposition that these terms in the Greek and Hebrew might signify any long duration short of eternity: yet there is a terrible hazard in confining them to this sense, since they do not denote a proper eternity, when they describe the duration of the blessed God; and I think we may add also, the duration of the happiness of the saints.'

We think it is fully proved by the above extracts, that Dr. Watts had strong doubts on the absolutely endless existence of punishment.—Had he enjoyed the light we now enjoy, he would have been an unwavering Universalist. It was a mistake in him to suppose the sacred writers use the same terms to signify the duration of punishment, that they employ to describe the endlessness of God's existence and goverment. It is not the case. The truth is, the Jews had no proper terms by which to signify absolutely endless duration. And when they spake of the endlessness of God's nature and government, they used means to magnify and strengthen the force of words, which they never employed when they spake of sin and punishment. But this fact, Dr. Watts knew not. The flood of light which has of late been poured on this this subject, he had not seen. He was in comparitive darkness: but he could not but hope that the miseries of the wicked will come to an end.

Norwich, Conn.

A letter from a correspondent in Norwich, gives a very favorable account of the state of our cause in that place. Our readers are aware that a Universalist Church was recently erected in Norwich; since which, Br. R. O. Williams was settled as pastor. Our correspondent remarks, 'The Society is in a very prosperous condition. The pews let the first day of the present month for $175 more than they brought last year, and every slip is let in the house. At present there is an increased interest felt in our Society. We have Conference Meetings twice a week, and the brethren and sisters sing and pray together, and exhort one another to love and good works.' The Conference meetings we have no doubt have an excellent effect. Nothing has a better influence to keep a Society and Church in a state of spiritual life. Let all our Societies, even the smallest and weakest, have their Conferences, whether they have a clergyman with them, or whether they have not. The testimony from every quarter is, that the Conference meetings do great good.

Our friend at Norwich states, that the Society has had some opposition to contend with, but on the whole, it will result in good. We have no doubt such will be the effect. The labors of Br. Williams are well directed, and he is esteemed as a faithful shepherd in the service of Christ.—May God bless him and his people.

Meeting-Houses! Meeting-Houses!

In another article will be found an account of the commencement of the new Universalist Meeting-House in Worcester, Mass. Besides that, we may also name

A new Universalist Meeting-House in Saco, Me. Br. Quinby states in the 'Palladium,' that the Society in that town has purchased a lot at the corner of Main and Storer Streets, a very central place. They have commenced erecting the house, which is to be 73 by 43 feet, with large basement rooms. The house will contain 80 pews, with a handsome steeple, and the whole is designed to be finished by the middle of June. Br. Quinby says: 'What is better than all, the Society is united, zealous, attentive to the preached word, and, in short, is growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.'

Br. Drew, of the 'Banner,' states, that the Universalists of Hallowell, Me. have resolved on the immediate erection of a house of worship.—They have purchased a lot on the corner of Central and Second Streets, the best in the whole village, for which they paid $600. The Building Committee has been appointed, who intend to go forward with the work speedily. Br. D. says,—'The elegant site demands an elegant house.'

There will be a splendid Concert at the Universalist Church in Charlestown, tomorrow (Sunday) evening, for the benefit of Mr. Bartlett, the leader of the Choir. It will be a splendid affair. Br. Chapin will deliver an Address on the occasion. See advertisement.

Br. John B. Dods, formerly of Fall River, now resides in this city; all letters and communications intended for him must be directed to Boston.

Accession to the Ministry.

Valuable accession to the ministry; Hon. John Burnham, formerly a Calvinistic Baptist preacher, a convert to Universalism.

The following article was crowded from our columns last week, by a press of matter. The account given of Dr. B. is of itself so full, that nothing is needed from our pen by way of explanation. We copy from the 'Gospel Banner':

ANOTHER UNIVERSALIST MINISTER.—This whole State has long heard of, and been familiar with, the name of the Hon. John Burnham, of Maine. For the last twenty years, he has been concerned in the Government, in one capacity or another—as a Representative, a Senator, an Executive Councillor, &c.; and being an active and influential man, in whatever office he has sustained, he has acquired a popularity which has made him extensively known and beloved. The last three years of his political life, have been spent at the Executive board, as one of the Governor's Council. The duties of this office he closed the present week.

Dr. Burnham was formerly a Calvinistic Baptist preacher—greatly respected. Some years ago, he began to entertain doubts as to the truth of that doctrine, and suspended his clerical labors. The people took him up, and bore him upon their favor into various public offices. During the sessions of 1836 and 1837, he used to assist in the Baptist meetings in this place. Within the past two years, his views of Universalism have been clear and joyous. He thanks God with all his heart, for leading him to hope strongly in the salvation of all mankind; and we bless God for the same thing. Whilst attending to his duties as Executive Councillor in this place, last spring, he met in our social meetings, and there drank from the deepest fountains of God's love, till his soul became baptized with the spirit of our faith. Since that time, as often as the Governor and Council have been in session, he has not failed to be with us at every meeting, and to improve his gifts for the instruction and edification of our Church and Society. We have been grateful to him for his assistance. He feels as if he was called to speak in God's behalf, as a minister of the New Testament. At his suggestion, on Sabbath evening last, we made an appointment for him to preach a lecture in our Church—as a commencement of his ministry with the Universalists. The meeting was large, and he preached to great acceptance. He has now returned to Orland, henceforth to be a preacher of the glorious gospel of universal grace and salvation. He wishes to discontinue his professional labors as a medical practitioner; but we know he cannot do this and remain in Orland, for the people will have his services. We therefore recommend that he remove from that town, and enter some new field as a preacher, and not as a physician. He is a gentleman of acknowledged talents, of good education, of great experience, of christian deportment, and of excellent gifts as a public speaker. May the good Lord bless this venerable man, and make his last days the most useful and happy of his whole honorable and valuable life.

Elder Thurston's Case.

Rev. P. R. Russell speaks of Elder Thurston's case as follows. It seems that one of the tall men of the Free-Will Baptist denomination has fallen.

'Elder Thurston's case, of Lowell, has passed through the ordeal of an ecclesiastical examination, and I learn from our exchange papers, he has been suspended from the ministry. Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. No man in the Free-Will Baptist denomination stood higher perhaps for piety than he. No man can serve God and mammon at the same time.'

There is nothing which troubles the Millerites more than the words of our Saviour concerning his second coming and the attendant events, as we find his language in Matt. xxiv. 34: 'This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled,' showing most clearly that the events of which he spake were then very near at hand, and should transpire during that generation. Now, if the words of Christ be true, Millerism is false.—What then will the Millerites do? They can do nothing except they pervert the words of Christ. And this is done in the following extract, which we copy from an article in a late 'Christian Herald.'

Br. Carter,—I propose in this communication to give a brief exposition of two passages of scripture, recorded in Matt. xxiv. 29, 34. Because our Saviour said, ver. 34. 'This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled,' many suppose that all foretold in this chapter, antecedent to this expression, transpired at, or before the destruction of Jerusalem. Now it appears that all the difficulties in the above passage of scripture, arise from the ambiguity of the word GENERATION. The Greek word genea, translated generation, signifies not only Ætas, age, but also, gens, natio or progenies; as if Christ had said, 'Gens Judaeorum non interibil, usque dum omnia hoec implentur,' that is, the nation of the Jews should not perish until all these things were fulfilled. Not the age, or Jews then living, but the Jewish race, or their descendants should not become extinct, or pass from the earth, until all that Christ had said, should be accomplished and He appear in the clouds of heaven.

Here the defender of Millerism contends, that the declaration 'this generation shall not pass,' means that the nation of the Jews should not perish before the coming of Christ. That is, not that Christ was to appear during the lives of the particular generation on the earth at the time he spake, but the Jewish race or their descendants should not become extinct until the coming of the Son of man should take place. Now it happens that Christ said nothing of this kind. He said nothing about 'the Jewish race or their descendents'. He said, 'this generation (viz. the generation then on the earth) shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled,' and he had been speaking of his second advent. And his second advent did take place, in that generation, nearly 1800 years ago. And yet some are so unwise as to be even now looking for it.

Let Christ explain his own words. Did he mean that his second advent was to take place during the natural lives of some of those who were on the earth at the time he lived? He did, and it is wrong to deny it. See Matt xvi. 27, 28, 'For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with the angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works.' This referred to his second coming, because his first coming had previously taken place. And when was it to transpire? See the very next words, 'Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, until they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' Let the reader carefully peruse Matt. xvi. 27, 28. Here then is direct proof, that the second advent took place during the natural lives of some of those who were on the earth at the time the Saviour lived. His second coming did then take place. It was not a personal appearance, but a great display of the divine spirit and power which were then seen. Let the abettors of Millerism refute this, if they can.

Br. C. W. Mellen having removed from South Orange to Foxboro', Mass. requests that all letters and papers intended for him, be directed to the latter place.

End of the World in New Haven.

They had a great excitement in New Haven, Conn., not long since, in the belief that the end of the world was really at hand. Taking up an Ohio paper, we found the following article, which was probably published at first in New England. It is said the people at the time ran through the streets of New Haven, crying 'the end of the world has come,' 'the end of the world has come.'

'On Thursday morning, Dec. 29th, Bunce's old paper mill in Westville took fire and was entirely consumed. The New Haven Herald, of Friday, says, a singular phenomena attended the conflagration, which had a powerful effect upon the community. A driving snow storm was prevailing at the time, and the sudden illumination from the flames gave the whole atmosphere the appearance of a magnificent exhibition of the Aurora Borealis. The situation of the burning edifice is near the base of West Rock, a bold eminence of some three or four hundred feet. The snow acted as a mirror, and threw a reflected light over the whole hemisphere, the cause of which not being known, threw the metropolis of New Haven, into a great commotion. At this particular moment a mounted horseman dashed through Chapel Street, at a furious rate, exclaiming, 'The end of the world is at hand!' and for a short time all the Millerites enjoyed the glorious anticipation of the fulfilment of their prophecies. The 'midnight cry' was raised, the bells sounded the alarm, the engines were parading the streets to find where their services were required, and 'quite athwart went all decorum.' Several religious assemblies being met, the congregations rushed into the street, when the sudden and all-pervading light struck them with instant terror, and many scenes were exhibited typical of the final conflagration. A venerable minister of the church gravely assured one of the fire companies that it was no artificial combustion, but the actual 'coming of the Lord in great glory'—and many persons remained under this remarkable but very natural delusion during the whole night. All the world was greatly rejoiced the next morning to find it was only the burning of BUNCE'S OLD PAPER MILL!

Meeting-House in Worcester.

We stated a year ago that preparations were being made for the erection of a Universalist Meeting-House in that beautiful town,—Worcester, Mass. The land was at the time purchased,—a central and eligible site, at a cost of $5,500. It is on the main Street, directly in front of the Railroad depot, and certainly is as valuable a location as that of any public edifice in the place. The hard times came on, and building was suspended. The brethren have since been waiting for better times, until they have got weary of waiting, and now they are determined to go forward, let the times be as they may. The house will be 75 by 50 feet, with four stores in the front basement.

We are happy to hear of the prosperity of the Society, as we do from various sources. May God bless both pastor and people.

The Tables Turned.

UNIVERSALISM.—The editor of the Concord 'Journal' says: 'It may pain our Universalist friends, but we can't help it, to be informed, that to our certain knowledge, a number of respectable men in different towns in this vicinity, who have heretofore been the strenuous advocates of Universalism, have recently renounced it, as a system altogether unsatisfactory and false, and now are building up the faith they once labored to destroy.'

Why did not the editor of the 'Herald' give our reply, viz. 'It may pain our Partialist friends, but we can't help it, to be informed, that to our certain knowledge, a number of respectable men in different towns in this vicinity, who have heretofore been the strenuous advocates of Partialism, have recently renounced it, as a system altogether unsatisfactory and false, and now are building up the faith they once labored to destroy.'

The article from the pen of Br. S. R. Smith, published in the 'Trumpet' last week, is one of the Sketches prepared by him of the early history of Universalism in the State of New York, a work which we are very earnest to see, and which we have no doubt will be read with great interest by a large body of our brethren.

Probation.

An incident,—no evidence of the common doctrine of probation in the Scriptures.

Right glad are we to receive a letter from a correspondent of former years, from whom we had not received a communication for a long time. We thank him for reviving old recollections. As to the common doctrine of probation, we are quite sure it is not taught in the Scriptures. The word probation is no where found in the Bible; nor is there any doctrine inculcated in the divine word which justifies the popular divinity upon this subject.

Proctorsville, Vt., Jan. 21, 1843.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—Your remarks on the subject of probation, in the Trumpet of this date, reminded me of a circumstance which recently took place up here in Vermont. In September last I held a discussion, for two days, at Bethel, with a Mr. Hubbard, Congregationalist minister of Stockbridge. During the discussion, Mr. H. had much to say on the subject of probation; insisting, with much earnestness, that the Bible, every where, represents the present life as man's only state of trial for eternity; and that it gives no intimation that any other state of probation will be allowed to man. Becoming somewhat tired of his frequent repetitions of that sentiment, I, at length, requested him to bring forward one passage of Scripture which asserts that the present life is a state of probation to mankind, or any portion of them. I told him I would not require a passage containing the word probation, as I knew, and he knew, the word was not in the Bible; I would be satisfied with a single passage which asserts that the present life is a state of trial or preparation, or that here mankind are, in any manner, 'forming characters for eternity.' After thanking me for my liberality and fairness, in not confining him to any particular word, or form of expression, and in promising to be satisfied with only one passage, he said he would give me one of the many passages in which that principle is asserted. And now, Br. W., what do you guess (as you are a Yankee) was the passage he brought forward? You may as well prepare your mind for something that will, at once, remove all your scepticism on this hitherto doubtful principle of Christian doctrine. After reading his proof text you will probably think, as I told him, that he richly deserves a diploma from all the learned institutions in Christendom, for the wonderful discovery he has made. The passage he introduced was, Rom. viii. 24, 25, 'For we are saved by hope; but hope that is seen, is not hope; for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it.'

I advise you now, Br. W., never again to oppose, or even to doubt, the popular doctrine of probation. The question is settled forever. If you can make any thing out of the foregoing, which you think will instruct or amuse your readers, or cause one unbeliever in orthodox dogmas to cast his doubts to 'the moles and the bats,' it is at your service.

Fraternally yours, &c.,
WARREN SKINNER.

A word for ourselves.

O that we could utter some word that would induce our subscribers to pay for their papers? There never has been a year in which we have suffered half as much by the failure of subscribers to pay, as we have the past year. We tender thanks to those who have paid, first of all. How could we have gone on without them? But what shall we say to those who have not? Brethren, we need your assistance; we pray you to send us the amount you owe. We ask no more than is honestly our due; and have we not a right to ask that? We speak once more,—do send us what is due. And remember, kind reader, if these duns are unpleasant, that it is in the power of our subscribers to put an end to them at once. We do not love to write these notices. It is very disagreeable; but necessity is laid upon us.

Lamentable Clerical Defection.

We find in the 'Nazarene' of Jan. 21st, a melancholy account of the fall of the celebrated revivalist, who has been figuring largely in the State of New York, which place he left a few months since, and went to Monroeton, Penn., where he was the instrument of raising a great excitement, miscalled a 'revival of religion. He was particularly active in abusing Universalists. As a writer says, 'we were treated with the utmost contempt; the most severe revilings and epithets too vulgar to appear in the public prints were bestowed upon us; and I am sorry to say, that the Baptists in a body, and most of the Presbyterians sanctioned the course which he pursued, and aided him in his inglorious work.' At last the man left the place, and the excitement died away. For the present we withhold the name. The following paragraph from the 'Nazarene' gives the denoument of the scene.

A few weeks subsequent to his departure, the District Attorney of this county was waited upon by Deputy Sheriff, Everts, of Weedsport, N. Y., and solicited to render some aid in securing the person of Rev. ———, for an offence which would blacken and disgrace the character of a fiend. Yes: this Reverend! gentleman 'labored in Weedsport for the good of souls,' and while prosecuting the work, under the garb of religion, he plotted and accomplished the ruin of a female member of the church! A warrant was issued for his arrest, while he was engaged in a 'protracted effort,' at Danville, and probably having notice of the event, he left the place and at Williamsport mailed a letter to his victim inquiring why she had exposed him! It was not enough that the lady should be bereft of all which could secure her a place of respectability in virtuous society! It was not enough, that a stain should be placed upon her character which no tears can wash away, and the grave only efface! It was not enough, that the hearts of her friends should be bedecked with sorrow and sunk deep in distress! No! This was not considered; but the seducer was laboring under the supposition, that she would cloak his iniquity, and suffer him still to labor on: with one hand 'converting souls to God,' and with the other perhaps plotting and accomplishing the destruction of female innocence! Such was the man, who was aided and abetted by the Baptists and a part of the Presbyterians, in heaping contumely, abuse, and slander upon the Universalists of Monroeton, and upon all those who dared to speak in opposition to the measures which he pursued! And can they now look their neighbors in the face?—Those who are, and ever have been, as respectable members of society as any among their own class—we say, will there not a change pass over the countenance, when they look upon the past and reflect; that with such a man as the Rev. ——— for their leader and their guide, they stepped so far from the path of rectitude—so entirely lost sight of the spirit of the Prince of peace, as to pour out the most bitter reproach upon those who, as well as themselves, look toward the everlasting throne as the dwelling place of a Parent, and the final, happy home of man!

Dowling's Reply to Miller.

We have received from Jordan & Co., 121 Washington Street, Boston, 'Dowling's Reply to Miller, being a review of Mr. Miller's theory on the end of the world in 1843.' Mr. Dowling refutes Miller's delusion; but he is in a like condemnation himself. He believes that the second coming of Christ has not yet taken place; and he undertakes to frighten his readers by telling them they may die within the time pointed out by Mr. Miller. The truth is, about half the Baptists have run into Millerism, and the rest have run into other doctrines just about as unreasonable. Mr. Dowling is a Baptist clergyman in Providence, R. I. Let him come to Massachusetts, and lift up his voice against those Baptist clergymen who are endeavoring to make capital out of the Miller delusion. Let him begin at Watertown, and thunder in the ears of the Baptist minister there, and then come down to Cambridgeport and do a like work. There is enough for him to do. Let him begin immediately.

A Falsehood somewhere.

Matthew H. Smith said, in 1842, in the course of a phillipic against Universalists,

'When I was a Universalist, I should as soon thought of turning my parlor into a Mahometan mosque, and teach from the Koran, as to call my family together, read a chapter from the Bible, and pray with them.'

In 1833, in answer to Mr. Robert Smith, who wrote against prayer, Matthew said,—

'I will show my opinion of the utility of public and private prayer; in submitting to this duty I do not glide down the current of popular prejudice, nor tamely follow the multitude to the violation of my own consciousness of duty, nor in the performance of it, have I yeilded to the custom rather than follow the dictates of my own conscience—I have yielded to it because I have the example of Christ and his apostles, and because I believe it both a duty and a privilege.'

Now which of these statements is true? That they cannot both be true is quite apparent. The public cannot have any very great confidence in what such a man says.

Clerical Refinement.

A certain Rev. Mr. Avery, a Presbyterian divine, of Ohio, recently made use of the following language, in one of his discourses against Universalism:—'Universalists (he said) would make kindling wood for the fire of hell, and delicate ladies' fingers would crackle like fagots round a boiling pot.' This is a horrid picture! It shows the tendency of Partialist doctrines to brutalize human feelings, and make men more savage than wild beasts. Thank God, we are not to be judged by such men; but by a God who is 'good to all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works.'

Several articles crowded out by a press of matter. An additional notice of the Middlesex Conference shared that fate. We regret it; but we cannot get everything into one paper.

Giving up False Doctrines.

The following letter was addressed by an intelligent member of the Baptist Church in Cabotville, Mass. to her clergyman. She had, by prayerful study, been brought to believe in the final salvation of all men; and felt it her duty to let her light shine as an example to others.

Cabotville, Jan. 21, 1843.

Rev. Mr. Warren,—Sir:—After diligent and prayerful examination of the Scriptures, I have come to the conclusion that the doctrine of endless misery is not taught therein, but, on the contrary, that God hath spoken of the restitution of all things by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.

Having, therefore, embraced the doctrine of Universal Salvation, I feel it my duty to apprise the Baptist Church with which I am now connected of the fact, and at the same time request, that I may no longer be considered a member of that communion.

By laying this letter before said Church, over which you are pastor, as soon as convenient, you will greatly oblige,

Your unfeigned friend, C. A. Abbe.

Periodicals.

'The Health Journal and Independent Magazine.' This is a new publication, issued by Joseph Whitmarsh, 14 Devonshire Street. Price $2 in advance. It makes no promises; it merely tells us its name, and what it is about to do, and then begins its work. Let the work speak for itself: 'The regenerating power of Love, the Pharisaism of the Age, the Tyranny of Public Opinion, the right of every Human Being of Freedom of Thought and Action, the Divine Nature of Marriage, the right of Human Beings to take the life of Men or Animals, the Laws of Health, the Re-organization of Society, or the doctrine of Association and the restoration of all things to the divine order,—these will be amongst the subjects discussed in the pages of this Journal.'

Thanks to Jenks and Palmer for a copy of the Farmer's Almanack, interleaved and in stiff covers. It is a very useful work—the old favorite of all New England.

The Pioneer, a Literary and Critical Magazine. J. R. Lowell and R. Carter, editors and publishers. We did not see the first number; the second is before us. This is a work of high character. The mechanical execution is worthy of all praise. It does not come within the province of our paper to write long notices of works like this. It is designed to furnish a substitute for the light and miserable trash that has filled too many of the Magazines and other periodicals. The first number was greeted with a hearty welcome by many of our soundest editors, who have pronounced it one of the best Magazines our country affords.

The Boys' and Girls' Magazine, by Mrs. S. Coleman. The author of the Rollo books, and besides him, T. S. Arthur, and several ladies who have peculiar talent to write for children, are engaged as regular contributors. T. H. Carter & Co. 118 1-2 Washington Street, are the publishers. Mrs. Coleman with such assistants must make a good work.

The Election Sermon, delivered before the Executive and the Legislature, on Saturday, Jan. 7th, by Rev. Samuel C. Jackson, pastor of the West Church, Andover. Subject — 'Religious Principle a source of Public Prosperity.' Text—'Fear God, honor the King.' This sermon certainly contains some good things; but whether it is obnoxious to the charges which have been brought against it, we will not say without a careful reading. Albeit, we have no idea it is as good as the sermon will be next year.

A Christmas Sermon, delivered in the Universalist Church in Hartford, Conn. on the evening of Dec. 25, 1842, by Rev. John Moore. Good, of course. The man, the occasion, the subject, all conspired to make it so.

Conference Meetings.

'Let us not forsake the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is.'

Br. Whittemore,—I have been much pleased of late, to notice in your valuable paper, so many able articles in praise of Conference Meetings. I sincerely believe those social gatherings are productive of much good when they are carried on in love & good fellowship, for I think they have a strong tendency to strengthen our hearts in the bonds of christian unity and love. Who I ask, can sit and hear some of those short but soul-stirring speeches on the love of our Heavenly Father and not be moved?

We have had several of those social meetings on Dorchester Little Neck, and I hope by the blessing of God they will be continued every Wednesday evening weather permitting.

Br. B. Whittemore's evening meetings at So. Boston have been much crowded of late, in which I believe many have enjoyed a 'feast of reason and flow of soul.'

May those social gatherings go on and may they bring in many who are out of the fold of God's universal love, and establish them in that faith which works by love, is the sincere prayer of

E. K. A.

Strafford Quarterly Conference.

The next session of this body will be holden on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (1st and 2d) of March, at the new Meeting-House on Lee Parade, N. H.

At the request of the brethren, there will be religious services at the above place, the evening previous, (Tuesday,) at 6 o'clock.

Friends from abroad will call on Br. Nicholas D. Meserve, on Lee Parade,—Josiah Bartlett, Esq., at the Hook,—or, Gardner Towle, Esq., Wadley's Falls, for directions.

A general invitation is extended to all of like precious faith, and others, to come up and sit with us 'in heavenly places.' To the ministering brethren, a particular request is made.

The friends in Lee are very desirous of greeting a large number of the good and true. What say! shall we have a real gospel season of refreshing? Come one—come all who can. E. Francis, Clerk.

Three Lectures on Millerism.

Br. Otis A. Skinner will deliver three Lectures on Millerism in Wrentham Centre, on the evenings of Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, of next week.—Services to commence at half past 6 o'clock.

Notice.

A public meeting of the American Peace Society will be held in the Representatives Chamber of the State House, on Wednesday next, Feb. 8th, at 7 o'clock, P. M. when resolutions will be offered, and the meeting addressed by gentlemen interested in the cause. The friends of Peace, of both sexes, and citizens generally, from the city or country, are respectfully invited to attend.

General Intelligence.

Melancholy Accident at Cambridgeport.

On Saturday last Mr. Freeman Hovey started with a full load of cured hams for Boston. In passing through the lane that opens out from the smoke houses, his leaders turned too suddenly down the Main street towards the city and in his effort to force the fill horse from the corner of the building, his feet slipped and he fell in such a posture as to bring his neck directly in front of the wheel. His neck thus was broken, and he died instantly. He has left a young and deeply afflicted family. This great sorrow, added to sickness in other branches of the family, has made the house the seat of great grief, and has excited a wide sympathy in the village. Mr. H. was an exemplary man, kind and obliging, and his loss will be much felt. 'Thus in the midst of life we are in death.'

Election. February 13th has been fixed on by the Governor and Council for the election of members to Congress in the Districts that failed of making a choice at the election in November last.

Hon. John P. Bigelow, late Secretary of State, has received the appointment of Notary Public. He has taken an office in State street for the transaction of business in that capacity as well as that of Public Administrator.

Soup and Bread Society. At a meeting of a number of gentlemen, held at the Ward room in Common street last week, it was voted, unanimously, that whereas there are a large number of inhabitants of the city who are unable to find employment, and are in consequence thereof unable to purchase food for themselves and families and as various cases of absolute suffering for the want thereof, have come to our knowledge; therefore, it was resolved to form an association under the name of the Soup and Bread Society, for the purpose of furnishing gratuitously to the poor during the winter months soup and bread.

John Ball, President;
R. W. Holman, Treasurer;
E. Copeland Jr., Secretary.

Directors: Rev. J. T. Sargent, Francis Jackson, F. D. Stedman, Rev. Samuel McBurney, Thomas J. Lobdell, Rev. Otis A. Skinner, Nathaniel Jewett, W. E. Blanchard, Wm. Willet, John Ball, R. W. Holman, E. Copeland Jr. A committee to receive subscriptions, was appointed and also an executive committee to carry the plan into immediate operation. In the mean time those disposed to favor the project will find a subscription paper at the druggist store of Wm. Brown, corner of Elliot and Washington streets.

Commander McKenzie. The Philadelphia Gazette says:—it affords us much pleasure to be enabled to state that Capt. Mackenzie has been unanimously and triumphantly justified from all blame, by the Court of Enquiry. This result must have been anticipated by every one who has given a candid attention to the testimony. The New York Courier and Enquirer also says:—It is confidently stated by some of the Naval Officers in this city, that the Court of Enquiry for the trial of Commander Mackenzie, have unanimously acquitted him, and that a Court Martial in the case is deemed entirely unnecessary.

Washingtonians. It is not three years since six drunken, impoverished mechanics, a tailor, blacksmith and the like, says the New York Washingtonian Daily News, in the midst of their drunken orgies in a bar-room in Baltimore were smitten with the bright idea (so successfully since carried like a whirlwind over the earth) of forming among themselves a total abstinence from intoxicating liquor society.

Yes, this affair, now called the great temperance reformation, embracing millions scattered in these United States, commenced in April, 1840, in the following apparently accidental and trifling manner:—

'Let us form a temperance society among ourselves,' said George Steers, a wheelwright. Those words, at that moment, commenced a great era in the annals of the world. 'Suppose we do,' added David Anderson, the blacksmith, 'and make Bill Mitchell president.'

All six then united in agreeing to the arrangement; Wm. K. Mitchell, the tailor, drafted the celebrated pledge. David Anderson enjoyed the immortal honor of signing his name at the very head of the millions of subsequent signers, and Mitchell was elected President, proposed the name of Washingtonians, experience telling, each man bringing his man, the two shilling initiation fees, and one shilling a month dues, and a variety of other regulations which have not been changed, as if wisdom had descended from heaven upon Mitchell to enable him to benefit human nature, and establish rules not susceptible of human improvement.

Such is the wonderful origin of the Washingtonians, a class probably destined to embrace all nations of the world, for it is only a name for persons who have adopted a new and improved state of social existence, congenial to the moral, religious, and physical state of every human being, to be possessed universally and without a single exception.

The Affair of the Bibles. It is stated in the Plattsburg papers, that the clergymen of that village have taken measures to secure an investigation of the affair of burning the Bibles in Champlain. It is to be done in accordance with the suggestion of Bishop Hughes, and as soon as one of the Protestant gentleman selected can attend to the duty.

Trouble with Mexico. Late Mexican papers received at New Orleans, state other grounds of complaint, the Mexicans have against us, besides the recent taking of Monterey by Com. Jones.—From the statement given, it appears that during the month of November, a party of men entered the port of San Diego, and spiked eight cannon belonging to the fortification. The officers of the brig Alert are charged with the perpetration of this offence, as she was seen off the port some days before, and several boats filled with men, were seen passing between the vessel and shore about the time of the alleged offence.

Pins. The factory for the manufacture of pins at Stratford, Conn., is said to be the only one of the kind in this country or in Europe. The machine takes the wire, cuts it off the right length, puts on the head, point, &c., completely finished before it leaves the machine; one machine makes about 36,000 a day; there is also a machine connected with it, for sticking them into the papers—the pins are put into a hopper, that drops them down to the paper, which is carried around a cylinder; it sticks on four dozen at a hitch, and makes about fifty hitches a minute. It was invented by Mr H. Waters of Stamford.

The Black Tongue is the name of a disease now prevailing in the neighborhood of Ballston, N. Y. It commences with a swelling of the glands of the throat, and proves very fatal.

Accident from Fire. On Monday morning, while a little girl named Davis, was standing by the stove in H. D. Varnum's grocery store in Hanover street, her apron caught fire, and before the flames could be extinguished she was so badly burnt that her life is despaired of.

Fare Reduced. The fare from Boston to Liverpool, per Royal Mail Steamers, has been reduced to one hundred and twenty dollars. The fare to Halifax remains the same as heretofore.

Counterfeits. A gang of counterfeiters, (male and female) has just been apprehended in New York, who were doing a large business with counterfeit threes of the Exchange Bank, Mass. The following is a description of them—letter B., pay to E. Thomas, date April 1st, 1841, J. Chadwick, Cashier, and John Rayhold, President.—Vignette in the centre, a locomotive and train of cars; purports to be engraved by Rawdon, Wright & Hatch, N. Y.; paper light and oily, engraving bad, especially on the end pieces.

Eruption of Mount Etna. Two hours after the Oriental steam-ship left Malta, on the 28th of November, about half past 5 o'clock, when getting dusk, the passengers and crew most clearly saw Mount Etna in eruption. the Oriental at the time bearing N. E. 105 miles. This beautiful sight was kept in view for five hours. The captain states that such an occurrence has not been witnessed for twenty years. A letter from Palermo, of the 1st ult. says—'The present great eruption of Etna (it is at this moment flaming away with undiminished brilliancy any grandeur) is the first that has been visible at Palermo since 1832. Intelligence travels slowly in Sicily, and we have not yet authentic advances from the scene of action. Etna is 10,874 English feet in height. In the day the smoke represents a silvery feathery white tree, of the cypress form; at night the flame is red, and of the shape and size of an ordinary haycock; that is as seen from Palermo.'

The Caledonia brought in her mail for this city 27,000 letters and 25 bushels of papers. The post bill for New York city delivery alone, was nearly $3000—that for Philadelphia $500, and that for New Orleans over $600.

Store Breaking. The store of Mr. N. Davis Cotton, No. 13 Tremont Row, was entered on Monday night by false keys, and goods to the amount of about $300 taken from it. The goods consisted of gold rings, card cases, pocket knives pencil cases, &c. No clue has been found to the robbers as yet.—Atlas.

Escape of a San Antonio Prisoner. We learn from the New Orleans Picayune, that Col. A. Neil, a gentleman well known in Texas, and who was captured at San Antonio in September last, made his escape from the guard some forty miles this side the city of Mexico on the night of the 14th ult, and has succeeded in reaching this country after running many risks. He effected his escape early in the evening, and after walking all night reached the city of Mexico about 8 o'clock in the morning. There he rested at a Mexican fonda or Tavern for two days, during which time he shaved off a large pair of whiskers and otherwise disguised himself. After spending one or two more days in the city he finally started for the coast, reached it in safety, made his way to Havana, and at last reached New Orleans by way of Key West or some other of the Florida ports. Col. N. is a lawyer by profession, and returns immediately to Texas.

Four Children shot. We learn from the New York papers of last week, concerning a most disgraceful affair, of which the following is an account: Last evening about 7 o'clock, four children who were supposed to be stealing wood from a wharf at the foot of Oliver street, on the East River, were fired at with a gun loaded with shot and all wounded—two of them dangerously. One was a boy about 14 years of age, named Vail, residing at No. 95 Cherry street. He received several shot in the groin and abdomen, and was taken to Dr. Hulsey's, No 86 Cherry street, who rendered him such assistance as the case required. He was then taken to the Hospital. Another was a boy of thirteen, severely wounded in the abdomen, who lived at No. 8 Jacob street. Having been seen by Dr. Ritter, of No. 194 Cherry street, he was also conveyed to the Hospital. A younger boy was shot in the side, and a little girl in both legs.

A man named Bostwick has been arrested on suspicion of having shot at the poor children and taken to the Police office.

Cathedral. The Philadelphia North American says, 'it was rumored yesterday, that some members of the Roman Catholic Church were preparing to negociate for the purchase of the U. S. Bank in this city, to convert it into a Cathedral. We learn that the probable difficulty in raising the adequate funds will prevent it being done for the present.'

Loss of Life. Since 1833, eighty vessels and one hundred and eighteen lives have been lost on Lake Michigan. Value of the lost property, $1,052,450.

A Mr. Osborne was robbed in New Orleans on the 15th ult., of between six and seven hundred dollars in specie, by a countryman, who being suddenly seized with a fit of sickness, was taken into Mr. Osborne's room in order to be more at ease. While there he contrived to break open three or four trunks, and then make off, but the police got on his track and succeeded the same evening in lodging him in prison.

Accident. About 5 o'clock on Wednesday morning, a scow containing three men filled and sunk opposite Long wharf. Fortunately Mr. Andrew Manning, boatman, saw their peril, and succeeded in taking all the men into his boat, and landing them at the wharf—one, however, so much exhausted that his recovery is doubtful. William a year Mr. Manning has rescued 6 persons from a watery grave.—Post.

A Deer captured from two Wolves! On Thursday last, Mr. Mack of Lincoln, was going up the Pemobscot river, above Watawamkeag Point with a load of hay, when there came out of the woods upon the smooth ice a deer, pursued by two fierce wolves. Upon reaching the ice the deer could make no headway, on account of his constant slipping, and the wolves voraciously seized his hind quarters, tearing off the hair, and then seizing the flesh and devouring it. The deer struggled in vain to escape, and rent the air with its mournful bleat. Mr. Mack jumped from his load, pulled off his boots that he might not slip upon the ice, seized his hatchet and hastened to the scene of action. As he approached the wolves growled their dissatisfaction, but left their prey, which though about six pounds of flesh had been torn from it, was not yet prostrate. The deer was seized, slain, dressed, suspended to the load and the team started for the lumbering camp.—Bangor Whig.

A murder Exposed. Yesterday morning a man made the following statement before Recorder Baldwin: but as no prosecution has been regularly commenced, we will suppress names, and only speak of the affair as we heard it. Some time in last July a certain ship left this port for Great Britain. Previous to her sailing, a young English lad, while in a state of intoxication, was shipped on board this vessel, when in fact he should only have been rated as a raw hand. The second mate finding the lad not to answer his expectations, beat him in a most unmerciful manner, and when scarcely able to crawl about from the treatment he had received, he was made one day to go aloft in order to grease and scrape the masts. While in this situation he accidentally let fall a copper pot full of filthy slush upon the deck, and he was actually commanded to come down and lick up what he had spilt! From this and other brutal usage he fell sick and died.—While on his death bed he called our informant to him; desired him to write to his father, and to say he had been killed by the manner in which he had been used. The person to whom this desire was made known, immediately called three of the ship's crew to the side of the dying boy, in order that they might hear and testify to his last words. As soon as they arrived in London, our informant proceeded to the house of the American Consul, who took down the depositions of the witnesses, and promised to send the captain and second mate home in irons; but some how or other he failed to do so, and it is stated that the two accused are now in this port, one in command of a vessel, and the other promoted to the station of chief mate. The boy died on the 4th of August, 1841, and was buried in the Gulf of Mexico. The Recorder sent the narrator of this shameful transaction before Fane Peyton, Esq., U. S. District Attorney, and in a few days the whole affair will be developed to the public.—N. O. Tropic, 14 h.

Dreadful The following instance of premature interment is given by the Debats; 'A woman of the commune of Pauhan had apparently died, and her body, after the twenty-four hours customary delay, was placed in the coffin, and the funeral procession proceeded to the place of interment. During the way the bearers felt something stirring in the coffin, and, in alarm, determined on seeing what could have occurred. They found the woman alive, having only been in a lethargy. She was carried back to her residence, but the agitation she suffered caused her death a few days after.—English paper.

Fires. The dwelling house of Henry H. Cook in Lenox, Mass., together with the principal part of its furniture, and the wood and carriage-house adjoining, with two waggons, were entirely consumed by fire on Sunday afternoon last. Loss $1,500 to $2,000. No insurance.

The dwelling house owned by L. Dwight, in Stockbridge, Mass., was destroyed by fire on Sunday afternoon. Loss $600 or $700.

Important Decision. The New York Court of Errors has just determined, in opposition to a decision of the Supreme Court, that where there are two executors of a will, one of them without the action, consent or knowledge of the other, may legally sell and assign a bond and mortgage belonging to the estate. This is a strong decision, and involves many serious consequences.

An ancient Relic. As the sons of Messrs. Daniel Woodman and Daniel Gould, were digging clams, on Monday, in the Back Cove, (near the channel) they discovered the rim of what they thought was a large iron jug. After digging round and tugging at it for some time; they were obliged to get some tackle before it could be taken from its bed. It proved to be a bomb shell, with the powder yet in it, which was thrown from Mowatt's fleet, on the memmorable 15th of Oct., 1775—(67 years ago)—the day when this town was burned by the British! It measures 38 inches in circumference, and weighs 150 pounds. Capt. Lemuel Moody, and Mr. William Tukey, well recollect seeing it pass over the town, and sink into the waters of the Cove. It was the only one that passed over during the day. The others all fell among the devoted houses, and exploded.—Eastern Argus.

Bells, Clocks, Organs. George H. Holbrook, East Medway, Mass. manufactures Church Bells, Church Clocks and Church Organs.

Holbrook's Bells are well known. It is the general testimony of those who are judges, and who have had opportunities of forming an opinion, that his Bells are the best which are manufactured in the United States, both for strength and resonancy of tone. The best Bells in Boston, New York, and other great cities, are from Holbrook's foundry.

Mr. Holbrook's Clocks are well known. There are probably a greater number of tower Clocks in Massachusetts manufactured by him, than any other man. He has facilities for manufacture, which enable him not only to make good Clocks, but to undersell all other manufacturers. These are the causes of the great manner he has sold.

The public are assured that it will be for their interest to call, if they wish to purchase either Bells, Clocks or Organs.

Davis' Improved Oxygenated Soap. The Oxygenated Soap, as a Cosmetic and for Shaving, stands unrivalled. It is a composition in which pure Caustic Alkali is exhibited in its mildest form, without a large portion of oxygen—a substance so well known to be essential to life, that it has obtained, in its gaseous form, the name of Vital Air.

In external applications, especially when aided by the cleansing virtues of soap, it has a beneficial effect. It renders the skin soft and pliable, and preserves it in a healthy state: it gives it the bloom and purity of youth, and by its invigorating and strengthening qualities, enables the skin to perform its functions, known to be so necessary in the economy of nature for the preservation of beauty and the enjoyment of health. It removes all cutaneous eruptions, and is recommended as the best remedy for roughness of hands, Freckles, &c. that has ever been offered to the public.

Poetry.

(ORIGINAL.)

'Weep with those that weep.'

Let me weep with those who weep,
Let me for their sufferings feel;
Let my tears sincerely flow,
Let me share, or let me heal;
This feeling heart,
Shall bear her part,
In all the woes of earthly root
By grace divine,
Its love shall shine,
Thro' tears of grief, on all who taste pale sorrow's fruit.

Grief and anguish are the lot,
In a high or low degree,
From the palace to the cot,
None on earth are wholly free,
Nor will I scorn
To weep and mourn,
O'er grief that comes in imagery,
Apace on those,
Who real woes
Know not—but yet to misery are a willing prey.

Earnest of inheritance,
Though the time may yet be far,
Gives to life its richest zest,
Is of hope the guiding star—
And may we not,
Affliction's lot
Thus antedate, and thus survey,
If it prepare
The heart to bear
A real woe more firm, 'tis time not thrown away.

Sympathy, thou dearest friend,
If I have a real joy,
'Tis thine influence doth lend,
All the gold—but no alloy;
'Tis thine to share,
The grief-worn care,
Of all within thy sacred power,
And thus 'to bless,
Is to be blessed,'
Be blessed indeed in life—blessed thro' its latest hour.

Procrastination.

Tomorrow is the excuse of the sluggard, and procastinator for putting off the duties of to-day; and however satisfactory the immediate results of the bargain, the final consequences are too often fatal to the hopes and happiness of those who indulge in them. No dependence can be placed on the flattering promises of to-morrow, for it may appear to offer shelter and clothing to the needy, food to the hungry, and consolation to the troubled mind, but there is little probability of its being fraught with these good things. Experience tells us that it will probably be as blank and hopeless as to-day is, or yesterday was.

To-morrow always promises—so did to-day, and so did yesterday—and so has it always been. If we place too much dependence on the morrow, without working hard now for its accomplishment, we but hope in vain. If we neglect to-day's duties, we may not count upon to-morrow for their fulfilment. Where is to-morrow? Aye, where is this fair promiser—this convenient shield? Heaven only knows—man cannot. All we can say with certainty is, that it is in another world; and ere it come and be 'to-day,' we may be there also.

Judging by the past, the future may not be depended upon—and what better teacher is there than experience? Thousands and thousands of times, it has frustrated the hopes, and blighted the fair expectations of those, who, forgetting that the present is the only time we may call our own, have leaned upon futurity for all their support, and have found it but a broken reed.

Dr. Blair wisely remarks, that 'procrastination has throughout every age been the ruin of mankind. Dwelling amid endless projects of what they are hereafter to do, they cannot so properly be said to live, as to be always about to live, and the future has ever been the gulf in which the present is swallowed up and lost.'

Defer not then till to-morrow, the duties of to-day, lest that morrow be so clogged with its own burdens and those of its predecessors, that their accomplishment shall be irksome and tedious, if not impossible.—Bulletin.

To a Christian who has availed himself of the Bankrupt Act.

Dear Brother,—I have sympathized with you in your misfortunes, and prayed they might be sanctified to you for your spiritual improvement. After our late interview, the thought occurred to me that perhaps I ought to sympathize, to some extent at least, with your creditors. Permit me to inquire (and I would do it kindly) what sacrifice you have made of personal comfort and luxuries, to meet your honest liabilities. This question is not in the least affected by the manner in which your debtors have served you. If they are unjust and dishonest, it is no justification for you if you are. If called upon to help sustain the institutions of the church, I understand you plead poverty, and yet no one is able to perceive any material difference in your style of living. ou wear as fine cloth, have as many luxuries, carry as high a head (except when asked for an alms,) dress your children as finely, indulge them in superfluities, nay, you wear the same gold chain yourself you did last year! Your house is still elegantly furnished, with fine carpets, splendid mirrors and piano, and with no apparent business or means of meeting your expenses; you are not at a loss to provide for your table the best the market affords, and that in abundance. In addition, you indulge in your old hapit of smoking cigars, and that too at camp-meetings. And yet you make a high profession of piety, and have been licensed to preach the gospel! Now, brother, you need some one to deal faithfully and pointedly with you. I can but fear that the god of this world has blinded your mind. You can but recollect the remarks made about our brother F., at the time he went into bankruptcy.—'Ay,' said some of the unconverted, 'there's another of your CHRISTIANS; he borrowed $100, a short time ago, and this is the way he is paying it! He is the one that talked so much about sanctification, and now he is a believer in Millerism. I guess he has some interest in lecturing on the end of the world in '43! And he is the one to talk to people about paying their honest debts, and being prepared to meet Christ next year; and yet while living in the same style of extravagance as ever did, he goes into bankruptcy* under pretence of doing justice more equally to his creditors! If such a man can go to heaven, I have no fears.' These, brother, are in substance the remarks now made about you. I admit they are unjust, but it becomes you seriously to inquire whether you have not given some occasion for these dreadful stabs on the body of our Saviour.—Zion's Herald.

*It is reported of a believer in the peculiar doctrines of Mr. Miller, who is deeply involved in debt, that he has been heard to say, 'The Lord will pay off all my debts next year.

Errors.

It would be well if we could all correct the errors of life as easily as we can the errors of the press. Provoking and ludicrous blunders frequently happen in a daily journal, but these can be corrected to-morrow. But the error which man commits to-day, he cannot always erase or correct on the morrow. The sin of the present moment fastens upon us, and its ill effect remains and festers for years, and perhaps is never wholly eradicated. How careful then ought we to be of the little moment that is flying onward, if it carries under its wing such an important record of our actions.—Bulletin.

Free Agency.

[Republished by request.]

There is an absurdity in the common view of this subject, not fully or often considered by its advocates and friends. God has designed the salvation of all. He has given ability to each one to frustrate his design, by making mankind free agents. He knows perfectly and infallibly how each one will use this agency—who will be saved and who will be damned. He is constantly desiring, and as constantly striving to save those that he knows will be lost, as he is those that will be saved. Now look at the character which this ascribes to 'the only wise God!'

If a man deliberately plans a work, and as deliberately institutes means to frustrate that plan, and then knowing that these means will defeat his purpose, continues to labor with all his might to accomplish that purpose—what would you call him?

A father gives his children poison and bread, knowing that several of them will eat the poison instead of the bread in despite of all his warnings, entreaties and remonstrances—and then, when they have eaten the poison, he labors to nourish them into life by presenting them with an antidote he knows they will reject, and knowing that they will die. Wherein is the excellency of the wisdom and the goodness of this parent?

If men would reason and feel on religious subjects as they do about the every day affairs of life, the doctrine that endless sin and misery will be perpetuated by a God of infinite wisdom, power and love, would not have a place among christians for another year.

Young Spencer, the Mutineer.

Impelled, by reading an account in Saturday evening's paper, of the awful events that lately transpired on board the U. S. Brig Somers, and the dreadful death of young Spencer and the other two ringleaders of that mutiny and conspiracy, which if it had been successful, would have been succeeded by the most horrid and revolting crimes that have ever blackened the pages of the too many already blood-stained records of piracy, has induced me to give a short history of this Spencer, the son of the Hon. J. C. Spencer, Secretary of War. So much of the life of the late, midshipman Philip Spencer, as I propose giving you, was repeated to me from his own lips; and I suppose coming from such a source, and not second handed to the writer of this article, (who was once his friend and messmate, and who continued and cherished the former term, until ingratitude marked by ferociousness of feeling and heartless depravity of character, burst asunder the chords of amity which in the beginning of his naval career had every seeming of being lasting,) it cannot be doubted.

Philip Spencer was born in Canandaigua, N. Y. and at the time of his awful death, was about 19 years of age—but in strength of mind, intelligence, literary attainments, and bold daring, was far beyond his years. Nothing in his history of much interest is the writer aware of, until his College career. He was sent the Union College, Schenectady, but he did not graduate, as his conduct there became so notorious that he was expelled or had leave to absent himself. He returned to his friends, where he remained some time.—Being of a wandering turn of mind, and fond of any thing bordering on the dangerous and marvellous, he eloped from his home and went to New York; concealing his parentage he shipped for a whaler fitting out at Nantucket, and (along with many others of kindred feeling, but not of that daring reckless spirit, fearless alike of life or death) was sent to the latter place in a small schooner.

The ship that he was to embark in not being ready he remained some time on the island. During this time and previous to the gale of Oct. 1841, he volunteered to go out on the banks in a small vessel for what the whalemen denominate Black Fish, and in that gale came near being lost, as many were at that time; as it was, they got back to Nantucket quite a wreck. Here I told him I was surprised that he should ever think of adopting that hazardous life, sought only by those whom friends and fortune had discarded, and whose last lingering star had sunk beneath the horizon, perhaps never to re-appear. He smiled at my astonishment at his deserting his happy, luxurious and delightful home; and now as I look back, as I have often since, I think of the smile of Spencer—yes, as I now write, I can see him as distinct as the words I am penning—that smile was not human! The wild rolling of his eyes told plainly enough to any one at all discerning, that something was working in that heart that could not submit to the dull monotony of this peaceful, every day life. His reply was that he should like to harpoon the whale and see the blood spilt, that he was not afraid of danger and liked an adventurous life.

The ship being ready to receive her casks, he was compelled, with many others, to work from morning till late at night in getting them and the stores on board, being allowed only 30 minutes for their meals, which were of the coarsest kind and only five hours rest at night in a miserable forecastle, in close communion with the dregs of New York streets. I told him I thought this servile labor and hard living, would have satisfied his curiosity to see the world but no—the exitement was to come. In confirmation of his assertion, he showed me his hands, and they from their horny, hardened appearance corroborated his statement of what he had undergone at Nantucket.

Having disposed of his wardrobe and replaced them by the coarse and homely garb of the whaler, he was ready, as was also the ship in two days to sail for their crusing grounds in the South Sea.

In the interval of time from his disappearance from home to the time of our narrative, his friends had by dilligent enquiries found his whereabouts, and knowing his uncontrollable disposition and his determination at all hazards to go to sea, their influence and his father's position as one of the Cabinet at Wasington, procured for him a midshipman's appointment, which was sent with all despatch to Nantucket, with a description of his person, &c. to the care of the owner of the ship.—This and a letter from his father was placed in his hands. The prospect of a change from drudgery to a comparative easy life had not such an effect on him as it would have had on most young men; but by the earnest persuasions of the owner and captain, after learning who he was, he was induced by them to give a volunteer $80 to take his place. He came on to New York and was there fitted out by his uncle, Captain Spencer of the Navy, and by him introduced on board of the guard ship North Carolina.

His sojourn on board of that ship, (about 4 months) was passed, as is much of the time of some other young men in like circumstances, in occasional, and I am sorry to say frequent dissipation, principally at night, but not unfrequently in the face of day. Here he committed an aggravated and unprovoked assault upon his superior officer, which was investigated by the commodore, in the cabin of that ship, in the presence of the uncle, Capt. Spencer, and a commander of the Navy. The written report made by the insulted officer to the Secretary of the Navy, though from the commandant of the station, was unheeded, supposed from family influence; and Spencer was ordered to the brig Somers.—The officer thus treated resigned from the service.

The writer does not charge the excellent commander of the North Carolina with a knowledge of the dissipation amongst some of the young men of that ship; he believes it was entirely beyond his knowledge. The horrid death of young Spencer must be most fearfully distressing to the feelings of his family, and the writer would not add another pang to their already broken hearts; but he trusts it may be a warning to many youths who wish to leave the happy fireside of the homes and the kind influences of a mother's and a father's dearest hope, to seek abroad on the tempestuous sea a home surrounded by dangers and temptutions. I have digressed somewhat from my first undertaking, namely, a concise statement of young Spencer's career which was ended ignominiously at the yard arm of a man of war within one year from the commencement of his naval career. —N. H. Palladium.

The Widow and her Son.

The sunset hour! how many hail
Rejoicing at its glow,
Bordering with golden hues the veil
That twilight spreads below.

Gladly the peasant sees its fire
Tinging the old tree stems,
Turning church window, roof, and spire,
In gold and living gems.

The lover hails its reign on earth,
For then he knows full soon,
The loved one from her home comes forth,
To wander 'neath the moon;

But never may its fleeting waves
So fittingly be shed,
As on the hallowed place of graves,
The city of the dead!

So thinks the pale and silent one
Who seeks her husband's tomb;
With him went down her cheering sun,
And all around was gloom.

Yet, in darker skies there are
Some little streaks of light,
Still shines for her one lonely star,
When all besides is night.

She brings that living treasure here,
With awed and reverend tread,
Yet, with the love that casts out fear,
She stands beside the dead.

Her home hath grown a lonely place,
Though friends may gather there—
Without the one beloved face,
What pleasure can she share?

Her home!—no more her house may claim
A word so very dear,
The only spot that hath that name
For her on earth is here!

Now hath it grown a daily joy,
To steal from friends and Kin,
And by this tomb, with that fair boy,
To talk of him within.

Each day she lists with ear intent,
To all he can impart,
She builds her husband's monument
Within that orphan's heart.

And who can tell but after years
May witness to the power
A mother's words and prayers and tears,
Can have at sunset's hour?

When dark temptations shall be his,
Perhaps this thought shall save;
'My mother warned me once of this,
Beside my father's grave!'

Well, painter, didst thou choose the hour
To paint the widowed one,
Beneath the magic and the power
Of that declining sun.

This is the spot her heart holds dear—
This is her happiest time—
Her gentle spirit rises here
To something of sublime.

If 'midst her sorrow, hope, or pride,
Her heart may overspread;
'Tis when these twain are by her side—
The living and the dead.

The Portraits.

Did you ever hear the story of the two Portraits? Come, I will tell it to you; for it is a striking one.

A painter who wanted a picture of innocence, drew the likeness of a child at prayer. The little suppliant was kneeling by the side of his mother, who regarded him with tenderness. The palms of his lifted hands were reverently pressed together; his rosy cheeks spoke of health, and his mild blue eye was upturned with an expression of devotion and peace. This portrait of young Rubert was highly prized by the painter; for he had bestowed on it great pains: he hung it up in his study, and called it innocence.

Years rolled along, and the painter became an aged man; but the picture of Innocence still adorned his study walls. Often had he thought of painting a contrast to his favorite portrait; but opportunity had not served.—He had sought for a striking model of guilt, but had failed to find one. At last, he affected his purpose by paying a visit to a neighboring jail.

On the damp floor of his dungeon, lay a wretched culprit, named Randal, heavily ironed. Wasted was his body, worn was his cheek, and anguish unutterable was seen in his hollow eye; but this was not all; vice was vissible in his face, guilt was branded as with a hot iron on his brow, and horrid imprecations burst from his blaspheming tongue.—The painter executed the task to the life, and bore away the successful effort of his pencil. The portrait of young Rubert and old Randal were hung, side by side in his study; the one representing Innocence the other Guilt.

But who was young Rubert who kneeled in prayer by the side of his mother in meek devotion? And who was old Randal, who lay concealed on the dungeon floor, cursing and blaspheming? Alas! the two were one! —Young Rubert and old Randal were the same. Led by bad companions into the paths of sin, no wonder that young Rubert found bitterness and sorrow. The brow which in childhood was bright with peace and joy, in years became darkened by guilt and shame; and that heart which was once the abode of happiness, afterwards became the habitation of anguish. Fathers tell the tale to your children! Mothers whisper it in the ears of your lisping ones, that they may know betimes the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and the exceeding deceitfulness of the human heart. Well may youth and age walk humbly before God, putting up the prayer, 'Keep me as the apple of the eye, hide me under the shadow of thy wings.' Psalms xvii. 8.—Thoughts for the Thoughtful.

Sabbath School Influence.

Two little children in Washington city were out to gather such fuel as they could pick up. Passing by a fence where a plank had fallen, one said to the other 'Take that.' I cant was the reply. 'O take it along—it is worth more than all you have gotten,' was the unjust rejoinder. 'I tell you I can't,' said the other.—'Why can't you?' was the question asked.—'Because I go to the Sunday School and it is wicked to steal,' said the other. So the plank remained undisturbed. Sunday Schools are cheaper than dogs, or watchmen or jails.

The Miller Theory.

CALCULATIONS OF PROPHETIC TIME.

The whole history and consequent excitement in relation to the burning up this material world 1843, rests on assumptions of dates, periods and events—assumptions as contradictory to and destructive of each other, when carefully and candidly examined, as they are unfounded in Scripture rightly interpreted. Among these, the assumptions in relation to what is called prophetic time stands forth most prominently. These are,

1st, That the '70 weeks' named in Daniel's prophecies are weeks of seven days each, instead of being weeks of years—and that these days are prophetic time in which, (it is asserted,) each day means one year of Jewish time, or ecclesiastical time as reckoned under the Law, namely, of twelve months of 30 days each, or of 360 days.

2d. That a day in prophesy, (and consequently every day named by Daniel and the Revelator in their terms of 2300 days, 1260 days of 42 months, 1290 days, and 1335 days,) means a year of Jewish time, as aforesaid.

3d. That our years, (this is to say, the years of common Christian era,) are, in calculations to be counted the same as the Jewish sacred years, though one is but 360 days long, and the other is 365 days and 6 hours nearly, in length.

4th. That a 'time' measures a year; 'times,' two years; and 'dividing of the times,' (or half a time) means half a year each, of which years (and as proportion for their parts includes 360 days, each of which days to be computed as a year of Jewish time, as before named.

I might proceed to state several other glaring and untenable assumptions—for 'their name is legion'—but these are probably as many as, if not more than, I can dispose of in the present article.

1st. By turning to Daniel ix. 24—27, the reader can see his prophecy of the 70 weeks. Daniel had been considering the 70 years of captivity prophesied by Jeremiah, (verse 2,) and had been led to pray for knowledge concerning the judgment denounced upon the Jews in the law of Moses, and forgiveness of his people—verse 11, 19. In answer to his prayer, Gabriel was sent to inform him how long it would be before the Messiah, 'the prophet' promised by Moses, (in Deut. xviii. 15,) would appear to do what is stated in verse 24 and onward. Now let us consider what kind of time was in Daniel's mind.—He was thinking of years. The Jews reckoned time by sevens. They had weeks of days, and weeks of years.

See Leviticus xxv. 'seven years' and 'Sabbaths of years.' Weeks of years and Sabbaths of years were as common phraseology among them, as weeks of days. How natural, then, that the prophet should be informed and understand and use the term weeks in relation to years, when years were in his mind, and when the events predicted would most probably require at least many years instead of days, for their accomplishment. It is therefore, a mere assumption—an assumption that cannot be sustained—to say that the 70 weeks of Daniel are weeks of days, each of which days means a year of Jewish time. Of this, more as we proceed.

2d. The term 'day' in prophecy does not mean a year in any case, unless where that definition is specially stated. Mr. Miller and his friends rely for proof on Genesis xxix. 27; Numbers xiv. 34, and Ezekiel iv. 5, 6. We will examine their proofs. Genesis xxix. 27 —'Fulfill her week, and I will give her this also, for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven other years.' This is the language of Laban to Jacob, after he fraudulently imposed Leah on him, when Jacob had served seven years for Rachel. Jacob demands Rachel. Laban tells him as in the text. What is his meaning? Mr. Miller understands it to mean that he shall fulfill seven years. But the allusion is to the marriage rites which continue one week, Judges xiv. 17. Jahn's Archeology, §154. Laban virtually said, 'Fulfill to Leah her week of festivity, and then you may commence another seven years' service for Rachel.' He could not mean, 'Fulfill seven years' service of Leah;' for Jacob had already served seven years for her. He could not mean fulfill Rachel's seven years;' for he afterwards mentions, the seven years' service for her, to begin only after the week shall have fulfilled. This proof fails, then, to support Mr. Miller's assumption.

Numbers xiv. 33, 34—'and your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years.—After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, (each day for a year,) shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years; and ye shall know my breach of promise.' Any person of common discernment and unbiased mind can perceive this is not given as a general rule—the case is a special one—and even here Mr. Miller's assumptions is not sustained. The past forty days are a matter of mere history, and are referred to as being emblematical of the coming forty years, which are first, and expressly named in verse 33, as the prophecy. Forty years, then, is the prophecy, and not the forty days.

Taking Mr. Miller's rule, then, every day of those forty years, must mean a year of Jewish time; so that the Jews must have wandered in the wilderness 14,400 years!—When will they enter the promised land, under command of Joshua, the son of Nun?

Ezekiel iv. 5, 6. The reader may examine the passage. It is the direction of God to the prophet, to emblem the house of Israel, a predicted siege of Jerusalem, by lyng on his side before a tile and an iron pan, as many days as there were years in the seige of the city which was prophecied. God says in reference to this act of the prophet, 'I have appointed thee each day for a year.' Now in all this special case—for there is no intimation whatever, that this was to be a general rule—it is evident that the years are the prophecy, and the days but the emblem: for it is so stated. Consequently, the days were counted as days only; and the years as years only. We perceive, then, that every one of Mr. Miller's proofs for his general rule, utterly fail him—the first has no application to the subject; the other two are special cases, even if they did apply; but they do not apply. Now, if it was a settled and universal (or even only a general) rule to count every prophetic day for a year, why should God give such special directions in those two cases, and confine those directions to these special cases? Or, why were no such directions given to any other prophet—especially Daniel? The truth is, Mr. Miller has assumed it, not only without proof, but as will yet be shown, contrary to facts.

In Dan. x. 2, 3, three weeks are historically named: and in verse 13, in the vision, the historical part—the time during which the angel was prevented from coming to answer Daniel Cyrus is probably meant—he did not reign 21 years, consequently but three little weeks are meant in both cases. Jonah's prophecy is well known, that Nineveh should be overthrown in 40 days—did he mean forty years? In Genesis vii. 4, ect, 'seven days' and 'forty days and forty nights' are named prophetically—does it mean as many years? That would have been a long flood for Noah! Joshua i. 13, it is prophecied that in three days the Jews would pass over Jordan—if it meant three years, then they wandered in the wilderness 43 years instead of 40! Mr. Miller's wonderful rule for calculating prophetic time? Not in the Bible! But more anon.

3. Mr. Miller and his followers virtually admit that the prophetic year includes only 12 months of 30 days each; that is to say, only 360 days—for they make the 42 months of the Revelator equal to the 1260 days of Daniel—Thus 42×30=1260. 'A time times and dividing of time,' equals three and a half years (42 months) they admit to be years of only 360 days each. But when they come to calculate years, of 365 days, are counted by them as one year, only! thus putting down a year of our reconing, as if it was no longer than a year of Jewish time. These 5 days and six hours excess in our years over a Jewish year, would make about 26 years of error which taken from 1842, would bring the world to an end in 1817, by Mr. Miller's own calculations corrected! And this is not all. It is well known, and universally admitted, that our common chronology is not correct by four years—that in reality this present year called 1842, is A. D. 1846. Mr. Miller, in his edition of his Lectures published in 1835, when he yet had plenty of time to spare, cautiously alluded to this error in our common chronology, on page 40. 'All these things will take place in the commencing of the last day, which if I am right [mark his ifs!] in my calculations of the times, will come to pass in the year 1843; that is if [another if!] our chronology since the crucifixion [why not say *birth?] of Jesus Christ is right; if not [another if!] then it will vary accordingly.—Some say [if he has at all examined the subject, he knows that all agree,] we have lost four years; if so, [another if, the old gentleman is full of them,] then we may look for the fulfilment in 1839—but I believe we may not expect it until 1843, which I have strong reason to believe is the true time, [why?] from the events that happened in 1798. He had fixed on the French Revolution as fulfilling a part of his calculations, 'and therefore in defiance of generally admitted facts, and without a scrap of Scripture, he must fix on 1843 as the time! Oh, what a blundering, force work, fact disregarding, and Bible denying system of calculations! Now take the four years of undeniable error in his result.—That deducted from 1843, by Mr. Miller's own rule, would prove that this material world had actually burned up in 1839!!!

4th. That the word time, when used to denote period, (or a term of duration,) means a year I do not deny, but contend that it does not mean 365 years—still less 365 and a fourth years. In order to multiply his seeming calculations, however, Mr. Miller presses this word into every possible shape. He even quotes Leviticus xxvi. 24, ('Then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins,) where it is very doubtful if the word is used at all to expres a period of time but only a numerical amount of the repetitions of punishments, as in the context. See Leviticus xxvi. 18, 21, 24 and 28. But to see how absurd it is to assume (as he does; for he offers no warrant of Scripture for it) that each of these years mean 360 of Jewish years or of our common years, turn to Jeremiah xxv. 11, 12, and 70 years of captivity for the Jews in Babylon, are predicted. Multiply these 70 phrophetic years by 360, (the days of the Jewish year) and it will give you 25,200 years of common time. By Mr. Miller's rule, the Jewish captivity in Babylon has yet a long time to run! Or turn to Daniel iv. 23–32, where 'seven times' are prophesied as the duration of Nebuchadnezzar's lunacy; and multiply those 7 years by 360, and you will find that by Mr. Miller's rule the poor monarch will continue to eat grass like an ox until sometime about 1950—more than a hundred years hence! So with his calculation of months. Turn to Ezekiel xxxiv. 13, and you will find a prophecy declaring that the burying the slain armies of Gog shall occupy 'seven months,' which by Miller's rule, it must have occupied 210 years —rather a long burial time!

I did not mean, when I began, to be very grave, in treating this subject, and to suppress every feeling of mirth and contempt which the blunders of these men might excite. But the plain truth of the matter is, that it is so full of the ludicrous, especially when you keep them to their own rules of calculation, that I could not even keep my pen from laughing—as the compositor will probably testify! Br. A. C. Thomas (to whom I am greatly indebted for what I have furnished in this article,) says, the Miller theory is constructed on the principle of the jointed snake—wherever it is touched it breaks! The saying is a true one, as any one may see, by taking up the subject at any part, and applying Mr. Miller's own rules to it, and to passages of Scripture similar to those he uses. But still, so long as men, women and children suffer themselves to be first frightened, they will be unable to detect the blunders, and believe it. Therefore, it is necessary that the cool, patient, rational portion of community should have some few facts, by the right use of which they may be able to soothe the fears of the excited portion. These materials will, I trust, be found in this article.—Magazine & Advocate.

*Mr. Miller's calculation of the 70 weeks is made with reference to the crucifixion of Christ but his calculation of 2300 days, and of the 'seven times, &c. take in the whole of our common chronology before and after the birth of Christ. Hence my question. A. B. G.

MILLER'S THEORY REFUTED. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

FOURTH EDITION OF CONFERENCE HYMNS. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'

Price $1,25 per dozen—12 1-2 cents single.

LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

EVERY THREATENING EXPLAINED. Universalists all know the importance of a right understanding of those parts of Scripture, commonly designated by the term THREATENINGS. Although such passages are relied on by many to disprove the doctrine of Universalism, it is well known, that, when understood according to their original intent, they furnish not the slightest evidence against that doctrine, but rather the contrary. All that is necessary to do, to convince men of this, is to persuade them to examine without prejudice, the arguments which have been advanced on these subjects. There are two works which are particularly designed to throw light on this class of passages.

THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM, after having given a very brief history of Universalism, —and stated the opinions entertained by Universalists, and the Scriptural arguments adduced by them to support those opinions, takes up and explains the passages which have been used to sustain the doctrine of endless misery.—In the course of the examination of these texts, the following subjects are explained:

Lowest hell.	Worm dieth not.
Perish forever.	Damned.
Day of wrath.	All likewise perish.
Wicked turned into hell.	Rich Man and Lazarus.
Fire and brimstone.	Cannot see God.
Everlasting burnings.	Shall not see life.
Everlasting contempt.	Wrath of God.
Burned, root and branch.	Resurrection of damnation.
Wrath to come.	Die in your sins.
Unquenchable fire.	Pray not for the world.
Hell fire.	Son of perdition.
Strait and narrow way.	What must I do to be saved?
Outer darkness.	Judgment to come.
Day of judgment.	Anathema Maranatha.
Destroy soul and body.	Judgment seat of Christ.
Sin against Holy Ghost.	Everlasting destruction.
End of the world.	After this the judgment.
Furnace of fire.	Fearful judgment.
Lose his own soul.	Better resurrection.
Shall not enter heaven.	God is a consuming fire.
Without wed. garment.	Sin unto death.
Damnation of hell.	Judgment of the great day.
Ten virgins.	Vengeance of eternal fire.
Sheep and Goats.	Second death.
Everlasting punishment.	Lake of fire and brimstone.
Judas.	Smoke ascendeth forever.
Eternal damnation.	Unjust be unjust still.
Fire never quenched.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS, takes up all these subjects from the New Testament, and explains them in the language of the Orthodox Commentators themselves.—That work consists of 'selections' from the most learned of the Orthodox Commentators, which show that they in their wisdom and honesty, in former times, explained the most of these subjects, almost precisely as Universalists now do.

In this view, the 'Plain Guide' and 'Paige's Selections, are companions to each other; they furnish a large amount of valuable criticism on the subjects above named.

BALFOUR'S INQUIRIES. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, Boston, 'THREE INQUIRIES—1st. Into the Scriptural Doctrine concerning the Devil and Satan. 2d. The Extent and Duration expressed by the terms Olim-Aion, and Aionios, rendered Everlasting, &c. &c. in the Bible, and especially when applied to punishment. 3d. The New-Testament doctrine concerning the Possession of Devils. By WALTER BALFOUR, of Charlestown. Price $1.

ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM. SECOND EDITION. Just received and for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'The Ancient History of Universalism, from the commencement of the Christian Era to the time of the Reformation.' By HOSEA BALLOU 2d., of Medford. Price $1 per copy. A suitable discount to those who buy to sell again. It is a highly valuable work.

BOOK OF PROMISES. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. BULFINCH EMMONS. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS. 'Selections from Eminent Commentators who have believed in punishment after death; wherein they have agreed with Universalists in the interpretation of Scriptures relating to Punishment. By Rev. LUCIUS R. PAIGE. Second Edition, with revisions and additions. 358 pages.—Price $1.

This is a highly valuable work to all Universalists.—It proves by the most respectable orthodox authority, that the interpretations which Universalists have given of the passages of Scripture which relate to punishment, are correct. It is a refutation of endless misery by the testimony of the most learned writers who have believed that doctrine. The threatenings of punishment, occuring in the New Testament, which have been supposed to refer to endless misery, are explained in this work, in the very language of the Partialist Commentators. It is fatal to the doctrine of endless misery.

DODS' SHORT SERMONS. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the new stereotyp. edition of 'DODS' SHORT SERMONS,' with addition of several important articles. These Sermons have been regarded by the Universalist public with great favor. The first edition was taken up with avidity.—At the request of many friends, the author was induced to revise the work, and add many important essays on deeply interesting subjects; in which the author has thrown much light on subjects that have been regarded as very difficult to be understood. 'Mr. Dods,' says a distinguished correspondent, 'has done much to throw light on the sacred volume. Many of his expositions have struck us with great force. He has given us great light. Difficult subjects are explained clearly by him.'

Price of the work 75 cents. Wholesale dealers will and it to their interest to call at 37 Cornhill.

Reasons for leaving the Episcopal Church.

BY REV. C. F. LEFEVRE.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I have had it in my mind for some time past to write you a long letter and leave it with yourself after the perusal thereof, to give it publicity in the columns of your paper, or to lay it aside as most suitable for private consideration. To the exercise of that choice I still leave you.

You know, Br. Whittemore, that 'after the straitest sect,' I was educated a Churchman. My father is a clergyman of that Church in England, and I have uncles and cousins to any reasonable amount, and some of them occupying the 'high seats' in the Establishment. I was ordained by Dr. Howley, the present Archbishop of Canterbury, in the palace at Fulham, Dec. 21, 1821. The services were performed in the Bishop's private Chapel, and there were about a dozen of us ordained at the same time. I was sent out to this country in the capacity of Missionary, by the 'Society for propagating the gospel in Foreign parts.' On my arrival, I was appointed by the Bishop of Quebec, to the charge of the Church at Sherbrook, a new and small settlement on the river St. Francis, in the district of the same name, and about thirty miles from the line which separates the State of Vermont from Lower Canada.

I published in the 'Univeralist Union,' a year or two since, two articles entitled, 'A page from my Experience,' in which I gave a very succinct account of the steps by which I was brought to embrace my present views; it is therefore unnecessary that I should go over that ground again. Perhaps you may think well enough of those articles to insert them in some future paper,* for which purpose I have sent you a copy of them. I shall only now refer to three particulars. First, that my faith originated entirely in my own convictions, as deduced from a faithful examination of the Scriptures; and that it was not thrust upon my notice by hearing Universalist preachers, or by reading works on their form of doctrine. Secondly, I was confirmed in this faith from the fact, that when I made my sentiments publicly known, there was a very large proportion of my congregation who had long been believers in the same doctrine, though I never knew it, nor even suspected it; for the minister is about the last person who knows what heresies are rife in his Church. Those who thus believed were the best informed, the most exemplary and the sterling part of my Society. Thirdly, while I was assured from the above fact, that 'Universalism would do to live by,' I was permitted in the providence of God, before I left the Provinces, to see that 'it would do to die by.' I beheld its sustaining influences in the last hours of a venerable professor, who at the advanced age of ninety, went in triumph to the tomb, blessing God who had called him into 'the marvellous light of the gospel.' These two last facts, Br. Whittemore, were of great value to me, especially at that crisis. I was frequently 'twitted' with the remark, that none but the low and vile and vicious heeded the doctrine of 'Universal Salvation,' when I could turn upon the opposer and direct him to the most virtuous and respectable portion of the community, the very bone and sinew of my Church, as believers of that doctrine—people whom the voice of calumny had never assailed even with 'the appearance of evil.' As this was one of those arguments that could not be denied, it put to silence the gain-sayers. Then, again, when I was exhorted, which was not unfrequently the case, to renounce a faith which would desert me in the trying hour of death and leave me without a shelter, I could narrate to them my interview with the dying professor, and describe how calmly! how gloriously! how brightly! his last sun set, without one cloud to obscure the serenity of his mind, and again the mouth of the opposer was stopped.

When I was cited to appear at Quebec, to answer for my heresy, some circumstances took place which may not be uninteresting to your readers. After I had acknowledged the charge, brought forward my strong reasons and avowed my inflexible resolution to proclaim publicly the great salvation, the Bishop, Dr. Charles James Stewart, now deceased, closed the Conference in the following words:—'Mr. Lefevre, you are now leaving our Church and ministry. I am sorry for it. I am still more sorry for the reasons which have induced you to take this step. I indulge the hope that you will still see your error and return to the true fold. I look upon this to be an occasion calling for solemn fasting and prayer to God, that he may turn your feet from the error of your ways. I shall spend the day in this manner myself, and I hope that you, gentlemen, (addressing the arch-deacon and several other clergymen who had been present at my examination,) will feel it your duty to take part in the same humiliation. Mr. Lefevre, I wish you well, and may God bless you.' The good Bishop was very much moved, and it was with great difficulty that he could speak. I was not much less affected myself, for I had always largely shared in his affections, and I knew how painful the separation, and the cause of it, was to him. These are the last words that I ever heard him utter. He has corresponded with me since on business, but I never saw him afterwards in the flesh. He has long since gone to his rest. I look forward that he will yet see that I am a member of that great fold of which Jesus Christ is equally my shepherd and his shepherd.

I had now left the Church, its honors, patronage and emoluments, and was 'adrift in the world.' It was, I assure you, no enviable situation, and nothing but the conviction of having acted a conscientious part, could have rendered it supportable. I quitted Quebec in somewhat melancholy mood and reached Three Rivers. Here it was reserved for me to drink some of the dregs of the bitterness of my cup. The clergyman who for eight pleasant years had been to me as a brother, 'set his face against me,' and wrote me a letter informing me, 'that though he respected me as a man, yet that 'having denied the faith,' he no longer acknowledged me as a Christian or a brother.' I now understood what I had never before experienced, and that was, what was meant by 'suffering for Christ's sake and the gospel.' I replied to that gentleman's letter, but I did not preserve a copy. The tenor of it simply was, that 'if it was his pleasure to dissolve fellowship with me, it might have been as effectually accomplished without insulting me, and ungenerously wounding my feelings.' This closed all correspondence with that individual, and in all my experience it was 'the severest cut of all.' I committed his uncharitable letter to the flames, that I might never again come across it and feel 'that iron which enters the soul.' One other clergyman in Canada treated me with great unkindness, and he was one from whom I had claims for a very different treatment. With much trouble I succeeded in extricating that gentleman from a difficulty so serious that it well nigh cost him his situation. Since my residence in the United States I have been ill treated by two clergymen likewise. One Reverend Doctor openly insulted me in a public store in the city of New York. The day may yet come when he may repent his unchristian and ungentlemanly conduct. With these very few exceptions I have nothing to bring against my former brethren in the ministry; and as I know that wherever the creed of a Church is a partialist one, bigotry is one of its legitimate fruits. I have never laid up these things against the Church itself.

My next stage on my homeward journey brought me to Drummondville. I had received such a shock at Three Rivers, that I was somewhat chary of getting along side of another of these 'successors of the apostles.' I, therefore, put up at a little tavern, a miserable place of accommodation, but the only one the settlement afforded. My good brother here had not lost all sympathies for me, though I was tainted with heresy, but took me to his house to dinner. I met at his table a Roman Catholic clergyman, a very excellent and devoted man, with whom I had the pleasure of sailing to Europe some years since, and with whom I travelled on the Continent. I have just introduced him here for the purpose of mentioning a conversation that took place during dinner. While the Protestant clergyman expressed his unqualified astonishment at my 'strange vagary,' the Catholic contended that there was nothing strange in it. 'You allow (says he) the right of private interpretation of the Scriptures, and confess the Scriptures alone, without the authority of the Church in explaining them, to be a sufficient guide for faith and practice.—Mr. Lefevre has availed himself of this liberty, and now you thrust him from your bosom, for using the freedom which you have granted him. He sees no more reason for a literal construction of those passage which involve the doctrine of the Trinity, than you see in those plainer declarations in which are contained the doctrine of transubstantiation. Christ says, 'This is my body and this is my blood.' And again, 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.' Now there are no passages in the Scriptures in which the Trinity is taught half so plain as these in which transubstantiation is taught. You may explain them away and call the doctrine of the Catholic Church on this point, a foolish fantasy, or an absurdity, and Mr. Lefevre may with equal truth say the same of the Trinity. As for me, I take sides with Mr. Lefevre, and contend that his expulsion from the Church is as cruel as it is unjust.'

The Protestant clergyman reminded his Catholic brother in reply, that although private interpretation was allowed to a certain extent, yet that the Church had surrounded herself with THIRTY-NINE Articles, and that no private interpretation must interfere with them. Mr. Lefevre might have his peculiar views, if he pleased, so that they did not infringe upon the fundamentals as set forth in those Articles; and that these were as sacred as the Scriptures themselves, since they all might be proved by plain declarations of Holy Writ.'

This attempt to escape the argument of the Catholic, called up a smile on his countenance, and he quietly added in reply, 'I do not, I confess, see a very wide difference between your Church and ours in respect to Christian liberty. Our Church claims to be the interpreter of the Scriptures and demands of all in her communion an acquiescence in her decisions. Your Church gives the liberty of private interpretation, but if the individual in the exercise of this liberty arrives at an opposite conclusion from the Church, you thrust him out. We honestly tell a man that he is bound to listen to the voice of the Church; you treacherously tell him, he is free to read and expound for himself, and then you punish him for using his liberty. Which rope is the longest?'

I have given you this conversation to show that when Limitarian Churches deal harshly with heretics, they are but walking in the steps of that Church which they affect to despise. I took a friendly, I may say, an affectionate leave of my good brother at Drummondville, and reached my home without further adventure. As it was late in the week, and some time must elapse before I could remove my family, I passed my next Sabbath in my old Church—that Church which had entirely grown up under my supervision, and in which I had so many dear and attached friends. But I was only allowed to be 'a hearer of the word and not a doer of the work.' My pulpit was supplied by a minister bigotted, hot-headed and wrathy. For one hour did I sit under the peltings of a pitiless storm of envenomed arrows. He represented those who embraced this abominable heresy of God's infinite love and Christ's full salvation, as worse than Deists or Atheists; they were the most immoral, licentious, and dangerous of men. In this way did this crazy man rave, and that too before an audience and church the very pillars of which were believers in that sentiment. Did he advance Episcopacy, or injure Universalism, by such a rash proceeding? No, indeed. If he had only known what he was about, he would have seen that he was planting a dagger in the vitals of the cause he wished to promote, and nourishing that doctrine which he was laboring to uproot. I never saw an audience more disgusted, and I never heard disgust more openly and generally expressed. That violent man himself became a heretic, severed himself from the Episcopal Church, and has reaped in his own experience a harvest of that bitterness the seed of which he had so plentifully sown himself. 'Be not deceived; God is not mocked: what a man soweth that also shall he reap.'

I was not sorry that the regulations of the Church excluded me from the pulpit, even though it was to bid my dear people farewell. I do not think, Br. Whittemore, that I could have gone through that furnace unscathed. For eight years had we lived together in unbroken harmony and sweet communion. I had baptized the lambs of the flock, joined in connubial bands the young men and maidens, and accompanied to its final resting place the ancient and revered sire. That trial, however, the bidding adieu from my pulpit, was spared me.

It was a bright morning in the Autumn, when I collected my little family, a wife and three young children, the oldest in her seventh year, and turned my back upon my home and my Church. I shall never forget the moment when I gave the last fond look. The good people in my own village and through every other on my way to the Lines, of all denominations, would come out and greet myself and wife and wish us 'Godspeed.' Many thought I had acted a very wrong part, more that I had been hasty; but most that I had been impolitic. In one opinion, however, all concurred, which was that the move was at least a disinterested one. I was never accused even by the most virulent opponent of having betrayed the interests of the Church through a love, or for the sake of lucre.

Having left my Church, my home and my country, I directed my course towards the south. An effort was made to retain me in Canada, and the people would willingly have supported me. But I was unwilling to be a burden on them. I knew that the promises they might make under excited feelings, they might not afterwards have the ability to perform. Other considerations also came into the account. I had just built a spacious brick house and owed for it, and a favorable opportunity occurring to dispose of it, I considered it my duty to avail myself of it, that the honest mechanic might not suffer for his pay. I do not know, on consideration, that I need make any mystery of this business; so I will state in just so many words, that the Bishop offered to buy my house at the price of the contract, if I would not preach my doctrine in his Diocese. That offer I accepted. It was my only prospect of fulfilling the injunction 'owe no man any thing.' I paid all to the uttermost farthing, and taking the remnant with me, which was small enough, steered to the south. One remark, however, I must here make. 'Buying me off' did not buy off the doctrine in men's hearts, nor did it make Universalism look more like error. The people said, 'So, so, the Bishop answers Mr. Lefevre's arguments not by an appeal to the Scriptures, but by an appeal to his necessities. We are now more convinced than ever that Mr. Lefevre is right and the Church wrong.' You know, Br. Whittemore, how this measure has operated. When the voice of Universalism was never heard in public and when only here and there a scattering believer could be found, there are now through that section of country several large Societies and they enjoy stated preaching. But I will let this pass.

When I left my parish, my heart and my head were so full that I never thought of asking for my certificates and testimonial- stating the reasons for this unusual proceeding. Indeed, I never in my life, that I can remember, applied for such documents on any occasion. I always thought that a man's life and conversation were his better letters of recommendation, and if they did not answer, nothing could supply their place. But I could not but feel gratified when some weeks after my arrival in New York, a most friendly and affectionate letter was addressed to me by my parishioners, and signed by all the various denominations. A copy was also sent to the different newspaper offices in Canada and published in the secular journals. I never took any pains to make this public in this country. I have still, however, the copy. I was once advised in Troy to publish the same in the city papers, but I declined. If any one told me that it was reported about that I had left the Church from improper conduct, I used to say, let them go to Mr. Butler, the Episcopal clergyman, and he will tell them another story. I referred to Mr. Butler because he knew all the circumstances of the case. The clergyman who was stationed in the next parish to my own was married to a young lady from Mrs. Willard's Seminary, by Mr. Butler himself, and thus Mr. B. had a statement of the whole affair. I heard that Mr. Butler always did me justice in this particular, so that I was no more troubled with reports injurious to my moral character.

I had now fairly passed the Rubicon, and had got down into the State of New York.—My course from that hour to the present is pretty well known. I was received by the Universalists with open arms and I shall always owe them a debt of gratitude and love for their liberality. It is the only debt that I cannot discharge. I am pleased to feel in their debt. They have fed and clothed me and mine, and I can truly say that I have never lacked for any thing needful. 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.' If I forget them, 'may my right hand forget her cuming; yea, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I prefer not them.'

I wish now to talk a little about the Church which I have left, and I think that I can do so very dispassionately. If I know my own heart, (a difficult knowledge, I confess,) I have no prejudices against her, even if I have no partialities for her. I sit very quietly aside from her, neither courting her favor nor fearing her frown. We parted in friendship. She ever treated me well, and I would not speak against her uncharitably or unkindly. But it does not follow that I should be blind to her failings, or that I should be tongue-tied in speaking of them.

First, I come to notice the 'robing of the clergy.' I do not like, to speak nautically, of this rigging up.' I never did like it even when obliged myself to observe it. I attended one year, what is called a 'visitation of the Bishop,' which was held in the Parochial Church in Montreal. The clergy of both the Provinces were present, and the order of the day was, that all should come to Church in their robes. That day the street was full of black-robed gentry. I thought of the humble Jesus and the modest and simple disciples of Galilee, and compared it with this scene of ostentation, and blushed at the difference.—But the most striking case of offence to me, (perhaps because I got a rebuke,) occurred in my own parish. The Arch-deacon, Dr. Mountain, at present Bishop of Lower Canada, passed through my section of the country. He preached in my Church in the morning, and in the afternoon there was an appointment in a little log School-house, in a remote corner of the parish. The Doctor mounted his horse with a huge roll of cloth at the back of his saddle fastened by a strap. I accompanied on my own horse but took no extra garments with me. Having arrived in safety at the appointed place, the Doctor unstrapped his bundle, and it was carried into a house nearest to the school-room. Here commenced the work of 'rigging up.' The Doctor is an immense man, six feet two or three inches high, and broad in proportion. First the under garments were to be put on, then was to be thrown over all the vast and flowing robe, and then in quality of Master of Arts of the University of Cambridge, a broad scarf; and the bands under the chin completed the costume. Now as I had brought no dress with me, I got what people in office call 'a rap over the knuckles,' for my remissness.—It was in vain that I urged that the inconvenience of carrying such appendages was great and that the people were unused to such exhibitions; I was at once silenced by the remark, that it was neccessary to support the dignity of the Church. When the Doctor entered the school-room, where the people had for some time been assembled waiting our arrival and anxiously looking for the great man from Quebec, I had a fair opportunity of seeing the effect which his dignity produced. The men stared, the women looked amazed, and the children were scared.—They had never seen 'such a shew' before.—It was fortunate that I had not my robes on; as it was, the Doctor took up a good share of the school-room. This display so far from recommending the Church to notice, excited a universal feeling of disaffection. I was myself ashamed of it; and I am sure there was not a man or woman in that assembly that did not look upon it as a gross example of pomposity and pharisaism. It had an effect in confirming me in my opinion of the inexpediency of such performances, and I was willing rather to suffer rebuke for disobedience of orders, than subject myself to such remarks, as this appearance of the venerable Arch-deacon elicited from that community. With respect, then, to the robing of the priests, I can only say, that I think it better dispensed with. On the most favorable occasions, such as the regular services of the sanctuary on the Sabbath, it is at best but a foolish and vain appendage. It adds nothing to our devotion or enjoyment of the exercises, and on extra occasions, out of the Church, it is ridiculous.—I never see a clergyman of the Episcopal Church swimming along in his robes, but I think of those old Pharisees who 'made wide their phylactaries and loved greetings in the market places.' This may perhaps be considered as an unreasonable prejudice. It may be so; but it is notwithstanding my feeling.

I come next to speak of the 'liturgy of the Church,' and while I would touch this subject with a careful hand, I would not be restrained from the exercise of my freedom. There are portions of the Church service I highly approve, and others which I as strongly disapprove. Some Episcopalians are so wedded to their prayer-books, that to them the Liturgy is almost an object of idolatry. I never felt that. I look upon the prayers as chaste, simple, devotional, and as such I have derived much spiritual satisfaction in the use of them. But I am not prepared to say that they are, in any respect, better than the prayers offered by ministers in other denominations. By no means. I have felt my heart warmed, and my affections elevated in listening to the extemporaneous invocations of other clergymen, quite as much as they ever were by the regular services of the Church. It is, I conceive, a great mistake in the Church to confine her ministers to this book in the public services. How severely have I felt this! In remote places, in small congregations, in assemblies made up of different professions, perhaps where there are not half a dozen present who can follow the rubric, nothing can be more tiresome both for priest and people than the Church service. Let any one act the 'Missionary,' as I have done, and I am sure he will agree with me in the remarks which I have just made. What I now say, I have often said when a minister myself in that Church and I have heard similar observations from many of my brother clergymen. This restriction on the part of the Church gives to ministers dissenting from her communion a manifest advantage. It was so in Canada where I was settled, When an appointment was made for an evening service, on a week day, by a clergyman of the Church, it was a hard matter to get people to attend. A few Church-going people would be there, but the mass would stay away; they could not endure the tedious formality of the Church service. It was too high a price to pay even for a sermon which might follow. But if a Methodist, Presbyterian, or Baptist, made an appointment, the room was sure to be crowded. Some high Church folks, who had been instructed that it was a sin to encourage heretics, might have withheld the light of their countenance, but the people would go. On this subject I would close with this remark; in regular churches, with an instructed and trained congregation, the services may be profitably and pleasantly conducted according to the Liturgy, but I do not think that the 'Prayer Book' is adapted for extraordinary occasions. To this I may superadd the fact that the custom of continually praying from a book, renders it very difficult for ministers of the Episcopal order to lead in prayer when they may be unexpectedly called upon.

In reference to the doctrines contained in the prayer book, there are many which appear to me very objectionable. I consider the form of 'absolution' to be pronounced by the Priest alone standing, the people kneeling, as a relic of Popery. It matters little whether we go into a confession box, or kneel in a pew, to be 'shrived' by the priest. The doctrine of transubstantiation is taught very plainly in the words of the Catechism: 'What is the inward part or thing signified in the Lord's Supper?' Answer. 'The body and blood of Christ which are verily and indeed taken by the faithful in the Lord's Supper.' I do not say that these things may not be explained away (for what may not be explained away,) but I do say that prima facia they countenance a popish practice, and teach a Romish doctrine.

The 17th article of the Church (of which I quote only the former portion that I may not be tedious) is as purely Calvinistic as any doctrine that ever flowed from the lips of the fierce Genevan Reformer. 'Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation, those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation as vessels of honor,' &c. If this article teaches Calvinism, the 31st does not less clearly teach Universalism. 'The offering of Christ once made is that perfect redemption, propitiation and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world both original and actual,' &c. The articles of the Church are anything but a lucid, simple exposition of the Christian faith. They are written in an old, quaint style, and almost unintelligible, and often one article runs counter to another. I will here introduce an extract from the life of Jeremy Bentham, one of the most able jurists and legislators that England ever produced. 'On the 27th of June, 1760, Bentham's father set out with his son to place him at Oxford. He was called upon to subscribe to the thirty-nine articles of the Established Church, and the necessity threw him into the greatest distress. We cannot but regard it as a singular degree of conscientiousness in one so young, that he should object going through a process which ninety-nine persons out of a hundred look upon as a mere unmeaning form. But he viewed the matter in a higher and more serious light. Understanding that the sole object of such a signature was the declaring, after reflection, with solemnity and upon record, his concurrence in the truth of the propositions to which his name was attached, it seemed to him that he was bound to examine them in that aspect.—He accordingly did so, but with an unfortunate result. In some of their doctrines he could discover no meaning at all, and in others no meaning that he could reconcile either to reason or Scripture. He found that some of his fellow collegiates were sharers in his distress. On inquiry they learned that one of the Fellows of the College was set apart, by virtue of his office, to remove all scruples of the kind we are speaking of, and they immediately repaired to him. But his answers were cold and unsatisfactory, the substance of them being, that it was not for uninformed youths, such as they, to presume to place their private judgment against a public one, formed by some of the holiest as well as the best and wisest men that ever lived. Bentham reluctantly acquiesced in the decision, but through the whole of his after life, he regretted the hypocricy he was forced to practice, and protested vehemently against the despotism which thus applied the discipline of Procrastes to the dictates of the conscience.'

I think that any one who will sit down and carefully read over the thirty-nine articles, will find himself much in the situation of the candid Bentham. Indeed I have often heard clergymen of the Establishment regret that the Church had not a more Scriptural, simple, consistent, and less elaborate exposition of her faith and practice.

The most objectionable part of the whole book is found in the Liturgy. With my present views of the Unity and supremacy of Jehovah, it is little short of downright heathenism. 'O holy, blessed and glorious Trinity, three Persons and one God, have mercy upon us miserable sinners.' Where does the Scriptures sanction such an invocation as that? Is there any affinity between such a prayer as that and the simple words in which the good Teacher taught men to pray? There is none. If it is not a prayer to a plurality of Gods, it is, at all events, to a plurality of PERSONS. THREE PERSONS are invoked.

The English Prayer Book contains the creed of St. Athanasius, than which nothing can be more absurd or uncharitable. I once gave offence to a brother clergyman who was a great 'stickler for the Trinity,' speaking of the Athanasian creed, he observed that Athanasius must have been a profound mathematician to write it, to which I replied that he must be still more profound who could understand it. This creed is read only on certain occasions in the Church, in England, and there are a great many Episcopalians who are unwilling to respond to it, on account of the damnatory clauses which it contains. They are themselves ashamed of it. A story is current among the English clergy that an eccentric old minister once introduced it in this wise: 'The creed as appointed for this festival by the rubric of the Church, is the creed of St. Athanasius, and I hope that it is no other man's creed.' The Episcopal Church in this country has shown great good sense in rejecting it from their ritual, and in several other instances she has made equally judicious alterations.

I am not careful to notice several other things which appear to me serious defects, for I have no unkind feelings to gratify. There is one expression however, in the burial service which is very exceptionable. 'O holy and most merciful Saviour, deliver us not into the bitter pains of eternal death.' Such an expression is wholly unauthorised in Scripture and if it teaches any thing, it is Atheism, or annihilation. I have now pointed out some of the most glaring defects (as they strike me) in the book of Common Prayer. They are few compared to the excellencies that may be found, but I cannot be so captivated by the latter as to be blind to the former.

The claims of the Church to 'Apostolic succession,' and in virtue of that claim to demand the exclusive privilege of conferring ordination and denying to all other ministers the right of preaching the gospel and administering the ordinances, are arrogant and presumptuous. The 'divine right of kings' to oppress their subjects, 'passive obedience' to endure tyranny without redress, or an effort to obtain it, and 'apostolic succession,' denying ministerial qualifications to all who have not submitted to the lordly Bishops, with their lawn sleeves and mitred brows, are all branches of the same stock. With us plain republicans, the 'divine right of kings' is no more than the right of any other rulers—to govern wisely and mercifully those over whom the laws of the country have constituted them magistrates. The obedience of the subject is not passive, but actively and understandingly manifested, acquiescing in and cheerfully maintaining what is right and wholesome, but resisting, in a lawful manner, what is wrong and of injurious tendency. We are not prepared to adopt the language of a haughty and arbitrary English Jurist: 'the people have no other business with the laws but to obey them.' The right of the Episcopal Church is to ordain whom she may see fit, but not to arrogate to herself, in view of her 'apostolic succession,' the exclusive right of ordination, and rob other churches of a power which is equally valid with her own. I had hoped that the good sense of the Church in this country would have kept silence, if even she had not openly disavowed this presumptuous picture, but I very much regret to see, by an occasional glimpse at some of her papers, that she makes now and then a puny effort to 'keep up the farce.' Happily we live in a country where we can smile at her impertinence, and her only offensive weapons are her 'empty boasts,' which hurt nobody.

I have now said what I had to say with respect to the Church and myself, as formerly a minister of that Church. It has long been on my mind to 'speak out' on this subject; for I have felt as if I had an unsettled account.—My mind has been more than usually exercised of late on this subject, from the following circumstance. My family received a visit last October from a very amiable and intelligent lady who was a member of my Church in Canada, but is now living in Boston. She attended the ministrations of the word in Grace Church. Her husband, who is a professional man, and her two sons, her only children, have left the Church (she told it me with sorrow) and are regular attendants at Br. Ballou's Church in School-street, (I heard it with joy). Now this lady informed me that she found it difficult to make the Episcopalians credit the account she gave them of my conversion, so monstrous did it appear in their eyes. She conversed with myself and family on points of faith, attended my Church, and left with the conviction, that, even if my doctrine was monstrous, I was not absolutely a monster myself. Since her return to Boston she has very faithfully sent me the 'The Christian Witness and Church Advocate,' published 362 Washington street. I have no idea, however, that she has any expectation to reconvert me by their perusal. Of that paper I have nothing particular to say. The articles generally are written in a quiet, kind, take-for-granted style; and the spirit of the paper, as far as I have seen, is good. If you think that the respectable editor would receive, in the same spirit in which I offer it, a copy of this communication, pray let him have one. I do not, however, desire or court any thing in the shape of a controversy. I have spoken frankly, openly, and I trust, charitably. I have shaken hands with the Church forever, not because she did not treat me well, for she was ever a kind parent to me; not because I disliked her, for I loved her, but simply because I loved the truth (as I understood it) better. No longer believing in some doctrines which she considered essential, I could not, as an honest man, feed in her pastures and clothe myself with the fleece of her flock. Believing doctrines which I conceived it a duty to proclaim, I did so openly, and so we separated. 'Why (said a gentleman of her communion once to me,) do you preach the doctrine of Universalism?—Cannot you enjoy your private opinion, without publishing it abroad and thus eject yourself from the Church?' I told him I could not. I was set to preach the gospel—the whole gospel, and I could not with a quiet conscience, keep back the most interesting portion. In concluding this long communication I can say of the Church, I love her for the piety and virtue, she may possess, but I cannot love her errors, as they appear to me; I respect her highly for her learning, for she is the parent of many most excellent men and scholars; I dislike her ostentation and arrogance. But as I have lived, so also do I hope to die, in perfect charity with all her members. That I have at times felt unpleasantly from having left her communion, I do not deny. When among my friends in Europe especially, it was unpleasant for me to see the pain which they experience, when to the inquiry of the stranger, who was ignorant of my heresy, 'Why don't he preach to us?' they had to give the very mortifying explanation, 'he has denied the faith.' Nor were the visible effects of this communication very flattering to my feelings. Shakings of the head and cold looks revealed to me but too plainly the truth, how greatly I had fallen in their estimation. But I can say truly 'that none of these things moved me.' When I left the Church, 'I counted the cost,' and I can say in the sincerity of my heart, and with a safe conscience, that since it pleased the Lord 'to deliver me from the house of bondage,' I have never—no, not for one moment, 'lusted after the flesh-pots of Egypt.'

The Sabbath.

The recent general election in France was held, all over the kingdom, on the Sabbath! Are the French preparing for another Revolution? When they abrogated the fourth and seventh commandments a few years since, God stood aloof from them for a season, and a scene of carnage and blood ensued, unprecedented in the annals of the world! Are they willing to try the experiment again?

A New Sect.

A new religious sect, much more strict in discipline than the Methodists, has just been established at Geneva. They are said to be a sort of St. Simonians. They are obliged to hold their meetings outside the town, not being able to procure a place within the walls.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 11, 1843.

Conference at Danvers, Mass.

The storm, Conference at Danvers, great gathering of people, state of religion in Essex County, expected meeting at Lynn, &c. &c.

Last week we had the happiness of attending another spirit-stirring conference meeting in Essex County,—we refer to the conference at Danvers (South-Pasish) on Wednesday, 1st inst.—Our readers will remember that on the evening previous there was a heavy gale and hard rain; and on Wednesday morning came on a driving storm of snow. We never knew the fleece to come down more rapidly—it threatened for a time to render the roads impassable. For 15 miles we faced it, in an exposed situation, and arrived at Danvers, clothed in white. The meeting had just commenced; and shaking off the snow we went in at the commencement of the feast. Preparatory to the Conference, a sermon was delivered, in the forenoon, by Br. L. S. Everett, of Salem. It was on the importance of our conforming in all respects to the requirements of the Saviour, and on our obligations to consecrate all our powers, and all our possessions to the cause of truth and the good of our fellow men. Prayers were offered by Brs. A. A. Davis and Abraham Norwood.

The meeting in the afternoon was holden at 2 o'clock, and before that hour the house was perfectly full, nowithstanding the storm without continued in all its fury. Many of the congregation occupied the aisles, which were entirely blocked up with the multitude, and others stood upon the pulpit stairs, or any other place where there was a square-foot of surface to stand on. There was evidently a great expectation of a good meeting. After singing one of the Conference Hymns, prayer was offered by one of the lay brethren from Marblehead. And then came alternately singing and speaking until the hour for departure. The remarks of the brethren were generally on the power of religion to purify and exalt the perfections, and to give joy to the soul. And one very pleasing circumstance in regard to this meeting was, that the lay brethren were ready and willing, yea even anxious to speak. We do unfeignedly rejoice in the change which is going on in the country in this respect. Our laymen begin to feel a greater interest than ever they did before. Their faith is stronger, and it exerts a great power on their hearts. During public worship, we see it in the intense interest, the moistened eye, the ardent burst of praise, and in the addresses which their full hearts impel them to make.—They have more faith; or in the language of the scripture, they 'grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' Their 'faith groweth exceedingly.' This increase of faith produces an increase of interest. They determine to live more devotedly,—to live religious lives, knowing that they shall then find, yea they do find great joy and peace. Such are the causes which are now bringing our laymen forward to a more active participation in the duties of believers. We are glad to see this state of things; it promises great good to our denomination; it is bringing on our bright days. From these remarks the character of the Conference at Danvers may be somewhat anticipated.

The meeting in the evening was appointed to commence at six o'clock,—too early as many thought. We went to the house a quarter of an hour before the time, and with much difficulty succeeded in forcing a passage through the aisle to the pulpit stairs. The pulpit itself was full of brethren, who had been compelled to resort there for a seat. Two other meetings were held by other sects at the same time; but many of their usual attendants were present at our Conference.

Services were commenced with singing and prayer, and then the brethren spake as they felt moved. We cannot attempt to give an account of each address—we cannot even give the names of the speakers. Some of them we knew not by name; but we recognized the spirit by which they were actuated. Of the clergy Brs. Austin, Everett, Norwood, Willis, Atkinson and Davis spoke. One of the lay brethren took occasion to say, that he thought it unwise for the laymen to wait for the clergy to speak. If they did wait, the thoughts they had in their minds were sure to be anticipated by the clergy, and they were left, either to say nothing, or to repeat what had been said before. Let the laymen, then, said he, 'take the lead.' This was heartily responded to by others. One remarked subsequently that 'the laymen had got the floor, and he hoped they would keep it.' It was inquired by some brother if there were none out by the door (for the aisles and entries ever filled even to the outer door) whose hearts vibrated to the emotions that had been expressed? Whereupon a brother in one of the front corners of the house, gave us an impressive address. It was then asked, if the hearts in the other front section did not also vibrate to the same emotions? An affirmative response was immediately given by a brother, who proceeded to address the congregation. From this the suggestion arose, that the gallery was the only part of the house that was backward. A brother then arose in the gallery, with a heart too full for utterance. He spoke of the prodigal son; and we could perceive by his utterance that his feelings would soon overpower him. The theme was one of powerful interest to him. While he spake, he uttered truth, profitable truth, and all gave heed.

The meeting was closed with prayer, and singing the closing verses of the hymn,

'When I can read my title clear,',

With the chorus,—

'We shall meet at Jesus' feet,
Shall meet to part no more.'

Notice was given that a similar Conference Meeting will be holden in Lynn, on Wednesday, the 15th inst.

Conference at Lynn.

There will be a Union Conference Meeting at Lynn, on Wednesday next, 15th inst. It is expected brethren and sisters will be present from Salem, Marblehead and Danvers. In the desire to accommodate all who will attend without dividing the audience, the meeting-houses will not be used, but public services will be holden in the new Lyceum Hall, which it is said, will seat conveniently 1000 persons. Persons arriving in town may stop at either of the depots; but we think the hall a little nearer the further one. It is expected that our ministering brethren from Boston and vicinity will go down; and we hope to see many of our lay brethren and sisters there from this region.

Rev. Wm. A. Drew versus J. B. Dods.

A long article has appeared in the last 'Gospel Banner,' the effect of which, wherever believed, must be detrimental to Br. Dods. Believing as we do, that he is an injured man, and believing that for at least the last fifteen years of his life, he has conducted with all uprightness and propriety, we are impelled to speak in his behalf.—What he was before this time, we do not absolutely know. We have never seen proof of the charges that are brought against his youth. We do not believe them. As to transactions nearly twenty years ago in Maine, Br. Drew has once exhonerated Br. Dods from all blame, as will be known by those who recollect an extract from one of Br. Drew's papers, published in the 'Trumpet' by Br. Henry Jewell. Br. Drew would fain have us believe that something transpired afterwards to change his mind. That his mind seems to be changed we doubt not; but we cannot say what has changed it. We know that Br. Cobb, of this city, and other good brethren who then lived in Maine have told us, that there was no blame to be attached to Br. Dods in the matters to which Br. Drew has referred, but not named. We believe this the more, because Br. Dods is now a welcome visitor among the Universalists in the very town where the things are said to have occurred, full as welcome we believe as Br. Drew would be. But letting all these things pass for just what they are worth, it is nearly FIFTEEN years since Br. Dods came to Massachusetts. This is a long and sufficient probation.—He has lived in Taunton, Provincetown and in Fall River Let Br. Drew inquire in either of those places as to his character; and if it does not stand as fair as Br. Drew's does in Augusta, (and this is saying nothing against Br. Drew,) then are we indeed deceived by scores of disinterested witnesses.

We believe that the charges brought against Br. Dods in M. H. Smith's pamphlet, (published by Tappan & Dennett,) were grossly false and libellous. Tappan & Dennett made diligent inquiry; spent much time and much money in sending for depositions; and they began to make serious efforts for a defence of themselves. But we judge they saw that they could not prove their most material charges, such as Br. Dods having been sent to Bridewell, in New York, &c. &c. charges as false as they are malicious. But after beating all over the country for evidence, they desired to avoid a trial. They made what we supposed was their first overture to us, in the 'Trumpet' office, an errand on which Mr. Tappan appeared in person. We treated him politely.—He insisted we had furnished the necessary means to carry on the trial. We told him we had not furnished one cent. He insisted then that we had signed a bond to that effect. We told him, at once, that we had furnished neither money nor credit; that Mr. Dods was able to take care of his own case; and that we had nothing to do with it. Mr. Tappan said he wished to have it settled; he did not want it to go to trial; that he was not in fault; that Smith was the real offender, but Smith was not worth a cent, and could not pay the damages; that he (Tappan) was not at home when the contract to publish the pamphlet was made, and that it was done by Dennett, the younger member of the firm; that he regretted it had been done; and that the damages must fall on him. We told him we had nothing to do with the case, and he left us. Thus we know, that the proposition to settle this case came from Tappan & Dennett. We have no absolute knowledge of the fact, but we have not the slightest doubt that between the Attorneys the proposition for a settlement came from Tappan & Dennett's lawyer. Now look at the proposition to which they assented. They consented to be defaulted, and to pay all the costs of Court, besides their own heavy bill to their lawyers and for other matters. This, with the exception of penal damages, is precisely the legal result to which they would have come, if Mr. Dods had triumphantly beaten them in the suit and got a verdict. If Mr. Dods, after such an offer from them, had persisted in having a trial, it would have appeared to the jury that justice was not his object; but that he either sought litigation or cash; and those who know Mr. Dods know that he does not covet either. We do not profess to be fully acquainted with the case; but from some things we do know, we declare solemnly our opinion, that if Tappan & Dennett had gone to trial, before an unbiased jury, they would have utterly lost the action. Mr. Dods did not seek the settlement; and when Tappan & Dennett offered every thing he asked, except cash and litigation, he assented. Is it not, then, exceedingly unchristian and cruel to endeavor to persuade the public, that Mr. Dods consented to a settlement because he was afraid of investigation?

But all these things, let it be remembered, have respect to actions committed by Mr. Dods, if committed at all, years and years ago. For our present convenience, we will suppose him to have been guilty in all things, although we do not believe he was. Shall he not have the privilege to return? Shall we continually harp upon transactions of former years? Does such conduct spring from love? Here we have known Mr. Dods in Massachusetts fifteen years. Can his enemies lay their finger on any fault since he has been among us? Shall a sinner never be received? Shall he be continually taunted about his former life? Br. Drew professes to be a great Washingtonian. Is it consistent with his Washingtonianism to be forever taunting a man with his past life? to be forever blazoning it forth in the public papers to his injury? Br. Drew thinks Br. Dods was once a bad man, and others say they doubt it. But Br. Drew says, 'gentlemen, gentlemen, that won't do. Mr. Dods was a bad man,—he was,—we insist upon it, gentlemen.'—And ever and anon, for former opinion's sake, or something else, this reiteration must be made.—It seems to us Br. Drew ought to say, 'well Mr. Dods has done well for TEN YEARS or more; and although I think he was once in the wrong, I will forget it; and if others say he never was a bad man, let it go so; he is upright now; and we will not always taunt him about his past life.'—But Br. Drew has not taken such a course. Whenever others have spoken a kind word, he has thrust himself into their faces, and insisted that there was something very awful somewhere.—Now, we will not undertake to say what such conduct proceeds from; but we are quite sure it does not proceed from charity.

What saith the word of God in regard to this principle? We read in Ezk. xviii. 21,—'If the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, and keep all my statues, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die. All his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him; in his righteousness that he hath done, he shall live.' We would that passage of Scripture might be remembered by us all.

Br. Drew has endeavored to shield himself under the plea that he never desired to say anything against Mr. Dods; that it has been peculiarly unpleasant to him; and that he did it only because others represented certain old matters in which Br. Drew was concerned as a kind of ecclesiastical prosecutor, too favorably to Mr. Dods. We do not believe they did represent them too favorably; but supposing that they did, why should that disturb Br. Drew? Does it hurt his feelings to see the world lenient to one whom he once attempted to put down? We fear there is an old feeling alive yet. Br. Drew says, 'If he (Dods) behaves well now, that is enough for his present standing; and in a present character for goodness, he shall have our present respect and friendship.' Such respect! Such friendship!—Lord save us. Would he have us believe that he has never been in the habit of opposing Mr. Dods, except when those old matters were misrepresented by Mr. Dods' friends? We have heard what he has poured out into the ears of brethren. We know his assiduity in this matter. We know that he has let very few opportunities pass, without assaulting Mr. Dods, whether anything had been said about old matters or not. When Mr. Dods was appointed a delegate to the U. S. Convention, Br. Drew was much disturbed by that single circumstance; and it gave occasion to some publications from his pen at the time. We are very far from believing that he loves his neighbor Dods as he loves himself; and if he does, he has a very strange way of showing it.

Mr. Dods, as Br. Drew says, is not in fellowship with our denomination. We do not speak of him because there is any denominational responsibility, but because it pains us to see a man we believe to be honest, abused and injured. Br. Drew is welcome to all the glory he can make out of this matter. He seems determined to push it to the full gratification of his feelings. He has omitted no opportunity to prejudice the public against Mr. Dods. He has not only inflicted a wound on him, but he has driven many a dart through the bosoms of his amiable children; and if we are not misinformed, through the bosom of a fond wife also, (the sister of Br. F. A. Hodsdon,) who is now gone 'where the weary are at rest.' We most deeply regret the course Br. Drew has seen fit to pursue; and in our judgment it is no honor to him either as a man, or a Christian. O that he could see himself as others see him. We never heard a man in the world undertake to defend, or in any way apologize for the course of Br. Drew. It appears to us to have been a constant course of vindictiveness.

Br. Drew's course towards ourself has been far from pleasant to us. He has cut us off from that fraternal intercourse which we should have been glad to have enjoyed. But if we must purchase his regard by a sacrifice of honest convictions, we cannot have it; for though we would love our fellow men, yet we would love God and conscience more. We believe Mr. Dods to be an injured man; we believe the course of Br. Drew to have been vindictive and unjustifiable; we cannot approve it, brother though he be; and having the same right to the expression of our opinion that he has to the expression of his, we have written the above. We will endeavor to entertain no hard feelings towards Br. Drew; for the Saviour hath directed us to pray, 'forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors.'

Conversion of another Clergyman.

We learn from the 'Star in the West,' that Rev. Mr. Kelso, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has embraced Universalism. Br. George Rogers states, that he recently fell in with this gentleman at Louisville, Ken., where Mr. Kelso had preached to the Universalist Society for two Sundays. On Sunday, the 8th ult., he was present at Br. Rogers' meeting at Louisville; and on an invitation being given to all who desired to come forward and become members of the Society, Mr. Kelso was the first to advance and affix his name to the Constitution. The following paragraph is from the pen of Br. Rogers:

Br. Kelso preached as a Methodist six years, how acceptably, as regards talent, may be inferred from the fact of his having been stationed one of those years, at Indianapolis: whilst there, however, he proved himself somewhat wanting in due respect to Methodist Orthodoxy, by avowing his disbelief in a local or material hell. This was highly presumptuous in a young preacher, and a dangerous indication, moreover, of a troublesome habit of thinking for himself, a thing never allowed in that church, except on condition of the thinkers thinking upon all points precisely as Wesley, Benson, Clarke, Watson and others, thought before him. Well, from the time of his broaching this article of unbelief, Br. Kelso continued to push his inquiries after truth, until he became fully satisfied, that both Scripture and common sense are utterly opposed to the dogma of endless misery, and unite their suffrages in favor of the ultimate salvation of the whole human family.

In my judgment Br. Kelso is a valuable accession to our ranks, and as such I welcome him, and wish him with all my heart, God speed.

Ignorance of Universalism.

A writer in 'Zion's Advocate' (the Baptist paper of Maine,) is furnishing a series of articles entitled 'Questions on Universalism,' to which he furnishes very copious answers. We care not how much our opponents write about Universalism. Let the subject be examined. But we suggest to the writer above mentioned to make himself a little better acquainted with the arguments of those whose opinions he endeavors to explode. As it respects the word Gehenna, let him prove if he can, that the word had ever been used before Christ to signify a place or state of punishment after death. That is the point for him to make out. Universalists do not deny that the Jews did, some centuries after the death of Christ, come to use the word Gehenna to signify punishment in the future state; but we call for proof that the word was ever so used in the days of the Old Testament writers, or in the days of Christ. And we would say to the writer in the 'Advocate,' that he must give us better authority than that of a Rev. Mr. Royce, who we believe resides somewhere up north, and who is certainly a man of very limited information. We call again for evidence, that the word Gehenna had ever been used to signify a place or state of punishment after death, as early as the days of Christ.

We have received nine copies of one number of a paper entitled the 'Bible Examiner,' published by Rev. George Storrs. That is enough; he need not send any more of that number.

New Universalist Papers.

We have received two new Universalist papers within a week. The first is

'The Primitive Expounder,' published at Ann Arbor, Michigan, by J. Billings and W. Chase.—It is in small octavo form, each number containing 16 pages. We sympathize deeply in the great object which our brethren have in view, although we might differ from them somewhat in regard to some minor points. The publishers speak of the objects they have in view, as follows:—

'The Primitive Expounder,' will be devoted to the illustration and defence of the gospel, as it was preached and practised by Christ and his successors. Sermons will be published as often as possible. The first principles of the Living Oracles of God, will be urged as binding and necessary upon all believers in Christ. To the unbeliever and thoughtless, faith in the Messiah —repentance toward God, and baptism (by immersion) for the remission of sins, will be advocated as things necessary, in order to enter the kingdom of Christ,—which is righteousness and peace.

BIBLE discipline in the Church, and a unity of action on the part of disciples will be considered requisite for its purity. The ordinances of the gospel set forth in the light that the founders of Christianity designed them. The Bereans of old, on all controverted points will be observed, for the purpose of learning that 'truth,' which will make 'free.'

Hypocrisy—self-righteousness—Partialism and immorality, will be denounced and rebuked sharply. All error and delusion exposed to view, by the light of truth.

And we hope to be instrumental in some good degree in spreading the cause of God, and aid in promoting the practice of pure religion.

The other new paper to which we have referred is entitled the 'Messenger of Glad Tidings,' and is to be published at Wetumpka, Alabama, once in each week. This paper takes the place of the 'Southern Universalist,' so called, which of late years had been under the superintendence of Br. Philo Brownson. We were not sorry that the 'Southern Universalist' was obliged to stop. It was conducted with a very bad spirit, and we could not believe that the real Universalists of the Southern States would continue to patronize it. The course which it took in regard to Slavery was altogether hostile to the spirit of Universalism; and no man that really believed and loved Universalism could approve of that course. In Br. Brownson's valedictory, he confesses that he had done wrong. He says, 'Brethren and friends, in taking leave of you as editor, I wish to say a few words. In the few years we have been associated together, I may have committed many errors—'to err is man, but to forgive is divine.'' May we [illegible] the liberty to suggest to Br. McMorris, that we rejoice he has raised the standard of liberty. He says,

'We scarcely need add that the weapon on which we shall chiefly depend for success, is 'the sword of the spirit which is the word of God.'—This trusty weapon has already done us much good service, and we shall still rely upon it with the utmost confidence, especially in such a cause as the one in which we are engaged, for it is the cause of justice and of humanity—the cause of universal benevolence—the cause of the people, the cause of God. We have erected the standard of liberty—of freedom and independence of the mind, and we trust that the people will flock to this standard by thousands, as it is their interest to do, constituting as it does, their glory to be free and independent. To which end let them bear in mind the declaration of the Saviour that whom the truth shall make free, shall be free indeed.'

We rejoice that he will rely for success on that trusty weapon, 'the sword of the spirit;' we rejoice that he has resolved to engage in the cause of universal benevolence; we rejoice that he has 'erected the standard of LIBERTY;' we rejoice that he exhorts the people to be free and independent. Let him carry out these principles;—and if he does so faithfully, we shall see no more such advertisements in his columns as the one on his last page of Jan. 17th, signed B. F. Randall Sheriff.

In the good work of spreading Universalism, and of filling the hearts of the people with the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ, we wish him abundant success.

Campbellite Preacher Converted.

We find in the 'Southern Universalist' an account of the conversion of Rev. C. F. R. Shehane, an eminent Campbellite preacher in the State of Georgia. We have often heard of this gentleman; and even while he was in the former connexion, he furnished articles for our columns on several interesting subjects. Though in the practice of law, we hope he will not altogether forget the duties he owes the gospel. He is capable of doing much good, being a gentleman of very respectable attainments.

Br. Breare's departure.

Br. R. Breare sailed for Halifax, in the British Steamer, on Thursday, the 2d inst. The steamer loosed from the wharf just as we crossed the ferry on our way home from Danvers, and we stood upon the wharf, in the cold wind, and gazed at her until she got below the castle. Br. Breare won golden opinions every where in this region. His preaching has been listened to by crowds with great interest; and he bears away with him the ardent prayers of thousands of hearts for his welfare and prosperity. He came among us to solicit donations for the purpose of assisting the Universalists in Halifax, few and feeble, to erect a meeting-house; and we are happy to add that he bears home with him nearly nine hundred dollars for that purpose. May the Lord bless him, and the society to which he ministers.

Second Church in Lowell, Mass.

On Sunday, Jan. 29th, the Second Universalist Church in Lowell, was recognized as a branch of our spiritual Zion. The Church consisted at its formation of 180 members. The services commenced at 6 o'clock and closed a few minutes before 9. A great crowd filled the church, which was patient to the last, and manifested a deep and solemn interest in the scene from first to last.—The sermon by Br. Miner, the pastor, was an excellent and appropriate production. Upwards of three hundred believers participated in the Lord's Supper. Br. Thayer, from whose communication in the 'Star and Palladium,' we gather the above facts, speaks in conclusion as follows:

The occasion was one of great joy to all our friends; and many hearts even of those who did not partake, beat with warm gratitude to God and the Saviour. May the blessing of heaven rest upon both churches, and may those who have hitherto neglected this rite, be ready soon to avail themselves of this means of spiritual strength and encouragement. And now unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father—to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

Rev. C. F. LeFevre.

We give, on our first page to-day, an account of the conversion of this gentleman, from the doctrines of the Episcopal Church. It will be seen he was a gentleman of high standing in that Church; and although it is some years since his secession took place, he felt that he had not discharged his whole duty, until he had given to the world his reasons for that course. Every one of our readers will admire the firm, manly, honest, decided stand which he took; every one of them will regard him as having given some of the highest proofs that he is a christian in his soul. May the Lord reward him abundantly for his sacrifices, and more than repay him in the joys of true faith, and in finding friends for him wherever he may be, among those who trust in God as 'the Saviour of all men.'

Let not the length of the article prevent its being read. It is full of christian meekness, as well as another excellent quality which we call sound sense. The incident related of Dr. Mountain in the little school house, will be very interesting. It shows off the pomposity of some of the Episcopal clergy to the life. There are many Dr. Mountains among the clergy, some in robes, and some not in robes. As a whole, we regard the article as one of the most valuable and interesting we have published for a long time. Let all read it, and then lend it to their Episcopalian neighbors.

Br. Drew says that the churches in Middlesex Co. (Mass.) 'are not so large according to population, by nearly one half, as the Universalist churches of Maine.' And then he inquires, 'What are we to infer from these facts, Br. Whittemore?' Infer, Br. Drew, that the Universalists of Maine are more devoted to gospel ordinances than the Universalists of Massachusetts.

The new Universalist church edifice at Cincinnati, Ohio, is going forward with rapidity. The vestry will be finished and opened for use on the second Sabbath in February. Success to Cincinnati. How well should we be pleased to spend a week in that city.

From our Maine Correspondent.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—In a recent letter to you, I glanced at the state of the cause of Universalism in Maine—particularly, in the eastern section of the State. But I did not say so much upon it as might have been said, and perhaps ought to have been said. The truth is,—and it gives me pleasure to state it,—there is a good degree of interest felt, so far as I am able to learn, in all the region east of us, in favor of our common cause, and movements are being made, in many places, to give it an organized and efficient support. Old Societies are becoming more active, and new ones are springing up into existence, and a determination seems to be everywhere manifested, to move onward vigorously the present year. And here—on the banks of the Kennebec—the cause is still advancing, and becoming, every day, stronger and stronger. Our friends in Hallowell, with whom Br. Gunnison now labors, have recently resolved upon building for themselves a Church, which they have long needed, and have already strong and flattering indications of success. We hope to see, the coming season, a Temple of praise and prayer reared there, and dedicated to the service of the Most High God. Then, in every principal town upon our river, we shall have our chosen and cherished faith, as we trust, firmly and securely established, and shall be enabled, (God giving us strength,) to hold a successful warfare with error, under whatsoever form it may appear. And, west of us—in Oxford, Cumberland and York counties—we hear a good report from that quarter, and are well satisfied, that the Redeemer's kingdom is there moving forward, with very encouraging prospects, and taking a deep hold upon the hearts and affections of the people. It is sustained by good men, and true ones, —where united and vigorous exertions cannot fail to advance its best interests, and build it up rapidly and permenantly. And, in fact, all over the State, a good spirit is prevailing, and working out good results, and giving us bright and cheering omens of long-continued prosperity. From present appearances and prospects, we have reason to 'thank God, and take courage.'

But our prosperity brings with it a want, which we hardly know how to supply. Preachers, it is true, are springing up, in the good providence of God, in every direction around us; and we have reason to congratulate ourself, also, that several worthy and well qualified ones have lately come among us, from other States, and are now laboring successfully in their several fields of effort;—but still, there is need of more. There are yet many places unoccupied, where good and faithful laborers are needed, and where they would find a ready reception, and warm hearts. But let me not hold out encouragements to any to come among us, which may not be realized. Far be it from me to present a flattering prospect of our cause here, so as induce preachers to turn their faces hitherward, merely for the sake of obtaining a settlement. To be sure, we want good ones—such as are well qualified for the labors of the ministry, such as can preach by example as well as by precept, such as are willing to enter the field and labor where the Master calls them, such as can accommodate themselves to the circumstances in which Providence may place them, and such moreover, as can go forth in confidence, depending upon themselves, and the grace of God, 'which is sufficient for them.' Such preachers as these can find employment in this State—several of them, at least,—and with such Societies, too, I doubt not, as would make their situation pleasant, and their labors useful. And we pray to the 'Lord of the harvest' that he may send them forth into the vineyard, and crown their labors with success.

This desirable result may be attained. What can be done, then, to remedy the evil? It would be desirable, if practicable or possible, to have a stated pastor placed over every religious Society which may be organized; but if this cannot be done, it seems to me that much good may be done, not only to such Societies, but in those places where Societies are not organized, by the labors of a Missionary, or a preacher at large.—Accordingly, our brethren in the western part of the State are now making an effort to do something through the medium of Missionary labors. How far they have succeeded in their efforts, or what is now the character of their organization, I am not able to say; but I have no hesitancy in affirming, that a well-conducted Missionary enterprize, in this State, is an object of paramount importance. We have here a large territory, even though our neighbors, 'by hook and crook' —for that is diplomacy—have got a liberal part of it from us. And in every part of it, there are more or less of the faithful to be found. But, in many places, they are so scattered, and so few in number, that they are unable to organize themselves into Societies, or to keep up a regular organization, should they attempt it. Yet these men should not be forgotten; nor should those Societies be forgotten, who, perhaps from unavoidable causes, are destitute of the regular ministrations of the word. They should be watched, and nourished, and then, in process of time, they may be able to move along, and do much for the cause of truth. And here is the proper and appropriate field for Missionary effort. Let that field be cultivated, and let all hearts and all hands be united in the good work. We wish our brethren, not only here in Maine, but in New Hampshire and Connecticut, all the success they anticipate, and more too. The cause is a good cause; the effort is a worthy effort; and we ask for both, the blessing of Heaven.

Yours, &c. C. G.

Waterville, Jan. 7, 1843.

Dedication in Gardiner, Me.

We copy the following from the 'Banner' of last Saturday. It is cheering to see temples going up on every hand, in which God will be worshipped as the Father of all flesh.

The new Universalist Church building in Gardiner—a beautiful house, that cost in these cheap times, about six thousand dollars,—was solemnly dedicated to the service of Almighty God, the Saviour of all men, agreeably to appointment on Wednesday forenoon last. Our paper goes to press Wednesday afternoon, so that we are not able to furnish a very full account of particulars this week. The weather was very inclement and the travelling bad, still great numbers were present,—not only from Gardiner, but from Pittston, Hallowell, Augusta, and many from other more distant towns. The house, though it has eighty pews and spacious aisles could hardly contain the people. It was half full of ladies. The Gardiner choir, assisted by performers from the Universalist choirs of Hallowell and Augusta,—(these three towns are, and always must be, the very best of neighbors,) performed most admirably.

The pulpit services were as follows: Introductory remarks and prayer by W. A. Drew of Augusta; Reading selections of Scripture and Dedicatory prayer by Br. N. Gunnison of Hallowell; Sermon by Br. L. L. Sadler of Portland, from Prov. ix. 1, 2, Concluding prayer by Br. H. Jewell of Exeter, N. H.

Br. Sadler's sermon was designed to show how Wisdom has builded the Christian Temple of truth and holiness, and hewn out the seven pillars which, founded on many pedestalic attributes of God, support the whole building and give assurance of the final ingathering of all, as spiritual worshippers. It was an excellent discourse.

Progress of Universalism in Rochester, N.Y.

The good cause is progressing in that place with good success, under the labors of Br. Jacob Chase. Three-fifths of the debt on the meeting house is paid off; two thousand dollars only remaining, and that will soon be settled. Formerly, the different sects in the place opposed Universalism with great bitterness, and did all in their power to break up the Universalist Sunday School, supposing it both wicked and dangerous to permit children to be brought up in the principles of Universalism. But it is a remarkable fact, that at a Sunday School Convention, consisting of the opponents of Universalism, the following resolution was passed, viz. 'That no efforts should be made by them in future to induce children who are attending the Universalist Sunday School, to attend any other Sunday School in the city.'—This is a new thing among the signs of the times. The 'Western Luminary' is published in Rochester, devoted to the spead of Universalism, and to the sustaining of the ordinances of the gospel.—We are happy to see such indications of increased prosperity at western New York.

Temperance.

FRIEND WHITTEMORE,—Knowing you to be decidedly a Temperance man, I mean a Total Abstinence man from all alcoholic drinks, I was quite surprised to find copied into the Trumpet of the last month, an article from one of our city papers. It was not so much that you copied said article, but the remarks that followed, 'That the Temperance movement was rather inclined to retrograde.'

This opinion from you friend W., is rather to be wondered at, as you are one that observes the movements of the times. Now if this is your opinion, I beg leave to differ, and express a contrary opinion, and must say, that the Temperance cause throughout this county was never in a more healthy and prosperous condition than at the present time,—particularly in our Country towns and villages.

I should like to instance a few places and will first name the town of Lynn: if you have not already—allow me to call your attention to the heart cheering yearly report that has just been issued. Next the town of Gloucester where you are well acquainted, which has been one of the strong holds where this curse of humanity has been an article of much traffic, they have there very recently, had several very spirited meetings and are resolved to use every honorable exertion to exterminate that baneful drug from that beautiful town; 14 out of 16 dealers have agreed to give up the traffic in alcoholic drinks,—and there is no doubt but that the remaining two will agree with the others.

I name only these two places as they are prominent towns, but there are many others that can be named, and there are also many of our public houses that have very recently become Temperance houses. I have quite recently friend W. attended several conventions in the county of Norfolk, and the reports and remarks of our Temperance friends have been of the most encouraging character, and that the cause 'was onward.'

Our cities and commercial towns are the strong holds of this monster vice, and will be among the last to succumb, but they ultimately, will be compelled to 'strike their colors' to the cause of Temperance. I have made a much longer communication than I intended, but when I get on my Temperance hobby, I know not when to get off—but if I do not tire him, I may you, and in conclusion allow me to say, that your remarks caused several of the friends of the cause some unhappiness, which I feel assured you did not intend. I am however for one, not sorry that you have expressed your opinions; it has proved in several instances, a spur to renewed and greater exertion in the glorious Temperance cause.

Yours in this good work. L.

In regard to the article to which our correspondent refers, we take this opportunity to say, that it was written under the impressions made by reading the article to which we replied, and also by the movements in certain quarters touching the present laws. It seemed to us at the time that in some places, at least, the cause was on the retrograde. Perhaps there was no sufficient ground for our despondency. At any rate we concluded that the remarks we made would not dishearten the friends of temperance, but rather incite them to more watchfulness and vigor. If they should any where have a contrary effect, we should deeply regret it.

Well done Baltimore.

The Universalist Society, in that city, which a short time ago was very feeble, raised a collection of $145,25 to assist in erecting a church in Iowa City, the capital of Iowa Territory. It is a noble contribution, and does them much honor.

Br. Chapin's Lectures.

We have the happiness to state to our readers, that we shall commence next week the publication of the series of lectures now being delivered by Br. E. H. Chapin, in favor of the abolition of Capital Punishment. These sermons have excited a deep interest, and drawn immense audiences.

'THE CAMBRIDGE PALLADIUM,' published weekly at Cambridgeport, by Leonard Cox, jr. & Co. It will be an interesting miscellany of news and science, and will be neutral in matters of religion and politics. These young men are worthy of patronage, and we hope the inhabitants of Cambridge and vicinity will see that they have it.

Thanks to Br. G. W. Quimby for his letter.—Look for it next week.

Millerism doing its work.

Several cases of insanity; a young man crazy; a young woman a corpse; strange fanaticism, struggling, rolling, kicking, &c. &c.

We find in the 'Watchman' the following account of the effects of Millerism in Lower Canada. It is copied from the 'Sherbrook Gazette.' Reader, are those men harmless and innocent who persist in thus ruining men, women and children?

MILLERISM. We lately mentioned several instances of insanity in Stanstead County, arising from excitement consequent upon a belief that the world is soon to be destroyed. We have now to add to the list a young man in Brownington, who has been entirely bereft of his reason from the same cause; also a young lady of Barton, who having heard a Millerite preach, became excessively frighted, and in the enjoyment of otherwise good health, retired to bed, and was found a corpse next morning.

Query. Has God revealed any thing in the Bible, the belief of which is liable to make people crazy, or to frighten them to death? We think not.

A singular developement of the excesses to which the Miller delusion leads its victims, has recently occurred at Stanstead. We learn by a gentleman from that township, as well as from letters, that about ten days since, Rev. Mr. Swasey, a leading preacher of the Miller doctrine, in that vicinity, was brought before Messrs. Pomroy, Steele, Hoyle and Brown, Magistrates, charged with assault and battery upon a man named Sawyer. It appeared in evidence, that one of their practices, at their meetings, is to 'struggle,' or roll and kick upon the floor. During one of these struggles by Swazey, Sawyer, from curiosity, or some other motive, took hold of Swazey's leg, and in the 'struggle,' got down between the benches, when the latter stamped several times upon his breast and injured him so severely that his life was despaired of for several days. Swazey's defence was that he was under the influence of God's Spirit, and could not control his actions,—that the injury inflicted upon Sawyer was the manifestation of God's displeasure against sin. It however appeared that he and some of his co-workers can go into a 'struggle' when they choose, as a witness testified that he heard Swazey and another preacher arranging which of them should do the 'struggling,' previous to the commencement of a meeting. The result of the trial was that Swazey was fined 12s 6d and costs, amounting in all to about £5 10s.—Swazey, as might be expected, claims that he is persecuted for righteousness sake.

It is of course quite useless to reason with people who believe in and adopt such Tomfooleries. No belief or practices, however absurd, can be put forth, but what they find converts among the weak and credulous, and persons who will quote scripture to defend their absurdities. Thus the Millerites justify their struggling and rolling by quoting the prophecy that 'ye shall see greater things than these.' The visions and revelations to which they lay claim, they say is a fulfilment of the promise, 'your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams.'

Br. Rogers, of Cincinnati, has published a new Hymn Book, designed to supply the wants of our denomination in the Western States. We have not seen the work, but it is highly spoken of in the 'Star in the West,' the Universalist paper published at Cincinnati, Ohio. This book contains 668 hymns, on a great variety of subjects.

We have received several communications which must lay over until next week; and among others a letter from Miss Mary B. Woodman, who withdraws from the First Congregational Church, in Newbury, because she has been brought to the belief of Universalism. They are coming over fast.

Dr. C. H. Webster, who has of late resided in Clinton, N. Y. having removed to Salem, Mass. wishes all letters and papers directed accordingly.

Br. Josiah Marvin, of Paper Mill Village, N. H. has commenced laboring in the ministry of reconciliation to good acceptance. He bids fair for great usefulness in the work of furthering the cause of free grace and true piety.

Br. Drew gives the following article in his last paper.

Our good brother Whittemore of the Trumpet, says, to us, that he did not say Dr. Channing was destitute of 'moral greatness,' but only that 'there was no moral greatness in the manner in which he avowed Unitarianism twenty years ago.' We stand corrected. What we wrote was with the Gospel Messenger before us, from which we derived the idea that Br. W. denied the idea of Dr. C.'s moral greatness altogether. We take pleasure in informing our readers that Br. W. does not deny that Dr. Channing possessed 'moral greatness,' but that he only asserts that when he broke ground against orthodoxy and asserted Unitarianism, he did not then maifest 'moral greatness.'

Now, that puts the matter on the right ground.

Mr. William B. English, of this city, has given the public a new work of fiction, entitled 'Rosina Meadows, the Village Maid, or the Temptations Unveiled.' Our readers know that we are not in general very favorable to works of fiction. But our attention has been pointed to the fact, that the object of this work is to expose the power of tempation and the hiddeousness of vice—to show that those only are safe who walk in wisdom's ways. So far we certainly approve. We have not seen the work itself, but find the following notice of it in a late number of the 'Vesperus':

'Rosina Meadows, the Village Maid, or the Temptations Unveiled.'

This is the title of a new novel founded upon scenes and characters of real life in Boston. It is written by Mr. Wm. B. English, of this city, and will be published next week. We have been permitted by the author to examine some of the proof-sheets of the novel, and find it to be a work of great interest and beauty. Rosina Meadows, the heroine of the tale, is represented in the first part as a creature of surpassing grace, sweetness, and intelligence—with a heart full of enthusiasm, sensibility, and affection—in manner, artless and confiding—her home the country, she inherited only feelings as gentle and pure as her own unspotted virtues. She came to the city the virtuous and ingenuous maiden—the eye of the profligate was upon her, and she was inveigled by his arts and cunning—temptations beset her path, her golden hopes in the bud and flower of life, were broken—the soft magic of her eye grew dim, the bright lustre of virtue became tarnished, and she fell a victim to the pertidy of the seducer.

The novel is full of true and affecting incident—replete with graphic scenes from every day life. The sentiments contained in it are pure, the moral unquestionable, and calculated to awaken and improve the mind.

'In lifting the veil, says the author, from the tempter and his subtle and seductive arts, care has been taken to 'hold the mirror up to nature,' and to exhibit vice in its proper forms and colors, without introducing any thing exceptionable to the reader. The beginning shows Virtue in all her transcendant loveliness, and the end exhibits Vice in its most 'hideous mien,' thus showing how to obtain the one and shun the other.'

The work will be got up in the same popular form of the Brother Jonathan and New World novels, and embellished with a superb allegorical vignette, designed and engraved expressly for it.

Baptism.

It is exciting a good deal of attention through the country that the Baptists of Boston are getting hot baths to baptize their converts in. This, in our opinion, is just as wide a departure from the examples of Christ, as the practice of sprinkling. It is somewhat remarkable, that the Baptists, who have been so particular in asserting the duty of following Christ exactly and in every point in the matter of baptism, should have been the first to run into this method of hot water baptism.

Br. Josiah Gilman will remove to Atkinson in April next.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Sabbath School at Little Neck, Dorchester.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I was a little surprised on taking up your paper of the 21st ult, to find there a notice of a Sabbath School of our faith, to be held on the Little Neck, Dorchester, at the school house.

I am sorry the writer of that notice did not consult some one who was instrumental in getting up this school, before he submitted it to your columns, as he is under a mistake respecting the school house,—for I have never intimated to any person that we should have it for that purpose, as there is a school already held there.

The said school I understood when I came to the place was a Union school. I therefore took my children in, and explained to the Superintendent the views I had of the school, and my belief in the happiness of all mankind in God's own time, and he bid me welcome. After remaining two or three months, I found not a child was allowed to enter my class although particular requests had been sent from their parents to do so. I have now bid the teachers and scholars, farewell, telling the Superintendent I did not wish to be proscribed in that way; and have opened a school in my own house, for the accommodation of all those who wish to have their children taught the delightful thought that God's universal love extends to all created intelligences.

Universalism in Provincetown, Mass.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—Though we live upon a bleak, steril, and to the stranger, dreary waste of sand, surrounded by a wider waste of water, yet the truth of God has been planted here, and experience is teaching us that the soil is not altogether uncongenial. Our cause, in this place, as will be seen by the following relation, is prospering greatly.

Previous to Br. Stevens' arrival, in November, our Society had become cold and lifeless, which was, perhaps, in a measure, consequent upon the departure of Br. Dods, our former most worthy and beloved pastor, who labored with us and lived in our midst for several years. But Br. Stevens has fully aroused us from this state of apathy.—By his able efforts, combined with corresponding zeal, inaction has given place to action, indifference to interest, while the once careless are now anxiously inquiring into the nature of that truth which involves their unalterable destiny, in the eternal world. Our congregations have rapidly increased, and are still growing larger; notwithstanding an excitement in the Methodist Church of this town, which has incessantly raged from last August up to this date.

Nor has the Sunday School been neglected.—Under the excellent management of its Superintendent the scholars were prepared for a public exhibition, which took place on Christmas Eve. They spoke nobly; and acquitting themselves with uncommon credit, gave much satisfaction to the numerous audience present. The School numbers 110 pupils, and has from 30 to 40 teachers. A lively interest is manifested by all concerned. Both scholars and teachers are punctual in attendance, there not having been, we believe, since the re-organization of the School in September last, a single unnecessary absence of the latter.

Conference meetings have also been introduced; and, though but recently commenced, have given new zeal to those engaged in the cause, and added joy unspeakable to the hearts of many. True, at the first meeting, there were but few who spoke, yet every moment of the time was occupied to the abundant delight and profit of those who listened. The interest has at length become more general—the body of the Meeting-House, in which we assemble, is thronged—speakers have multiplied, and on last Sunday evening, no less than four, even of the females, arose and spoke of the goodness of God, of the strength and happiness of their faith, of its adaptedness to satisfy our spiritual wants, and of the support and consolation they had drawn from it under the severest trials. They spake in the spirit of candor and love; and whatever opinion others may entertain of its propriety, or however much prejudice may rail against it, we can truly say that we were heartily glad to hear them.

Br. Stevens, by whose efforts they have been established, is peculiarly happy in his manner of conducting these meetings. He seems to be in proper element in them, and, inspired by his theme, speaks from the heart as well as head.—Br. Stevens is, in fact, every way eminently qualified to answer the wants of our people, who, having so long listened to the preaching of Br. Dods, are by no means the least particular in this matter. Br. S. seems exclusively devoted to the work of advancing the cause he has espoused, and we are well pleased with the course he adopts to accomplish this end. J. G.

Strafford Quarterly Conference.

The next session of this body will be holden on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (1st and 2d) of March, at the new Meeting-House on LEE PARADE, N. H.

At the request of the brethren, there will be religious services at the above place, the evening previous, (Tuesday,) at 6 o'clock.

Friends from abroad will call on Br. Nicholas D. Meserve, on Lee Parade,—Josiah Bartlett, Esq., at the Hook,—or, Gardner Towle, Esq., Wadley's Falls, for directions.

A general invitation is extended to all of like precious faith, and others, to come up and sit with us 'in heavenly places.' To the ministering brethren, a particular request is made.

The friends in Lee are very desirous of greeting a large number of the good and true. What say! shall we have a real gospel season of refreshing? Come one—come ALL who can. E. FRANCIS, Clerk.

Discourses on Capital Punishment.

Rev. E. H. Chapin will deliver the last of a series of three Discourses on Capital Punishment, next Sabbath evening, at his Church in Charlestown. Subject of the Discourse,—Capital Punishment opposed by Christian Philosophy.

Swine—No sale.

General Intelligence.

Soup and Bread Society. The Society for the gratuitous diffusion of Soup and Bread among the poor, has gone into active operation. The city south of Winter and Summer streets is divided into 13 districts, each of which is assigned to a gentleman whose duty it is to investigate the wants of each case. The general Depot or Soup House is on the North side of Beach street, first door west of Edinburgh street, where donations of Milk, Flour, Vegetables, or any other kind of provisions will be received and faithfully applied in relieving the wants of the destitute. Hours of delivery from 10 1-2 A. M. to 2 P. M. every day except Sundays.

Arrest of the Robber concerned in the late Burglaries. William B. Wilton, of Dorchester, a painter by trade, who has been out of employ for some time, and supported himself by stealing small articles from various places, was arrested on Wednesday night, at the auction store of Mr. B. H. Norton, State street, by Messrs. Clapp and Andrews. His arrest was occasioned by his having left some part of the stolen property at that place for sale. It has been ascertained that he robbed the stores of Messrs. N. D. Cotton, Thos. N. Mitchell, Peter Fisk, and Wm. Hudson, Jr., all on Tremont row, and goods belonging to each of these gentlemen have been found in his possession. He has also entered the Waltham bank several times lately, and stolen therefrom several articles of small value. The Savings Bank in this city was also entered by him, where he took the lock of the safe, and he was concerned in the robbery of the store of Harrington & Marshall, Watertown.—Atlas.

Harvard University. We observe from the annual report of the President of Harvard University to the Board of Overseers, that the whole number of students at the University during the year 1841—'42, was 478—233 graduates and 245 under graduates. Of the graduates 26 were theological, 86 medical, and 115 law students. Of the under graduates, 53 were seniors, 68 juniors, 60 sophomores, 57 freshmen, and 7 not candidates for a degree. The income of the University, for the year ending August 31, 1842, was $144,966, 35, and the disbursements, during the same time, were $134,744,94; leaving at the date referred to, a balance of cash in the Suffolk Bank of $7,-221,31.

Concord Railroad. The New Hampshire Patriot says, that in consequence of the violent rain of Tuesday, the railroad at Bow, four miles below Concord, was washed away, for the space of a couple of rods, so that the train which left Concord on Wednesday morning, was obliged to return.—Advertiser.

Another Boy shot. As some boys were firing at a mark, in Lenox on Monday last, a son of Mrs. Miller, aged ten years, was shot in the back and so badly injured, that he is not expected to recover. The charge lodged in the back part of the shoulder, and was extracted with great difficulty.—Lenox Eagle.

A Man Dying with the Glanders. In Cheshire county, Pa., Henry Gorman, a resident of Ridley township, died from glanders, produced by bleeding a horse owned by him, which was afflicted with the disease. At the time of bleeding the animal he had a cut on one of his fingers, into which the poisonous virus of the disease was transmitted to the system.

The End. Latest News. We have seen a statement over Miller's own signature, dated 1st of January, 1843, in which he expresses his full belief that the end of the world will take place some time between the 21st of March 1843 and the 21st of March 1844. So we shall have this foolish agitation on hand for more than a year to come, and before the expiration of that period, the date of the catastrophe will probably be postponed a while longer.—Journal of Commerce.

An apartment in a boarding house in Howard street, was entered on the 31st ult., by one or two strangers, during the confusion incident to an auction held in the house, and $14 in cash, a watch, and a dress were stolen Yesterday the lady who keeps the house, received word from a philanthropic gentleman that she could obtain the watch, by calling at his house and asking no questions. Nothing has yet been heard of the other articles.—Advertiser.

Upright Female Public Officers. The New York Evening Post say: 'It has been the practice in the Post Office Department to appoint the wives of deceased Postmasters, as their successors, in those cases in which it was agreeable to the people. This practice has been in operation a great many years, and the number of females who have thus held office is quite large. During all this time there has not occured a single instance of defalcation among them. Though it is no compliment to a person to be honest and faithful, for this is a matter of duty, yet it is especially honorable to be amid those times and temptations in which many fall astray.'

Fire. We regret to learn that the alarm of fire which occurred about 11 o'clock on Saturday night, was caused by the burning of the office of the Georgetown Advocate, which, we are told, was totally destroyed, together with all the printing materials belonging to the establishment. We are truly sorry that such a calamity should have befallen our neighbors of the Advocate, and trust that they may be enabled at an early day to resume their labors.—Nat. Intel.

Bold Robbery and arrest of the Thief. Mr. Healy of Plainfield, was robbed of a hundred dollars in money at the Franklin house in this city, on Tuesday night last. Mr. Healy was put into a room in which the robber had secreted himself beneath the bed; and when he rose in the morning, he found his pocket book on the floor and his money gone. No clue to the thief was found until this morning, when the thief was discovered stowed away in a closet in the hotel.

Upon searching him, the stolen money was found in his boots. He was immediately arrested and carried before Judge Roath, before whom he confessed his guilt and gave his name as John Smith, of Worcester—although he had entered his name on the book at the hotel as Charles Wilson. We presume he is by this time snug in the county prison.—Norwich Courier of Jan. 28.

We learn from the Chronicle, that a daughter of Mr. William H. West, of Cabotville, aged about seven years, came home the day after the Thanksgiving of 1840, coughing and crying, and said she had swallowed a pin. This coughing has continued violent since, at many times making her quite sick. Several physicians, however, concluded after a few months, that the coughing proceeded from a disease in the throat. In December last, two years after the first complaint, in one of her violent coughing turns, she raised from her throat a common brass pin, considerably corroded. The little girl is now perfectly well.—Northampton Cour.

Dreadful Loss of life at Galway. A frightful occurrence took place on Christmas morning at the parish chapel of Galway, in consequence of which nearly fifty persons are supposed to have lost their lives. A correspondent of the Dublin Evening Mail thus describes the scene: 'I think it but right to tell you, that a most tragical occurrence took place here at six o'clock this morning, at the parish chapel, similar to what occurred at Dublin two years ago. Previous to the celebration of mass, the chapel was crowded to suffocation, and some person gave the alarm that the gallery was giving way. The consequence was, there was a tremendous rush towards the stairs—numbers were thrown down the stairs and trampled to death by others getting into the street. At this moment (two o'clock) 35 persons are dead, and it is supposed that from ten to fifteen more are also numbered among the dead.—there are a great many besides, maimed: they are all of the lower class, such as poor tradesmen, laborers, and servants. There was no danger at all of the gallery giving way; it is very strongly built, and would bear four times the weight that was on it at the time. There must have been between 4,000 and 5,000 people in it at the time. I never witnessed a more heart rending scene. I saw myself twenty-five dead bodies.'

Attempt at Murder and Piracy. Capt. Towle, of the brig Lucy from Pernambuco, gives the editor of the Advertiser the following particulars in relation to an attempt of the first and second mates of the brig Poultney, of Baltimore, to murder Capt. Mouatt and take the vessel:

The attempt was made about the 25th of November, when the P. was north of the Equator, and about 18 or 20 days before her arrival. It was on a moonlight night, and during the second mate's watch. At 1 A. M., Capt. Mouatt went on deck, not feeling satisfied with the look-out kept by the mates. He found the second mate (a young man of Charleston, S. C., of wealthy and highly respectable parentage, and educated at some University) walking the deck in a hurried manner, quite contrary to his usual custom. Capt. M. then went below and turned in. He awoke about three o'clock, and found the light in the cabin extinguished. As he proceeded up the companion way, he observed the second mate looking down into the cabin, but, before he reached the deck he received a severe blow on the head, and was knocked down upon the cabin floor. The chief mate instead of coming to his assistance, left his birth, and went upon deck, where he prevented the men, who heard the noise, from going below, telling them that if they went below, the captain would shoot the first man who came into the cabin. When Capt M. recovered his consciousness, he was prostrate upon the cabin floor, his wounds bleeding freely, and the second mate standing near him with a marling spike fastened around his wrist with a lanyard. Capt. M. begged hard for his life, telling the second mate that he had a young family, and promising not to trouble him, if he would cease from his murderous intentions.

In the mean time, the steward had come into the cabin, and the second mate, becoming aware that the crew had ascertained what was going on, desisted. Capt. M. then went to his stateroom, to get the key of his medicine chest, when the second mate followed him, seized Capt. M's. pistols, which were under his birth, and threw them over board. On the arrival of the vessel at Pernambuco, the U. S. Consul, Mr. Snow, had the second mate arrested, but advised Capt. M. to take the chief mate to Rio Janeiro, as he could not supply his place at Pernambuco, and on his arrival at Rio Janeiro, to deliver him to the U. S. Consul there.

On investigation before the Consul at Pernambuco, the crew testified that they had heard the two mates conversing as they sat together on the main hatch, the day before the attack, and heard the second mate tell the chief mate, that the latter was too chicken hearted; and if he would be quiet, (the second mate) would despatch the old man.

The crew had been asked by the second mate to join in taking the vessel, but had refused. He told them it was their intention to take the vessel around Cape Horn. Three or more of the crew were colored men, and they gave as a reason for not informing Capt. M. that they did not believe the mates would do what they purposed.

Capt. Mouatt is 65 years of age, an old trader to South America, and much respected. He owned half the vessel and cargo. He had had no difficulty either with the mates or the crew, but was rather remarkable for being too easy with his men, and too indulgent to his mates.

Both mates will probably be sent to Baltimore for trial. The wounds received by Capt. M. were highly dangerous in their nature, and the physicians at Pernambuco expressed great astonishment that he survived them.

Great Fire in Plymouth. On Saturday afternoon the Robbins Cordage Factory in that town took fire in the tarring room, and all the buildings of the Factory were destroyed, together with the stock and machinery contained in them. A large two story building adjacent to the Factory was also burnt. The damage is $25,000, and divided equally between the Manufacturers' and Franklin Offices, in Boston.

Statistics of Pulmonary Consumption in the cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, for thirty years. We have received from George Hayward, M. D. of this city, an article with the above title compiled for the New England Quarterly Journal of Medicine and Surgery, for January, 1843, which will soon be published. It appears that the whole number of deaths in Boston for thirty years from 1811 to 1840 inclusive was 36,616, by consumption 6,243. In New York during the same time the whole number of deaths was 152,484: by consumption 27,486. In Philadelphia during the same time, the whole number of deaths was 113,596; by consumption 17,211. Average number of deaths by consumption in Boston, 1 to 6,185; in New York, 1 to 5,547; in Philadelphia 1 to 7,003. The difference being in favor of Philadelphia. During the ten years including 1840, Boston has been more exempt from consumption than either of the other two cities, the average being as 1 to 7,587; in Philadelphia, as 1 to 8,482; and in New York, as 1 to 5,952.

These statistics prove the fact mentioned by Dr. Torrey of the United States Army, and also stated in the reports of the British Army, that Pulmonary consumption is not so often fatal at the North as at the South, and also prove that consumptive patients are in general quite as well off at home, as when sent into the debilitating climate of the West India Islands.

The following, which is the closing part of Dr. Hayward's article is well worth the consideration of parents;

'It is well known that a cold, moist and variable climate acts not only as a predisposing, but as an exciting cause of consumption; and unless the system is protected by proper food and suitable clothing by day and by night, many of the inhabitants will fall victims to a pulmonary disease. There is no greater error, I believe, than to suppose the body can be hardened by exposure to atmospheric changes without suitable precaution. It would be as reasonable to imagine that it could acquire the power of resisting any degree of heat or any of the powerful chemical agents, as that it could without proper protection withstand the influence of the elements.

Our only hope of lessening the mortality from consumption, is by using all posible means of prevention; for it is not pretended by those whose opinion is of any value, that this disease in a confirmed state is within the control of remedies It behooves us then to ascertain, if we can, what these means are, and to use them with diligence.'—Advertiser.

Singular determination. For several days past Mr. Thompson, warden of the Eastern penitentiary, has been applied to and importuned by a young, well dressed and intelligent Englishman, calling himself Robert Graham, to be admitted to the prison. He stated that he had read Miss Martineau's work on America, and had come from England expressly to realize the condition of solitary confinement, and would not be denied. His request could not be complied with, yet still he persisted in his desire, until his importunities could be no longer borne.

He questioned Mr. T. as to what grade of crime would give him a four years term there and his manner and expression of countenance seem determined to secure his object. This induced Mr. T. to bring him before Mayor Scott yesterday, when, after a hearing of the facts, he was committed to Mayonensing in default of bail to keep the peace.—Phil. Gaz.

Daniel Lambert's Clothes. The Liecester (Eng) Journal states that at a recent sale of the property of the late Mr. Owstan, a suit of clothes which had been worn by the celebrated Daniel Lambert, was disposed of. The clothes consited of a coat, waistcoat, and nankeen small clothes, and the dimensions were as follows: the coat—twenty nine inches across the back, twenty-three inches round the elbow: in the waistcoat there are eighteen button holes, two inches asunder, circumference of the arm-hole forty-six inches, round the waist ninety-six inches, length forty-six inches; width of small clothes ninety-six inches, round the knee-band thirty-three inches, top of thigh fifty-five inches.

She was an only child, and greatly beloved by her parents, with whom she still resided. She was the companion of one every way worthy of her. She had recently become a mother, and consequently had had awakened in her bosom all those tender ties that bind a mother to earth; yet she passed away without a murmur, finding, as we have every reason to believe, abundant consolation in the faith of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Seldom have we seen friends more deeply afflicted, and seldom has the tear of sorrow fallen over a worthier object. None knew her but to love, none named her but to praise. But she has gone to her rest. And though no longer the object of fond parents' care, and a loving husband's watchfulness, on earth, she is still the object of the love and care of that God who watcheth over all. To the Father of mercies and the God of all grace would we commend the deeply afflicted friends, praying that they may find abundant consolation in the gospel of salvation.—Star. A. A. M.

GATES' ACADEMY, Marlboro', Mass. The next Term of this Institution will commence on Tuesday, February 28th.

Tuition in English, $4.00
in the Languages, 4.50 per term.

Students can be accommodated in the family of the Preceptor for $27 per term. This charge includes board, tuition, washing, &c.

It is the endeavor of the Instructor to teach THINGS and not WORDS merely. For the better accomplishment of this object a very good apparatus has been procured, and a Geological and Mineralogical Cabinet, &c. are at the service of the Students. We deem it sufficient recommendation of the present Principal, Mr. O. W. ALBEE, to state that he has been employed 10 years by the same Board of Trustees, and each year with increasing patronage.

CIRCULAR.

T. GILBERT & CO.,

PIANO-FORTE MANUFACTURERS,

406 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON,

NEXT BUILDING NORTH OF WASHINGTON BANK.

THE senior partner in the above firm is, with a single exception, the oldest Piano-Forte Manufacturer in Boston; and was one of the old firm of "Currier & Gilbert." The instruments, of various styles, bearing the names of, and manufactured by, "CURRIER & GILBERT, 3?3," "T. GILBERT," and "T. GILBERT & Co. 402 and 406 Washington Street," are now too well known throughout this country to need any commendation, further than to say, that the same T. GILBERT is still actively and constantly engaged in superintending the business, assisted by his partner, HENRY SAFFORD, who is also personally devoted to it. This, it is presumed, will be sufficient to secure the confidence of all their friends.

They have all the facilities for getting up their work in the best possible manner, and at the least possible expense, at which first-rate work can be done,—having connected with their manufactory a steam engine, to facilitate all those parts which can be done by the aid of machinery.

They also have every part of the work done at the above manufactory in the city, and under their own personal inspection, by experienced workmen only; as they employ no apprentices.

During the past year, they have made very important improvements in the Piano-Forte, some of which they have patented. In the Horizontal or Square Piano-Forte we have an improvement by means of which, with the use of a pedal, the hammers are made to strike one or two strings, at the pleasure of the performer; thus combining the soft, sweet tones of the Euchord with the power of the Grand Piano-Forte, without its inconvenience of size and shape. But having heard frequent complaints of the common Square Piano-Forte, on account of its size, and objections to the Upright and Piccolo, for other reasons, and to obviate these objections, we have invented a new description, somewhat of the Piccolo form, embracing all of the above improvements, which, with seven octaves, occupies but about half as much room on the floor as the common Square, and having a very important improvement in the action, by which a single spring is made to answer the threefold purpose of pressing down the damper, and at the same time of bearing with equal force on the hammer and key, so as to cause their quick return after the blow is struck—thus making the action of the keys susceptible of the most rapid execution that any one can desire.

Lowest prices of the above, from $300 to $500. Common Square Piano-Fortes, of various patterns, with all the other improvements, from $200 to $400.

In view of all these facts, and their own experience, together with the ample testimonials which they have from others, they have no hesitation in warranting their instruments to be as good as can be obtained at any other manufactory in the world—the purchasers themselves being judges.

They will in all cases exchange, at their own expense, and from any part of the country, all such instruments as are paid for on delivery, and have been selected by themselves, or refund the purchase money, at the option of the purchaser, at any time within six months of the time of sale, if the instrument shall not prove entirely satisfactory.

In order to secure a CASH BUSINESS, they would further say to their customers, that they will now sell at retail, where the cash accompanies the order, or is paid on delivery of the instrument from their shop, at Twenty-Five per cent. below their former ware-room prices; while between cash down and credit they will make more difference than formerly.

Persons ordering Piano-Fortes, of any description, and sending from $200 to $500 with the order, may rest assured that in all respects they shall have as good an instrument for the money they send, as if they apply in person, or employ an agent to select for them.

The subscribers hereby request all persons who may favor us with their orders, on the foregoing terms, to expose publicly every apparently intentional neglect or failure on our part to fulfil them to the very letter. And we further engage to pay, ourselves, all the necessary expense for giving publicity to each case of such neglect or failure, in at least one public newspaper—such as the dissatisfied party may select.

And in order to satisfy all who may wish to purchase of us, of our entire responsibility and correct business habits, we invite them to write us for reference, and we will give them such as may be required.

Thus throwing ourselves upon the public, we solicit their patronage. T. GILBERT & CO.

ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM. SECOND EDITION. Just received and for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'The Ancient History of Universalism, from the commencement of the Christian Era to the time of the Reformation.' By HOSEA BALLOU 2d., of Medford. Price $1 per copy. A suitable discount to those who buy to sell again. It is a highly valuable work.

BELLS, CLOCKS, ORGANS. GEORGE H. HOLBROOK, East Medway, Mass. manufactures CHURCH BELLS, CHURCH CLOCKS and CHURCH ORGANS.

Holbrook's BELLS are well known. It is the general testimony of those who are judges, and who have had opportunities of forming an opinion, that his Bells are the best which are manufactured in the United States, both for strength and brilliancy of tone. The best Bells in Boston, New York, and other great cities, are from Holbrook's Foundry.

Mr. Holbrook's CLOCKS are well known. There are probably a greater number of tower Clocks in Massachusetts manufactured by him, than any other man. He has facilities for manufacture, which enable him not only to make good Clocks, but to undersell all other manufacturers. These are the causes of the great number he has sold.

His ORGANS may be judged of by the Organ at the Marlboro' Chapel, which is from his manufacture.

The public are assured that it will be for their interest to call, if they wish to purchase either Bells, Clocks or Organs.

Poetry.

Abel entering Heaven.

Ten thousand times ten thousand sung
Loud anthems round the throne,
When lo! one solitary tongue
Began a song unknown!
A song unknown to angel ears;
A song that told of banished fears,
Of pardoned sins, and dried up tears.

Not one of all the heavenly host
Could these high notes attain!
But spirits from a distant coast
United in the strain;
Till he who first began the song,
To sing alone not suffered long,
Was mingled with a countless throng.

And still, as hours are fleeting by,
The angels ever hear
Some newly-ransomed soul on high,
To join the chorus there.
And so the song will louder grow,
Till all redeemed by Christ below
To that fair world of rapture go.

O! give me, Lord, my golden harp,
And tune my broken voice;
That I may sing of troubles sharp
Exchanged for endless joys;
The song that ne'er was heard before,
A sinner reached the heavenly shore,
But now shall sound for evermore.

Boston:

Universalist Churches in Middlesex Co.

Some attempts have been recently made by the Clerk of the Middlesex County Conference, to obtain an account of the condition, and general usages of each Universalist Church in the County. The application for information was made to each of the clergymen; but all have not regarded the matter as important. Of course it must be left to the decision of each church and pastor, whether they will have their doings made public; nor shall we presume to pass censure, in cases where they decline to sanction such a course.

There are about twenty regularly organized Universalist Churches in the County of Middlesex. In former years, there was not so much attention bestowed on urging believers to observe the Lord's Supper, as there has been of late. There is now an increasing interest in this matter, and we hope that interest will continue. The following is the report concerning the churches, submitted at the last meeting of the Conference. There are at least four, and perhaps a greater number, which were not included in the report for want of information.

Cambridgeport. This Church was organized June 18, 1827. It was composed of 34 members; 8 of whom remain to the present time, and 36 have been added since, making the present number 44. All requests for membership to this Church are made to the Church through the Committee at some regular meeting. An affirmative vote of two-thirds of the members present is necessary to admit the applicant. The Lord's Supper is celebrated on the last Sunday in each month.

Watertown. The Church connected with this Society was organized March 16th, 1828. Original number of members 15. Present number 55;—17 who have formerly belonged to it, have left town, and are not included in the number reported. Nine have joined the church triumphant. Candidates for membership stand propounded one month — after which, if received by a vote of the Church, they assent to each article in the confession of faith, and receive the right hand of fellowship from the Pastor, which constitute them members. The Lord's Supper is commemorated on the first Sunday in each month. The Church is in a highly flourishing condition.

Malden. This Church re-organized in June 1828, at which time the believers in 'the glorious gospel of the blessed God,' being a majority in the parish, settled a Pastor to their own liking, and the Church became a Universalist Church, pure in the faith. The whole number of names on the record is 63. Present number of members 37. Seventeen have removed, and 9 have died. Members are received into the Church by assenting to the confession of faith and the covenant, which are read by the Pastor, who then says in behalf of the Church.—'We then declare you to be a member in full communion with this Church, and promise, that by the help of the divine spirit, we will conduct towards you as a member of the same body with ourselves, watching over you for your good, with a spirit of meekness and tenderness; earnestly praying that the Lord will take delight in us, that his spiritual blessings may rest upon us, and that his glorious kingdom may be advanced among us. Amen.' The ordinance of the Lord's Supper is observed on the second Sunday of every month.

Framingham. The Church in Framingham was organized Sept. 16, 1833. The original number of members not ascertained. There are 47 names on the record, of whom 6 have died, and 7 have removed. Candidates are proposed to the Church at least two weeks before they are received, when if there be no objection made by the Church, they publicly assent to the articles of faith and the church compact, and are admitted to a full fellowship. The Lord's Supper is celebrated once in two months.

Medford. The Church was organized, Jan. 19th, 1834. Whole number of members 52. Present number 40, besides 3 or 4 communicants belonging to other churches. Sixteen have been added since March 1842. Concerning the admission of members, the Pastor writes: 'The mode of admission, was formerly, to vote immediately on application, in church meetings, and to receive the members, (the unanimous consent being required) without any public solemnity. During the last four years, the practice has been to let the applicants stand over from one church-meeting to another, before the vote is taken. Last March it was resolved, that in future the names of all applicants for admission shall stand propounded from one church-meeting to the next, when the vote of the church may be taken; and if the vote be in the affirmative, such applicants shall be received into the church, during the public solemnities of the Sabbath on the day of the communion. Accordingly all our admissions have since been public, with special services for the occasion; which we think altogether preferable to our former custom of private admission. The Lord's Supper is administered on the last Sunday of every month, at the close of the afternoon services. It is our custom to invite to it, ordinarily, only such as are members in regular standing with some christian church; for we think that ordinarily, all among us, who have thought sufficiently on the subject to act from principle, rather than from momentary impulse or caprice, have attached themselves to some church of some denomination.'

East-Cambridge. This Church was formed on the first Sunday in Jan. 1836. Present number of members 40. Removed and deceased 10. Candidates stand propounded one month, unless circumstances make a shorter period desirable; and are then admitted by a unanimous vote of the members present. The communion day previous to the administration of the supper, they publicly assent to the articles of faith and the covenant, and receive from the Pastor the right hand of fellowship, which constitues them members. The Lord's Supper is administered on the first Sunday in every month.

Waltham. Church organized in Aug. 1838. Present number of members 60. Candidates stand propounded two weeks, after which they are received by a vote of the church, they assenting to the covenant. The Lord's Supper is observed on the first Sunday in every month.

Holliston. Church organized, July 1839. Present number of members 26. Members are received by a vote of the Church, after having satisfactory evidence that they bear an unblemished moral character, and maintain an open profession in the great truths of the gospel. The Lord's Supper is celebrated once in two months.

Concord. Church organized, Aug. 1840. Present number of members 50. Members are received into the Church by extending to them the right hand of fellowship through the Pastor. The Lord's Supper is celebrated once in two months.

West-Cambridge. The Church in West-Cambridge was organized on the first Sunday in Aug. 1841. Number of communicants 50. New members are admitted by being proposed at one communion, and voted for at the next. The Lord's Supper is administered on the first Sunday in every month. All are invited to commune who sincerely desire to honor the Saviour, and improve the occasion for their own good.

Stoneham. Church organized, Aug. 1842, and consisted of 32 members. Some additions have been made since. Members are received by a vote of the church and by signing the articles of faith.

North-Reading. The old parish in this place has become Universalist, and the church connected with it, after a long and death-like sleep, was revived Sept. 14th, 1842, Old members 3. Present number 17. New members are received the same as in Waltham.

East-Lexington. Church organized Oct. 12th, 1842. Number of members 28.

The following resolutions were passed at his Conference:

'Whereas, the principles of Universalism recognize all men as children of the same Father, and destined to the same final and glorious inheritance;—and whereas we have seen in papers professing to be Universalist, advertisements of the sale of men, women and children, at public auction, Therefore,

'Resolved, That in the opinion of this Conference, such papers depart from the spirit of our religion, when they thus countenance the idea that man is to be bought and sold as a chattel.

Resolved, That slavery is inconsistent with the spirit of the Gospel, and should be opposed by all christian people, in such a manner as may appear to them fit and consistent.

Resolved, That we cannot but deeply regret the spirit manifested by our Southern brethren in reference to the movements of the brethren at the North who feel called upon to oppose slavery as a great and erying evil; and that while we, in the exercise of true christian feeling, accord to them the right of expressing their own opinions and feelings, and pursuing their own courses, we in the exercise of a christian independence claim the same right for ourselves.

Newburyport, Mass.

We copy the following letter from the 'Gospel Banner.' It was addressed by Br. Forbes to the Editor of that paper.

Newburyport, Mass., Jan. 7, 1843.

Br. Drew:—It is now nearly four months since I have written you, and I feel moved in the spirit to do so. Since then I have arrived at my new post in our Master's kingdom, and had time to survey my field of labor. As a whole I am pleased with it. The society to be sure is new, and somewhat at loose ends, in many respects; but it contains working men, upon whom I can rely in the several departments where their aid is needed.—The society is scattered over the entire village, and have been almost strangers to each other as a body, and of course there was a want of interest and sympathy with each other as individuals; but this difficulty is fast passing away.

Since I have been here, we have re-organized our Sabbath School, and adopted a new method of distributing the books, which is the same, however, that has been used at other places where I have had charge of Societies. The school numbers about one hundred scholars. We have a most excellent list of officers and teachers, and one of the best and most industrious superintendents I ever saw. He is always at work for the school, and devising something to make it interesting. He thinks of nothing but benefitting the school in what he does; and hence there are no efforts merely to make a show and glorify self, as I have not unfrequently seen, and no interest felt or effort used farther than this end could be attained. We have an excellent librarian, which is the next most important officer in the Sabbath School. He takes great interest in the matter as well as his assistants. He takes as much interest and pains as did our good friend and brother who filled that office in Belfast, whom I considered the best I ever saw before.

Our Sabbath School held its first exhibition on Thursday evening the fifth inst. Every thing passed off much to our satisfaction.—Thirty-five exercises were performed, including singing and prayers. There is the most musical talent in our school I ever saw in any as you may judge, when I tell you all the singing was done by the children alone, which consisted of twelve parts. One of the boys, about twelve years of age went upon the stage, spoke his piece, and at its conclusion led off in singing a hymn, in which the whole school joined! O it was delightful to hear those young voices go up in songs of praise to the Father of all. Nothing is so interesting as this to me. One little girl about six years of age went upon the stage and sung in childlike modesty and simplicity, 'I love the spring,' &c. Such was the interest in the exercises, we think of repeating them for the benefit of those who were unable to obtain admittance.

As you are aware, we have organized a church since I have been here. At our last communion we received one new member, and there are now three candidates for admission at our next. The prospect for the church is very good. I think we shall have additions every communion for some time to come. There is not however that deep religious interest in the society at large that I hope to see. Our social meetings, which we hold every Wednesday evening, are well attended, and we have a very good number of speakers; and we hope these meetings may prove the means of bringing about the state of things we desire to see.

We celebrated Christmas in our house. It was most superbly dressed, and was thronged Christmas eve, through the next day and evening. I am also engaged in delivering a course of doctrinal lectures, which secures for me very good houses, although there are several other meetings in the place, and a temperance meeting which takes away quite a number who desire to attend, but from their position in that movement cannot leave.

As a whole I think the prospect for the Society very good, although we have a thoroughly organized and powerful opposition to contend against. We are constantly making accessions from other churches. Our congregation, I should judge, numbers, in good weather, not far from five hundred, and they are generally very constant in attending meeting.

Thus you will see that I am not idle at my post, but keep trying to do. What will be the result of my labors here, time alone must determine.

Atkinson, N. H.

The following article from one of our lay brethren in Atkinson, N. H. will be found truly interesting. We do unfeignedly rejoice that there is such an excellent spirit among them. There are good brethren in that place. We always love to visit them. They honor the cause they have espoused. We congratulate them on their agreement with Br. Gilman, and we hope his ministry will be blessed to them. And we must not forget Tyngsboro' and Dunstable—may they soon be supplied with a faithful pastor.

Br. Whittemore,—As you weekly publish and send us communinations, which not only encourage our hearts, but strengthen our hands, you will not think strange, that I attempt to exert my feeble powers in writing a few lines to you in return. It did our souls good to read the account of the meeting in Marblehead. And then to think of the great good, that must have been done at that happy meeting, it fills our hearts with a joy, that is unspeakable and full of glory.

I have taken my pen in hand, to give you a little information concerning the religious affairs in this region. Suffer us, for a few moments, to just turn our thoughts back to the soul-stirring meeting that we had at the dedication of our new Church. It was truly a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and long shall we remember the kind counsel and advice of Br. Skinner, and others, who spoke to us at that time. It was treasured up in good and honest hearts, where it has, I trust, and still will continue to bring forth fruit in abundance. Near the close of the meeting, when our separation drew nigh, we could not refrain from returning our heartfelt thanks to our ministering and lay brethren, who had taken parts in the services, and to the audience for the kind attention, which they had paid to all that had been said. We could not help saying in our remarks, that our ministering and lay brethren, who had spoken to us during the meeting, had come to us filled with the spirit of the gospel, and with the doctrine of God's universal grace and benevolence, and that they had poured it out upon us freely; and then, (although it has been said that Universalists never pray,) we could not hinder ourselves from praying audibly, in a public Conference, that it might sink deep into the hearts of all who had attended the meetings, and have its desired effect.

The increasing interest, that has been taken in religious matters since, has proved to my mind, that our prayer was not only heard, but answered by Him, who is rich in mercy, and abundant in grace. Since that time we have been well supplied with the preached word. We have had a chance to hear many excellent gospel sermons.

Br. Whittemore, it becomes not only my duty, but my happy privilege, to inform you, that the Universalist Societies in Atkinson, N. H. and in West Haverhill, Mass. have given Br. Josiah Gilman, of Tyngsborough, Mass. a unanimous call to become their pastor, and it is with heartfelt pleasure that I announce to you the fact, that he has kindly accepted the invitation, and will remove to Atkinson the first of April next. His labors will be nearly equally divided between the two Societies. This is not all that has been done. The ladies in Atkinson have formed an Aid Society, to assist us in the spread of the gospel, and for other benevolent objects. More than thirty members belong to the Society. May they persevere, and God will crown their labors with a blessing.

Br. Whittemore, did you think, when you were here three years ago, that so much would be done before you should visit us again? 'The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad.' We give 'glory unto God in the highest, and on earth peace and good will towards men.'

We cannot close without writing a few lines to our friends, of like precious faith, in Tyngsboro' and Dunstable, Mass. Brethren, we hope and confidently trust, that you will never indulge any unkind feelings towards your pastor or us, on account of the agreement that has been made between us. We have prayed to God for His guidance and direction, and He has given us answers of peace. The Lord has gone before us and prepared the way. May you ever have a realizing sense of the great worth of that ever memorable expression of David, the Psalmist, 'Behold, how good and how pleasant it it, for brethren to dwell together in unity.'

We pray that the Lord may send you another pastor after his own heart. As the time approaches, when your pastor will leave you, and you begin to anticipate, that some of your streams of comfort and consolation are about to be dried up, may you look forward with pleasing anticipation, to that glorious time, when parting shall be known no more, when tears shall be wiped from off all faces, and the ransomed of the Lord shall return unto Zion, when death shall be swallowed up in victory, and Jesus, the Son of God, shall deliver up the kingdom to his Father, and God shall be all in all. Yours fraternally,

Enoch Little.

Atkinson, Jan. 18, 1843.

(ORIGINAL.)

To Rev. Samuel Heath,

Methodist minister, of Lunenburg, Mass.

Dear Sir—Last Sunday evening I attended your Miller meeting at the house of Mr. Burrage, in this town, which, suffer me to tell you, gave a just representation of hell, as portrayed by believers in endless torture. On the one hand, I found yourself and your deluded dupes, weeping, wailing and gnashing their teeth, crying out, 'Do, do, Lord! Help, help, Lord! Glory! yes, glory, Lord! and amens by the scores;—and on the other hand, we saw spectators in quite a lively mood, imitating and mocking you. Verily, had we been in the theatre, and hell been the tragedy acted, we should have called you admirable performers. We heard some of your audience say when services were closed, that they thought it was wicked to go to such a meeting, and they would not go again. We tho't so too. It was nothing more nor less than a theatrical performance for the sake of proselyting. It appeared a real bedlam. We thought, really, the devil was let loose for a season. The 'whirlwind,' 'fire,' and 'earthquake,' were all we heard. And these combined will make a hell any where. After the performers got a little cooled off, you arose, and commenced your lecture from Matt. xxiv. 14, 'And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; then shall the end come.' You commenced by saying, that the last week you had an interview with a preacher who told you that if he could believe that the Bible had been preached to all the world, he should think the end was nigh. Well, said you, I can prove that it has to a demonstration. You then went on as though on purpose to refute yourself, and quoted Rom. x. 18, and Col. i. 23, 'Yes, verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world!' 'Be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature under heaven.' These texts, you said, proved that the gospel had been preached to all the world—to every creature under heaven. But, consider, sir, Paul affirmed this nearly 1800 years ago, that in his day the gospel had been preached to all the world—to every creature under heaven. It seems that you were aware of this, and backed off by saying, 'Scripture had a double meaning.' We shall make no reply to such a foolish assertion. Then shall the end come! A great deal of emphasis was laid on here; and you inquired, 'What end?' and answered, 'the 3d verse tells us.' The disciples inquired, said you, in this verse, 'What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?' You said, the end of the world here, meant the end of the material universe. You knew that some applied it to the destruction of Jerusalem. But, sir, what are the facts? Do you not yourself well know? I opened my Greek Testament at Matt. xxiv. 3, and found that the phrase rendered end of the world, is suntelia tou aionos, literally, the conclusion of the age. Heb. ix. 26, we find the same expression. Paul stated, that the end of the age had happened in his day. 'Upon whom the end of the ages (ta tele ton aionion) are come.' 1 Cor. x. 11. The end of the world here spoken of, is not kosmos, but the end of aion, the age; and these are facts which neither you, sir, nor all the 'gates of hell' can gainsay. And we say, 'glory to God, amen!'

You also said, that the destruction of the Jewish state and polity was no coming of Christ. We thought it not a little wonderful that a man of your stature should be so much wiser than all the learned commentators.—Speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, you said, Christ did not come then. 'Christ said he should not be there,' you repeated a number of times, and passed it off for scripture language! We would call you attention to Rev. xxii. 18, 19. What a heaven-daring assertion! (☞Christ said he should not be there.☜) The Saviour sent out his disciples to preach, and told them when they were 'persecuted in this city, flee ye to another; for verily I say unto you, ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of man be come. But he that endureth unto the end shall be saved.' Matt. x. 22, 23. We ask, end of what? and saved from what? Something, certainly, that was to transpire before they should have travelled over all the cities of Israel, and when the Son of man should come. 'For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' Matt. xvi. 27, 28.—We know your foolish cavilling, here—that the two verses do not refer to the same event. But you might tell us with just as much propriety, that your head and limbs did not belong to your body, and were not attached to it. You say the 28th verse was fulfilled when Christ was transfigured, on the mount, before John, Peter, and James. We ask, did he then reward every man according to his works? If so, you will want your 'double meaning' again. See Mark viii. 38; ix. 1. What you said on the 7th chapter of Daniel, 'this generation,' and James v. 7, was all cavilling and misrepresentation. If the reader will only look into Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary on these passages, he, I fear, will be hardly able to call you an honest man.

Luke xxi. 24. 'Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.' On this passage, you misrepresented Dr. Clarke. For an exposition of this text Dr. C. refers you to Matt. xxiv. 31, and says the prophecy 'has been' fulfilled under the Jewish polity. Why, Mr. H., we want no other aid besides Dr. Adam Clarke, the great Methodist Commentator, to put down all the Millerites in Christendom.

I will now tell you, sir, in conclusion, that your lecture is not worthy of the notice which I have taken of it. I took up my pen more particularly at this time, to say to all our opposing brethren, that we do not believe in your 'Second Advent' doctrine. We protest against it. It is a libel on the Holy Scriptures; and when the time and bluster is blown over, we hope our brethren of a contrary faith, and that the whole public, will remember what we told them; and give us credit for telling the truth, and no more call us infidels. Yours sincerely, A. H.

Lunenburg, Jan. 23, 1843.

The Microscope.

It is now many years ago since Mr. Clarke was sent out by the 'Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge' to Bengal, in order to convert as many of the benighted Indians to Christianity as possible. His talents were of the highest order, his zeal well known; it was therefore most sanguinely expected that his mission would be crowned with success.

On his arrival, the Governor General finding that his means were small, and truly sympathizing with those who thus endeavored to awake the sense of the heathen world to 'light and life,' gave him the direction of the Calcutta free school, and under one or two other minor posts, which considerably increased the worthy Missionary's income.

After several ineffectual attempts to convert the natives, poor Clarke returned in despair to Calcutta, feeling more than half inclined to sail for Europe, so much did he take his repeated failures to heart. He was, however, dissuaded from this step, and applying himself assiduously to the management of his scholars, he strove to banish from his mind the thorn which rankled there.

One day our missionary learned, to his great joy, that a Brahmin of the very first rank had arrived in the metropolis. Determined to bring matters to an issue, Clarke wrote to him and begged him to meet him on a certain day, when he would undertake to convince him (the Hindoo priest) of his errors.

To this the Brahmin consented, and at the time appointed the Heathen and the Christian champion met to discuss, in the presence of several witnesses, the merits of their respective creeds.

As is usual in polemical discussions, the controversy was opened by several inconsequential queries and answers. For half an hour neither party had put forth a startling proposition; the wily Indian taking care to confine himself to the defensive. Tired at lenght by this scene, Clarke suddenly and abruptly asked him,

'Are you forbidden to eat anything in which animal life exists?'

'I am.'

'Have you ever broken through this law?'

'Never.'

'May you not unconsciously have been led into this crime?'

'Impossible.'

'Will you swear to it?'

'Most solemnly I do.'

'Do you ever eat pomegrantes?'

'Daily.'

'Bring me some of that fruit, then,' rejoined Clarke turning to a servant, His order was complied with—the pomegrantes were brought.

'Choose one.'

The Brahmin did so.

'Cut it in two.'

With this direction he complied.

'Place it here,' and Clarke assisted him to put it beneath a microscope.

'Now look at it.'

The Brahmin did so; but no sooner did he apply his eye, than started back with affright;—the fruit was berfectly alive with animalculæ. The puzzled Hindoo drew out the pomegranate, (which perhaps my readers are not aware, is more closely filled with insects than any other fruit,) looked at it, examined it, replaced it, and again beheld the myriads of living creatures with which it was rife.—He felt it with his hand, to convince himself that there was no trick in the affair—then suddenly drawing himself up, he slowly uttered,

'Bus-such hi.' ('Enough—it is true.')

'You acknowledge, then, that you have sinned unconsciously?—that everything being filled with animalculæ, invisible to the naked eye, you can neither eat nor drink without committing a crime?'

The abashed Hindoo bowed.

'Shall I show you how full of similar insects every drop of water is?'

'No I have seen enough.'

'Do you desire further proof?'

'I have a favor to ask.'

'What is it? If I can, I will grant it.'

'Give me your microscope. I cannot buy it; give it me.'

Clarke paused for a moment, for he had that morning paid ten guineas for it; and being a poor man, he could ill afford to part with it. But as the Brahmin was urgent, almost to entreaty, he at length consented, (especially as he thought the other would afford him in return some curiosity of equal value,) and presented it to him.

The Brahmin took it, gave one look of triumph round the hall, and suddenly raising his arm, dashed the microscope into a thousand atoms on the marble floor.

'What do you mean by this?, exclaimed Clarke, in undisguised astonishment.

'It means, Sir Christian,' replied the Hindoo, in a cold, grave tone, 'it means that I was a happy, a good, a proud man. By means of yonder instrument you have robbed me of all future happiness. You have condemned me to descend to my grave wretched and miserable!'

With these words the unfortunate Brahmin quitted the hall, and soon after retired up the country.

Hints to Preachers.

An English periodical contains a good anecdote, illustrating the importance of simplicity in the language introduced into sermons and addresses intended for the edification of the great body of the people. It may not be altogether out of place in Massachusetts. A distinguished clergyman, when in the act of writing his sermon, made use of the term, 'Ostentatious man.' Throwing down his pen he wished to satisfy himself, ere he proceeded, as to whether a great portion of his congregation might comprehend the meaning of said term, and he adopted the following method of proof; ringing the bell his footman appeared, and he was thus addressed by his master:

'Thomas, what do you conceive to be implied by an ostentatious man?'

'An ostentatious man, sir?' said Thomas 'why, sir, I should say a perfect gentleman.'

'Very good,' observed the vicar 'send Ellis (his coachman) here.'

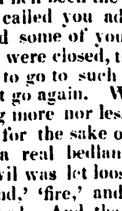
'Ellis,' said the vicar, what do you imagine an ostentatious man to be?'

'An ostentatious man, sir,' replied Ellis, 'why I should say an ostentatious man means what we calls, saving your presence, a jolly fellow.

It needs scarcely be added, that the vicar substituted a less ambiguous word, the school master not having been at that time abroad.

Origin of the word News.

'News is not as many imagine, derived from the adjective New. In former times it was a prevalent practice to put over the periodical publications of the day, the initial letters of the cardinal points of the compass, thus:—



importing that these papes contained intelligence from the four quarters of the globe; and from this practice is derived the term of newspaper.—The Mirror.

Miller's Theory Refuted. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1842.—The work is in three parts.

I. Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted.

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

Book of Promises. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. Relfinch Emmons. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of distinguished theologians, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

Price of the work 25 cents. 125 pages.

Practical and Experimental Religion. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the following new and excellent work—'Practical and Experimental Religion; or the Teachings and Tendencies of Universalism. Designed as a Companion to the 'Christian Comforter.' By Henry Bacon.' Read this book and learn the moral power of Universalism. 'It is good to live by, and it is good to die by.' Price 50 cents.

EIGHT DOLLARS PER DOZEN!

The cheapest Book of Psalmody sold in Boston.

New Book of Psalmody. Third Edition. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by Thomas Whittemore, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of SHORT ANTHEMS, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Laug, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect while, as regards the Lessons or Rudiments, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

Dear Sir,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

Jotham S. French.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

'Gospel Harmonist.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

Fourth Edition of Conference Hymns. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'

Price $1,25 per dozen—12 1-2 cents single.

Life of Rev. John Murray. For sale at this Office, the 'Life of Rev. John Murray, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by Thomas Whittemore.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

Paige's Selections. 'Selections from Eminent Commentators who have believed in punishment after death; wherein they have agreed with Universalists in the interpretation of Scriptures relating to Punishment. By Rev. Lucius R. Paige. Second Edition, with revisions and additions. 358 pages.—Price $1.

This is a highly valuable work to all Universalists.—It proves by the most respectable orthodox authority, that the interpretations which Universalists have given of the passages of Scripture which relate to punishment, are correct. It is a refutation of endless misery by the testimony of the most learned writers who have believed that doctrine. The threatenings of punishment, occuring in the New Testament, which have been supposed to refer to endless misery, are explained in this work, in the very language of the Partialist Commentators. It is fatal to the doctrine of endless misery.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

SERMON I.

BY REV. EDWIN H. CHAPIN, OF CHARLESTOWN.

Capital Punishment Unnecessary.

'The law and the prophets were until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached.'—Luke xvi. 16.

I propose in this and two following discourses, to discuss the subject of CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. As an important topic for the times, there seems to be no apology required for agitating it. The public mind is already stirred by the matter, and it involves principles and affects interests which demand our attention, not only as Philanthropists, but as Christians. In this discourse, then, I shall endeavor to show that Capital Punishment is unnecessary; in the next discourse that it is inexpedient; and in the concluding discourse that it is opposed by Christian Philosophy.

My work then at the present time is to show that Capital Punishment is unnecessary. But before proceeding to the main point, it will be well for us to understand distinctly what we mean by Capital Punishment, in order that we may know what we are opposing, and that there may be no confusion of ideas. I mean by Capital Punishment, a penalty of death, executed in conformity to the ordinary proceedings of a Court of Justice—executed agreeably to the opinion of a Jury, the deliberate sentence of a Judge, after an impartial trial, and in the midst of a community, the great mass of which are in favor of and ready to maintain law and order. I am thus explicit, because the subject is beset with many cavils, and curious questions are sometimes asked. We have recently had an instance in which such a question is likely to be raised. I allude to the dreadful tragedy on board the Somers. Was not the execution of Spencer, Cromwell and Small, an instance of Capital Punishment? I answer, yes—but of capital punishment executed under entirely different circumstances from those on the land. Avowedly executed in self defence. The officer now on his trial will be acquitted only by proving that there was no alternative between the death of these men, and the death of those who supported the command and discipline of the vessel—by showing that the frightful catastrophe was forced on by imperative circumstances. If this was the case, then it falls under the category of deeds committed in self defence, and is to be viewed precisely as we would view the effort which you would make to preserve your own life from the attempt of the midnight assassin. Now, I am aware, that there are those who oppose the taking of life under any circumstances—even in self defence. This is a position that I do not propose to discuss, yet, it brings me to the point which I wish to make clear in the outset. I wish to separate the principle of capital punishment from the principle of self defence—the endeavor that is made under desperate circumstances, to rescue our own lives at the expense of his life who would murder us. I say that such an endeavor is one thing, and the penalty that is executed in due form of law, after a deliberate trial, with the criminal in safe keeping, in the midst of secure prisons and a law-and-order-loving community, is another and a very different thing. And this latter, I now propose to show, is unnecessary.

In considering whether Capital Punishment is necessary, or not, our subject will arrange itself under two heads. 1st. If Capital Punishment is commanded of us by God, it is necessary. 2d. If it is demanded by individual or social welfare, it is necessary. Our business is to show that it is NOT commanded by God—that it is NOT demanded by individual or social welfare; and that it is, therefore, unnecessary.

I. Capital Punishment is not commanded by God. This opens at once to our examination, what is called the Scriptural argument for Capital Punishment. With many, no doubt, the whole rationale of the matter hangs upon this. If by God's own decree Capital Punishment is ordained in all lands, through all ages, then the point is set at rest. It is impious to gainsay what the Great Law Giver has established. Of course as infinite Wisdom saw all the bearings and connections of this institution, before He ordained it, there is an a-priori demonstration that individual and social welfare demand it, that it is expedient, and that christian philosophy adopts it. We should have, then, no need of further discussion upon the subject, if God has distinctly commanded all times and all lands to inflict capital punishment under certain circumstances. But you perceive, this is a very broad premise, and one at which a man may well pause, reflect, and investigate. There are one or two important questions that may be asked, and that should be settled ere we decide this matter in the affirmative. In the first place, has God anywhere commanded Capital Punishment? In the second place, if He has commanded it, what are the circumstances under which the command was given? Is it a perpetual and universal command? These three questions will embrace what we have to say under this head.

1st. Has God anywhere commanded Capital Punishment? There is nothing to prevent this question from being answered very briefly, and that in the affirmative. In the Mosaic law the penalty of death is affixed to certain offences. Among these were Idolatry, Witchcraft, Blasphemy, Sabbath-Breaking, Eating Blood, Murder. 'He that sacrificeth unto any god save unto the Lord only, he shall be utterly destroyed.' 'Thou shall not suffer a witch to live.' 'And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, he shall be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall be put to death.' 'Ye shall keep the Sabbath; for it is holy unto you.—Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death.' And whatsoever man there shall be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood; I will even set my face against that man that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among the people.' 'The murderer shall surely be put to death.'

I have not entered into an enumeration of all the crimes, nor specified the details concerning them or their penalties. But enough has been adduced to show that God, in the Mosaic law, established Capital Punishment. It was then necessary to be inflicted, and if it can be shown that that ordinance is now binding upon men, the case in behalf of Capital Punishment is clearly made out, and the negative has nothing to advance. This consideration leads us to the second and now the most important question.

2d. What were the circumstances under which this decree of Capital Punishment was given? Is it a perpetual and universal command? It does not follow because God issues a command, that it is a perpetual and universal command. This is to be determined by circumstances. The command to Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac, was a temporary and personal command—it terminated with Abraham and the circumstances under which he acted. But if a law may be decreed for a particular purpose, at a particular time—so a code of laws may be ordained for a particular people, in a particular age. And it no more follows that that code is binding upon all people, in every age, than it does that the personal and temporary law is binding upon all men, through all time. We must make a careful distinction here between the ethical or moral law, and the civil law—between rules of action that have their foundation in the depths of man's spiritual nature, and the internal government or police of different nations. The former is universal because it belongs intrinsically to the principles of our being; and human nature is every where and always the same. The latter is arbitrary, having no foundation in the eternal reason of things, but depending upon local or temporary circumstances. For instance, the principle, 'Thou shalt not steal,' is binding upon all men, forever; but the mode in which theft shall be dealt with, whether by whipping, branding, or imprisonment, varies with circumstances.

Now, I affirm that the Mosaic Code—at least that portion of it which may be termed the civil law—was of this local and temporary character. It was given to the primitive Jews. And who were the Jews? Whatever the sublimity with which they may be invested by after history, whatever sanctity the long career of miracle and prophecy may have thrown around them, we must not forget that they were originally a rude and ignorant people, inclining to the idolatry of the Egyptians to whom they had been bondmen, and incapable at that time of acting upon lofty principles, or of comprehending broad and spiritual ideas. Yet they were selected to be the teachers in divine things of the human race. How was the result to be secured? Not by communicating a revelation fitted to perfect men and perfect circumstances. Such a revelation could not be apprehended by men as rude and narrow-minded as the Jews. No; the Wisdom of the Teacher is seen in the adaptation of His instructions to the beings to be taught. A perfect system of education is that which is perfectly adapted to the circumstances of the time, not to the circumstances of some other time. Such I conceive, was the Mosaic law. It was adapted to the age and the nation for which it was promulgated. A ferocious and sensual people were first to be deterred by physical and bloody laws. An appeal against wrong was first to be made by outward punishments, by sheer brute force; and we cannot expect to find the operation of Christian principles in a nation centuries behind the Christian spirit. In a rude state, like that, the first point to be gained was the recognition of such a thing as restraint upon wild passions—the recognition of such things as government and law. The passage from a belief in many gods to a perception of One—from the worship of a material deity to that of a spiritual, universal Father—was to be gradual; yet, the first point, the transition from Polytheism to Monotheism, was something gained. So, I say, the passage from unrestrained license to lawful submission, was something gained—though it still must have been a rude state of things, far behind that in which the soul obeys the great idea of right, when men become 'a law unto themselves.' It is not my work now to defend the propriety of the Mosaic code. My present object is to show that it was of necessity a local and temporal code. And I think I have proved its temporal character, by showing that from the necessity of things it was adapted to a primitive state of society, and if we believe that there is such a principle as progress, then we must believe that it is possible for men to get beyond the application of such a code. This they do, the moment they rise to the perception of a higher code. Christianity is a higher code. My text bears upon this exact point. 'The law and the prophets were until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached.' Which shall we obey? Which is the universal and perpetual law? The kingdom of God? Christianity? The whole spirit of this dispensation is opposed to the code of blood.

So much, then, for the temporal character of the Mosaic code. But it was not only temporal, it was local. Michaelis, in his Commentaries on the laws of Moses, has enumerated several points which show an evident adaptation of these laws to the people to which they were given, but that render it impossible for all nations to adopt them. 'Moses,' says he, 'prohibited the kindling of fire on the Sabbath, which might do very well in Palestine, but how unsuitable would it be in Norway!' 'The kings of Israel,' says he, 'were, by a fundamental law of the state, interdicted from maintaining a strong force of cavalry. In a mountainous country like Palestine, this was a wise policy, ... but if this were made a fundamental law in the Prussian states, they would be undone.' He thus specifies several particulars, tending to show the local application of the Mosaic code. Indeed we might, if we knew all the particulars, probably, find a reason for every rite and every law of the Hebrews, in their peculiar circumstances. Who, then, will take this code, and apply it to every case, of every nation, in all times?

The Mosaic code was evidently local and temporary. But at this result we have thus far arrived by inference. We are not without direct testimony upon the subject. In regard to the Mosaic custom of a bill of divorcement, Christ said to the Pharisees, 'For the hardness of your hearts, he wrote you this precept.' You see it was adapted to circumstances. In the 21st chapter of the book of Exodus, we read the following—'Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe.' This is what is called the lex talionis, or law of retaliation. But what said the Saviour to this law? 'Ye have heard that it hath been said: an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. But I say unto you that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.' Which I do not construe literally, but the force of which does away with the Mosaic precept on the subject, as clearly as its spirit is opposed to the law of revenge. Let us hear what the writer to the Hebrews, says, 'If, therefore, perfection were by the Levitcal priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another Priest should arise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron? For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change of the law.' A few passages of this kind are as decisive as the multiplication of many. The Mosaic law has no binding authority upon us.

There are many, perhaps, who do not require the course of argument which I have been pursuing, and some, probably, suppose that all the laws of Moses are to be kept, and all the penalties attached thereto administered. But this is the idea impressed upon some: If God commanded Capital Punishment it is right and necessary, since God would command nothing that is not right and necessary. I trust if there are any such who now hear me, they will, after what has been said, perceive the difference between what was right and necessary at one period, and for one people, and what is right and necessary under all circumstances; and seeing, also, that some institutions which God commanded through Moses have been abrogated, all may be abrogated, and it does not follow because Capital Punishment was attached to the Mosaic code that it is a perpetual ordinance.

To what has been stated with regard to the Mosaic law, some may offer the objection—that this would do away with many solemn and religious precepts. I would ask such persons, in the first place, to remember the distinction that has been made between ethical or moral, and the civil law. The former is founded in the eternal distinction of right and wrong, and asserts it—the latter relates only to the manner in which that distinction shall be applied in society. It is plain, then, although the latter might vary, the former would not be changed. The moral law says, 'thou shalt not kill'—the civil law says, 'if you do kill you shall die.' But now, if the civil law should say, 'if you do kill you shall be imprisoned,' it is plain that it would not alter the moral law, it would not weaken it, but it would emphatically confirm it. The great principle that opposes murder would remain the same as ever, only the mode in which the crime of murder shall be treated would be changed. Now then, because the civil law of Moses is abrogated, it does not follow that its moral precepts are nullified. Capital Punishment belongs to the civil law, not to the moral. The moral branch of the law says, 'thou shall not kill.' Moses ordained that for the crime of killing, a man should suffer death.—If another legislator should ordain that for the crime of killing, a man should be imprisoned for life, could it be said that he did not regard the same moral law that Moses did? Is it not plain that in this respect he would differ from Moses only in civil administration? You perceive then, that this Capital Punishment is not the law against killing, but only the mode in which that law was to be administered.—It is plain, therefore, that Capital Punishment with the rest of the civil mechanism of the Mosaic economy, might be abrogated, and yet the moral law,—'Thou shalt not kill,' remain in full force. If it is insisted, that not only the moral law is of force, but the mode in which that moral law was administered among the Jewish people; then, I ask, what right have we to treat any crime in a different manner from that in which it was treated by the Hebrew economy? Eating blood was a crime punishable by death—why do not we make it a crime, and punish it with death? Blasphemy was punishable with death, and Sabbath-breaking—why do we not make them so?—Upon these premises, our Puritan fathers were more consistent than we. And why do we not punish murder, not alone with the same penalty, but in the same way? The Jewish assassin was not formally executed by the arm of the law. His execution fell into the hands of the avenger of blood, as they entitled the next of kin to the slain man. The murderer might flee to one of the cities of refuge, and there have his case investigated, being, while there, safe from the revenge of the next of kin. But, if found guilty of murder, the next of kin slew him—not a legal executioner, like ours; and if at any time during the life of the High Priest, although acquitted, the slayer should leave the city of refuge, the avenger of blood might put him to death.—Now, I say, if we are to keep all of the civil law of Moses, why not observe all its forms? or, if we take the right to abolish any of that civil law, why not abolish all? Plainly, we make a distinction between the moral branch of the Mosaic code and the civil, and we feel that if circumstances call upon us to abolish that civil law, it does not effect the moral—it does not effect eternal principles one jot or tittle. And I believe that civil law is abolished, and has no binding force upon us.

But, in the second place, I am ready to go further, and grant that the whole of the Mosaic code, as a peculiar code, both moral and civil, is abolished; and what do we lose then? One item of the moral obligations that rest upon us? No. Christianity proclaims and confirms these obligations, and under no circumstances can we be rid of them. The law, 'Thou shalt not kill,' is proclaimed anew in the precept that says, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' Of old, when the first man was created, before the Levitical Priesthood was ordained, before the tables of stone were delivered, it was inscribed by God's own hand on the fleshy table of the human heart. Reason enunciates it, and conscience echoes it. Says Archbishop Whately, 'To say that no part of the Jewish law is binding upon christians, is very far from leaving them at liberty to disregard all moral duties. For, in fact, the very definition of a moral duty, implies its universal obligation, independent of all enactment. The precepts respecting sacrifices, for instance, and other ceremonial observances, are all positive ordinances;—meaning that the things in question become duties because they were commanded:—the commandment to love one's neighbor as one's self, on the contrary, we call a moral precept, on the very ground that it was a thing commanded because it was right. And it is evident that what was right or wrong in itself before the law existed, must remain such after it is abrogated.' Let it be then, that what I have said involves the total abolition of the Mosaic law, moral as well as civil; you will will see that not one moral obligation is thereby removed, since morality is not a law, but a principle, and all that is of this kind in the Mosaic economy was adopted and re-iterated by Christianity. I say, then, because Capital Punishment was ordained in the Mosaic law, it does not therefore remain binding upon our legislators to continue the existence of the institution.

But I must briefly examine two objections, that may spring up at this stage of the argument. It may be said by some—'we admit that the Mosaic code was temporary and local, and that it has been abolished. Consequently, we draw no argument for Capital Punishment from that. But do we not find the institution recognized both before and after the Mosaic dispensation? Was it not proclaimed to the Patriarchal age? Is it not confirmed by Christianity?' My reply is in the negative. Christ says, or at least repeats as with approbation the commandment 'thou shalt not kill;' but he does not say 'thou shalt kill him who has killed another.' That mandate—'thou shalt not kill,' is addressed as much to the Judge on his bench, as to the murderer who bends over his purposed victim. But the whole spirit of Christianity is against retaliation, the measuring of vengeance for injury, which evidently lay at the foundation of the Mosaic code. Nor can any sanction be found for Capital Punishment in the text which says of the magistrate, that 'he beareth not the sword in vain.' Since it evidently refers to the power of punishing, as an abstract principle, which is in the hand of the magistrate, and the sword is an emblem of that power, as we represent Justice with scales and a sword. As to the words of our Saviour, 'For all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword,' we presume that most present, whatever may be their opinion in regard to Capital Punishment, will admit that it is not mandatory but prophetic, uttering this general truth—'All they that take the sword will be likely to perish from a violent death,' We shall have occasion, however, to refer to this passage below.

But, in the early age of the world, when the earth, as it were, had been purified from sin by the waters of the Deluge, and God hung out His Rainbow Covenant in the sky then He said—'Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed.' And this supposed Command has been ever reiterated as the great decree upon which the right of Capital Punishment rests, which gives it a sanctity that is not to be violated.

But, in the first place, that this is a Command, does not plainly appear. Christ says, 'all they that take the sword, shall perish with the sword.' Do we suppose him to mean by this, that it is the duty of men to inflict Capital Punishment, with the sword, upon all who use it? No: it is evidently prophetic not mandatory, and the passage would be more properly translated—'All they that take the sword will perish by the sword.' That is—'a violent life is likely to close with a violent death.' And is it not a truth borne out by experience? Now, the text under consideration, may fall into the same category. 'Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man will his blood be shed.' The life of the murder-stained criminal will be likely to close with a sanguinary death.

But I am more inclined to the opinion that we find the true meaning of the text in the translation—'Whatsoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall its blood be shed.' This translation of the passage is well authorized and supported. Thus rendered, it extends the sanctity of human life even to the beast, and accords with the context,—'And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of every man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Whatsoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall its blood be shed: for in the image of God made He man.' Now let any one read the passage under consideration, together with the context, and see if the can conscientiously say that it inculcates Capital Punishment, that it gives to man a power to take human life. The great idea here is the sacredness of the mysterious principle of life. Even in the beast it was to be respected, 'the life thereof, which is the blood,' was not to be eaten. But should the beast violate that principle of life in man, by shedding his blood, man was to shed the blood of the beast, in order to demonstrate the sanctity of that which was made in the image of God—but 'at the hand of every man's brother, will I, require the life of man.' The term 'whatsoever' would seem to direct the application of the mandate in the text, to the beast, to something lower than man, and the blood of the beast shedding man's blood man might shed; but, says the context, 'at the hand of every man's brother will I,' not shall man, not shall a Court of Justice, but 'will I require the life of man.' The penalty here is not with man, but with God. This, then, I say, seems to be the idea of the text and contexts. The principle of life has a mysterious sanctity, even in the beast. But man has a high distinction from the brute. He has not only the principle of life in him, but he is made in the image of God. Man, then, is not to violate this principle of life in the beast, for even there it is sacred. But the beast violating it in man shall die by the hand of man; and man violating it in his brother, shall render an account to GOD; for in the case of man's murder, not only is the principle of life violated, but the image of God is desecrated.

I would say, still further, that take the text as meaning what it is very generally supposed to mean, I am not prepared to admit its universal and ever-binding sanction, in all lands under every circumstance—in every stage of human society. It was given in the Patriarchal age—the immediate precursor of the Mosaic dispensation, in which are found the direct ancestors of the Jewish people;—and the text seems to prepare the way for that mysterious sanctity with which blood was regarded under the Mosaic code, and the context contains a direction about eating flesh with the blood, which we, under the Christian dispensation, do not regard. Is not the whole precept, then, characterized by temporal features? Does it wear the aspect of an eternal principle?

And this leads me to say, still further, that the text seems to have a deeper significance than that which attaches to murder alone.—It seems to breathe this mysterious reverence for blood, or life, viewing the shedding of it under any circumstances as a kind of sacrilege. Else, why is the beast to be punished for shedding blood? Surely, he does not commit murder, in any proper sense of the term. There are no provisos in the text, if we view it as mandatory. 'Whoso, or whatsoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his, or its blood be shed.' There is no distinction made here as to degrees of murder—that of hot passion, or that of fiendish hate—that which is committed in a momentary struggle, and that which is deliberately executed in cold blood. If this passage proves the requirement of a Court of Justice to inflict Capital Punishment, it proves its requirement to inflict it upon the soldier who has shot down an enemy. 'Whosoever, or whatsoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his or its blood be shed. Is it likely that this is the meaning of the passage? Read the conclusion of the last verse—'Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made He man.' Does not this proclaim the awful sanctity of human life? Yes, its awful sanctity even in the criminal? Does it, think you, give this requirement—that the man who destroys the image of God in another, shall by other men have the image of God destroyed in him?—Would this repetition of the destruction of life tend to confirm the sanctity of that image? Because it has been violated in one case, it shall be violated in another—think you that this is its meaning?

But if the common interpretation still be pressed—allow me to ask, why was not the command strictly obeyed in the age to which it was given? Take the case of Simeon and Levi, the sons of Jacob. They treacherously murdered Hamor and Schechem, and the males in their city, and yet the blood of Simeon and Levi was not shed in return. And why was not the requirement heeded in the case of Moses, who slew the Egyptian? But if I am thus referred to the early world for the sanction of Capital Punishment, I go back even further than this precept that was given after the Deluge. I go back to the murder of Abel. Was the blood of Cain shed for that awful crime? If Capital Punishment is a perpetually Divine institution, why was it not asserted then, in that early time, when the first blood shed by man had stained that beautiful earth over which the morning stars had so lately shouted for joy? Why was it not proclaimed then, when that passion that sometimes rises in man's heart first prompted to the violation of the shrine, so lately from the hands of its God, that held the mystery of life? What did God do concerning Cain, when his brother's blood cried from the ground? Did he order man to shed his blood? No. He set a mark upon him, lest any finding him should kill him. Even in that criminal, driven forth a vagabond upon the earth—his very footsteps echoing his brother's dying cry—his brow thunder-scarred and his hands bloody; even in him was shewn the awful sanctity of human life, the preciousness of that image of God that is not to be violated even by the hands of judicial authority.—This precaution in the case of Cain, could not have been taken merely because of the scarcity of men on the face of the earth, which required his life to make up a necessary number; for there were men enough to endanger his life unless some mark was set upon him, and they were taught in the preservation of that anguish-torn homicide a far greater reverence for human life, than they would have been by his execution. Life is sacred. Life is not to be taken, even for life. From beneath that rainbow are, and from the ashes of martyred Abel, and from the stamped forehead of Cain, is proclaimed to the magistrate and the criminal, to the murderer in his bloody purpose and the Judge in his fearful decision—'Thou shalt not kill!'

Thus much for the scriptural argument upon this subject. To the question—has God commanded Capital Punishment as a perpetual ordinance, I answer, after what has been said, in the negative. Capital Punishment is not necessary, then, upon the ground that God requires it.

II. We have yet to discuss the question—whether Capital Punishment is demanded by individual or by social welfare? If so, it is still necessary, although God may not have specially commanded it. There are many things that have been left to be decided by circumstances. General principles are given—the great, fundamental principle of right is given; and then each State, or Nation, is left to regulate its own internal economy.—They cannot lawfully do what is not right—they may do anything that is right. Now there are some who will contend, that no one has the right to take life, under any circumstances—that society, if it takes life, assumes a power that does not belong to it; and that the precept—'Thou shalt not kill,' is strictly binding upon legislators and upon the people at large, upon society and upon individuals. I do not agree with those who take this position, nor do I think that in dissenting from them, I am inconsistent with the stress which I have just laid upon the mandate—'Thou shalt not kill,' and upon the preciousness of human life. You will recollect, that in the commencement, I made a distinction between self-defence and judicial execution. I wish to apply that distinction here. I cannot so interpret the precept, 'Thou shalt not kill,' as to forbid every effort made for preserving inviolate that sanctity of human life in ourselves and those dependent upon us. This too seems to be a law of nature, whose prompter is the human heart. I acknowledge, then, a right of self-defence in individuals, and, of course, I must acknowledge it in society. But, if in the case of individuals, I can think of nothing that can render taking of human life necessary, except self-defence—so in society I can think of nothing else that renders the taking of life necessary, except self-defence. We need not dwell long, then, upon this branch of our discourse. If we shew that Capital Punishment is not necessary to individual or social protection, we shew that it is unnecessary—for I know of nothing else that will warrant its use. Is Capital Punishment necessary, then, to the protection of the individual, or of society?

If there is one who has murder in his heart, to turn him loose upon society would evidently be a dangerous act. But the question occurs—in disposing of the criminal is there no alternative between hanging him and turning him loose? I answer, yes. He may be kept in sure confinement, and then whom will he harm? You perceive, we discard now, and we intend showing in the last discourse why we discard, the idea of taking a life for the life that has been taken, we discard this idea, and confine ourselves now to the naked point of self-protection, considered socially and individually; and we ask—why is not the individual, why is not society, as well protected by the confinement of the murderer in the prison, or penitentiary, as by his execution? You answer—'The dangerous man with his heart of murder, is yet alive.—He may escape from stone walls, and iron locks and bars, and then he is loose again, and society is exposed.' But is there any more danger of the escape of a murderer from prison, than of his escape from conviction after a trial? Is there as much? Do you really believe that there are one tenth, one hundreth, as many criminals who escape from prison, as there are of those who, murderers as they are, escape all punishment? And yet, you have confidence in our ordinary forms of law. Why not have equal confidence in the strength of our prison-fabrics, and in the caution and vigilance of our prison-officers? Again I ask, if you are not as willing to run the risk of the escape of a criminal from prison, as you are of the execution of an innocent man—an event that has happened an hundred times? There is no calculating the weight of argument that lies on the side of imprisonment instead of death, even on this score of occasional imperfections. If a few men should escape, the evils of Capital Punishment far overbalance this evil. I have confidence enough in our present system of prison-discipline, to feel assured that we should be far more secure by committing the murderer to prison, than we are now in running the risk of the issue of trials for crimes, the penalty of which is death.

Again; in considering this matter of public and individual protection, I wish you to consider once more a distinction to which I have more than once alluded—the difference between self-defence and judicial execution.—Society cannot be placed exactly in the position which the individual occupies, who strikes down the midnight assassin with his uplifted knife in his hand. If that individual knew that he could bind the assassin, place him in safe durance, and deliver him up to justice, is there one here who could justify him in taking that assassin's life? There is nothing but the law of self-defence, the emergency of the moment, that will justify him. The blow that fells the assassin a dead man to the ground, must be a blow that comes absolutely between the murderer's knife and his intended victim's heart. No one here will justify the taking of life, in an individual case, upon any other principle. But, I ask, if in the individual it would be reprehensible to take life when other means could save his own, is it not much more reprehensible in society to take life? Is there, can there be the emergency, that exists in the case of the individual driven for his very life's sake to kill? There cannot be. The prisoner is in durance, the safe dungeon lies behind, thousands uphold the law and prevent an escape. And yet, he is led to the gallows on the plea of self-defence! The circumstances are not at all analogous. There is not a man who hears me who would willingly take that murderer's life at the beck of the law. He would shrink from the work in horror. And yet he would take that murderer's blood if he stood over him with a drawn knife. Why not take life in the one case as much as in the other, if both are instances of self-defence? Plainly, both are not instances of self-defence. The one deed is performed from the instinct of self-preservation, the other would be killing in cold blood. It is not the principle of self-defence, then, that executes the criminal by the arm of the law.

But some may say, we would not hang a criminal merely for self-defence, but as an example, a terror that may deter men from the commission of a like crime. To this I reply, that I shall notice this argument at lenght in my next discourse, when I come to speak of the inexpediency of Capital Punishment. I think I can shew that Capital Punishment operates exactly the other way, and instead of deterring, excites and increases.

Again; it may be said, you have acknowledged that Capital Punishment was once necessary, under the Mosaic dispensation—why not now? I answer, that we have progressed from the barbarous state of the primitive Jews—a state of violence and blood-shed.—Murder is not a common thing, comparatively? It is abhorred and shuddered at. We must adapt our laws to circumstances. We act in a time of war very differently from what we do in a time of peace. We are in a state of high civilization, very different from what we should be in a state of blood-thirsty and cruel barbarism.

If Capital Punishment is considered as necessary for defence against the murderer—if self-defence is all the ground upon which we rest it—why not employ it against the lunatic? Is not he dangerous? May not he commit murder? Yet our hearts would revolt at hanging him. We do manage to find security for society without doing so, although he is as dangerous as the murderer, and society requires defence from him as much. So, I say, if we let no revenge come into the account, if we hang the murderer merely for self-defence, we may find for him as well as for the lunatic who is equally dangerous, a place of confinement which shall keep him from his fellows at large, and render society safe from him. He is a moral lunatic. More strictly is he a lunatic, perhaps, than many suppose—more alienated in intellect than the world generally believes. It is not a natural thing, this crime of murder. It is not the result of fair reasoning. It is the effect of the tremendous force of passion, the headlong influence of burning sin. These drive him on to the horrid deed. He is as infatuated as a maniac. He rushes into the very face of doom. Ere he acts, thunder-voices mutter to him, 'Thou shalt not kill;' and when he has acted, the hours of by-gone innocence pass shrouded through his soul, and the pale and bloody ghost points to its gaping wounds and cries,—'Thou hast killed.' And think you that this is all done by a cool, clear-headed reason? By a nice balancing of right and wrong? Think you not that somewhere in that mysterious nature there is some spring of sane and full-developed manhood, that has become broken or checked? At any rate he is a moral lunatic, for whom I ask not inconsiderate mercy, nor impunity; but for whom I claim that as we defend ourselves from the mental lunatic by bolts and bars, so we can be protected by his incarceration as well as by his death.

We do not find, then, that Capital Punishment is required by the individual or by society as a protection. Upon this ground, then, it is unnecessary.

This brings me to the close of the work which I proposed for the present discourse. Neither commanded by God, nor demanded by human welfare, we say that the bloody penalty, the gibbet, the axe, or the rack, are needless and barbarous appendages to our code of Justice. The plea of self-protection is a false one. Not only is it false, it is mischievous. It is terrible in the hands of a people's tyrant, or of a tyrannous people. Self-protection, says the despot, and the heads of the noble, the brave and the good, roll before him in ghastly heaps. Self-protection, says the demagogue, and the guillotine moves its iron jaws, and the streets are red with blood. Self-protection says the injured man, and anticipates the law, becoming for himself Judge and executioner. Self-protection, says the mutineer, dead men tell no tales, and the ocean bubbles red above his comrades. Believe me, this principle of self-protection that relies on blood, is a dangerous, two-edged principle. Self-protection may be secured without blood-shed. We may obey God's law without inflicting Capital Punishment.—There is a higher dictate than that of revenge. There is a nobler end for punishment than the infliction of pain. There is a more binding code than the law of Moses. It is found in the spirit and the precepts of Jesus Christ.

The Trumpet and Magazine.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 18, 1843.

Conference Meetings.

There is nothing which we think betokens more good to our cause at this particular time, than the habit into which the societies in Boston and vicinity are getting, of holding a CONFERENCE MEETING once in each week. Indeed, this has been the practice in the city for a long time. In the First Society, we know it has been done for a long time, and in the Fifth, ever since the meeting house was built. The custom is now extending into the country; and we hope it will continue to extend, until there shall not be a Universalist Society any where, which shall not enjoy its regular weekly conference.

And what shall be done to make these Conference Meetings lively, interesting and profitable? Let it be remembered they are not preaching meetings, but meetings for prayer, exhortation and praise. They are not meetings for the preachers only, but for the lay brethren to cultivate their gifts. This last matter is particularly important. It is absolutely essential to the prosperity of a Conference Meeting, that the lay brethren should employ their powers. We do not mean that they shall strive to make set speeches; but that they shall testify what they have felt or seen, and known. Five words will sometimes do great good. We read of one in the scriptures who went to the Temple, and all he could say was this: 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' If our lay brethren every where will cultivate their gifts in the particulars named, they will reap a great reward in such spiritual enjoyment; they will drink of pleasures that now they know not of; their spiritual prosperity will be great. Let all the laymen think of this. There is no one who has not some talent to do good in this way; and we insist again that a great responsibility is resting upon the laymen; and if our cause does not go forward with accelerated step, it will be more their fault than that of the preachers. Let the former all do their duty, and we shall see such a day as we have never seen before. The glory of Zion will come. Brethren, think of these things.

Another thing somewhat essential to the prosperity of the Conference Meeting is, that the right kind of music be used. It is not so well to use the common hymn books, and psalm tunes which are generally employed in public worship; it needs a music and hymns of a somewhat different character; and it is to supply this want that the Conference Hymns and Tunes have been prepared. Six editions of the first part have been published and sold, and the second part is in process of preparation. A Conference Meeting is different from the usual exercises of public worship and requires different music.

In the third place we desire to recommend, that the services consist of prayer, praise and exhortation. We think it altogether too formal to have a prayer at the beginning and close of the meeting only. Prayers at those points in the services are very proper; but if a brother be moved to pray at any time during the service, it would not be out of place. And we incline to the opinion that kneeling is the proper posture in prayer.—When we speak of exhortation, we mean that application of the principles of the gospel to our hearts and lives; that entreaty to men to forsake the foolish and live, to conform to Christ in their affections and conduct, which cannot fail to do good. There is a wide field here to roam in, and a thousand flowers to be plucked. It is profitable for the brethren to give such facts from their own experience as they think will be useful to others. Aim at doctrine, experience and practice; at doctrine that we may be instructed; at experience that we may be interested; at practice that we may be profited. Dispense with a stiff formality as much as possible at these meetings; and while there is nothing indecorous or improper, let there be nothing cold or lifeless. It is not necessary to sing a hymn after every address. The hymns would be better committed to memory; and if there is like to be a vacuum in the services for a moment, fill it up by singing a verse of some favorite hymn in a tune that every body knows.—Let some brother or sister strike the tune, and all will join in.

As to females speaking, we know that some object to it. But for what reasons? Let us know the reasons. We have never heard females speak in Universalist meetings but a few times; but whenever we have heard them, they have spoken well. Is it wrong? Why may they not participate in the exercises of the sanctuary? We desire their aid in singing; we all know how much they enrich our services in this way; is it any more out of place for them to speak than to sing? We have known ladies to stand up beforeimmense congregations and sing duets and solos, and it was thought nothing wrong. Now we cannot see the propriety of the custom which thinks this all right; and yet thinks it out of place for a woman to start a tune in a conference meeting, or to offer a few words of exhortation. If we are wrong, let us be convinced.

Let us, in closing, exhort all our societies not to neglect the weekly conference meeting.

Shall Satan's kingdom end?

By Satan's kingdom, we mean the kingdom of sin, unbelief and misery.

The apostle says that the kingdom of Christ shall end. 'Then cometh the end, when Christ shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed.' 1 Cor. xv. 24—26. Here we are told that Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to God, but not until everything is put into its proper situation. Before this event, he is to put down all ungodly rule, authority and power; every enemy shall be subdued, even death, which is the last in the train. Then God shall be ALL IN ALL.

Christians know all this. They know that God shall be ALL IN ALL. They know that Christ's kingdom shall end; but they do not believe the devil's will. The devil, as they believe, shall have an endless kingdom. Who gave him this prerogative over the Son of God? Shall Christ's kingdom end and Satan's remain without end? As long as sin and misery reign, Satan will have a kingdom. But will Satan's kingdom never cease? Is it permanent in itself? or will God specially uphold it? But again, where will Satan's kingdom be, when Christ shall have put down all power opposed to his own? all adverse rule and authority? when all enemies are put under his feet and destroyed? If death is the last enemy, and that shall be destroyed, how can Satan's kingdom remain? Consider the following words of that good man, Elhanan Winchester:

'If Christ's kingdom shall end, much more Satan's! If rewards, as such, cease, how much more punishments. If the everlasting kingdom of the saints, which they shall possess forever and ever, shall have an end, or be swallowed up in that kingdom of boundless love, when God shall be all in all, how much more shall sin, pain, sorrow and death cease, and have no more a name in God's creation.'

No place for Repentance.

How often has the passage, Heb. xii. 17 been quoted to prove the doctrine of endless misery—'For he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.' This is spoken of Esau, who, after having been cheated and wronged by his brother Isaac, has been consigned by the partialists to endless torments. We have been told that his day of grace had passed; he could not repent; he could find no place for repentance though he sought it carefully with tears. Universalists have always told their partialist brethren that such was altogether a wrong use of the passage; that the meaning of it is, that Esau could not change his father's mind; the paternal blessing had been given to Jacob, and it could not be altered; that Esau could not find a place for repentance, or a change of mind in his father, though he sought it carefully with tears. The word repentance here refers to the father, Isaac, not to Esau. The 'Puritan,' of last week, acknowledged this view of the subject to be correct. Our partialist brethren are fast growing wiser in regard to those passages which have been used to prove the awful doctrine of endless misery;—but we could not expect the 'Puritan' would get along quite so fast. Who knows that it may not yet become a Universalist paper? See the following:

EXEGETICAL.—Heb. xii. 17, last clause, 'For he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.'

This text is quoted in prayers and exhortations by the laity, and sometimes by clergymen, as if Esau, though a real penitent, could obtain no forgiveness. On this is founded an exhortation to sinners to repent now, and not wait until that day when God will not pardon their sins, however sincere may be their contrition.

I need not prove that this is not its meaning.—All commentators that I have ever consulted, say, Esau could find no place for the repentance of Isaac, his father, though he tried to prevail upon him to change his mind by all the means in his power. If any one wishes for proof that the repentance of Isaac is here spoken of, and not that of Esau, he will find it by an attentive perusal of Gen. xxvii. 34—41. Paul obtained his information respecting this transaction from the narrative in Genesis; nothing is said there about the repentance of Esau. He tried to make his father change his mind, but could not succeed.

Instead therefore of referring to Esau to show that a sinner may neglect religion so long, that God will not pardon his sins though he should repent, the correct use of it is, to show that a sinner cannot prevail upon God to change his purposes, or to alter the terms of salvation. As Esau could not persuade Isaac to confer on him the blessing he had bestowed on Jacob, so the sinner cannot persuade the Almighty to change the plan of salvation for his especial benefit.

Miller Delusion.

Many of the clergy delight to make sectarian capital out of the Miller delusion. They do not believe in the humbug themselves; but they can frighten the weak and credulous with it, and by getting them into a bewildering excitement, they can lead them captive at their will. Too many, too many such instances have there been. But occasionally we find a Partialist clergyman who has too much soul to dabble in those matters.—The names of such ought to be recorded for their honor; and we take pleasure in cutting the following paragraph from the 'Connecticut Universalist.' The Miller mania has prevailed in Middletown. The Rev. Mr. Cook, (Baptist,) has gone into it with much zeal; but the Rev. Mr. Osborn, (Methodist,) boldly bears testimony against it. We copy the subjoined paragraph from the 'Universalist':

'It is worthy of remark, that the Rev. Mr. Osborn, the Methodist minister, has entitled himself to the hearty thanks of all the friends of order and religion in this community by the stand which he has taken in regard to this piece of delusion. Although some of the Miller lectures have, for some reason, been given in his Church, he has given the weight of his influence and arguments against the doctrine. Whether and how far his Methodist brethren will adopt it for the purpose of sharing with Mr. Cook and his church in the fruits which may be gathered from the excitement and 'revivals' which seems to be anticipated from Miller's fire, we shall wait to see.'

Unitarians Dispossessed.

It is well known to the careful observer, that the Unitarians for the last fifty years, both in America and in Europe, have, by great assiduity and patience, been gradually gaining possession of certain funds and trusts, which they have devoted to the upbuilding of Unitarianism. These funds, in almost all cases, were given by persons of a different faith, and who, had Unitarianism been known in their day, would have regarded it as a great heresy. We shall not undertake here to discuss the qdestion, whether it is morally right in any case to take funds appropriated for religious purposes, and apply them to the maintenance of opinions directly opposite to those entertained by the donor. It is certain that the Unitarians have been very industrious and very successful in this kind of business.

But they are being dispossessed. We see by the late English papers, not only that they have been removed from participation in the Lady Hewley's charity, but that the Irish Unitarians are losing the funds on which they have relied. The editor of the Unitarian 'Miscellany,' in the number for the present month, speaks of the subject in the following terms:

The most important event of which we find mention is the decision of the Irish Court of Chancery upon trust-property held by Unitarians. The success which crowned the attempt to deprive the Unitarians of England of funds similarly situated, seems to have encouraged some Trinitarians to prosecute proceedings that should have the same termination in Ireland. They have accomplished their end, and by 'throwing the Unitarians of the South of Ireland entirely upon their own resources, we trust they have, though unintentionally, given them new energy and firmness. The form in which the case was presented for final adjudication is thus stated:

'Case of the General Fund. The arguments in this important case occupied the Court four days last Hilary Term, and related to the administration of £900 a year, being the rents of Rathfarnham estate, left, in the year 1710, by certain Presbyterians in Dublin, for supporting their congregations in Munster, and the education of young men for the ministry. The ministers and elders, to the number of twenty, of the Dublin congregations of Strand Street, Eustace Street, Mary's Abbey, and Usher's Quay, were to be the permanent trustees. These congregations, and the founders of the charity, were Trinitarians, which, with other facts, was proved by the circumstance, that they had expelled Mr. Emlyn, one of the ministers, for entertaining Unitarian opinions, although he never preached them, and had him even tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, on a charge of blasphemy, of which he was found guilty, and punished by two years' imprisonment in Newgate. Long subsequently to these events, Unitarianism began silently to be favored in the congregations of Strand Street and Eustace Street, and in course of time the eleven trustees and their successors representing these congregations in the management of the fund became Unitarian, while the nine trustees representing Mary's Abbey and Usher's Quay continued Trinitarian. This change of doctrine led to grants in favor of Unitarians jointly with Trinitarians, which system has gone on for many years. ['Two thirds of the funds,' it was stated by the Respondents, 'had been given to Trinitarians, and one third to Unitarians.'] The information was filed in 1840, in order to prevent any further grants to Unitarians, as being contrary to the intentions of the founders. The Lord Chancellor, in a most able judgment, last Hilary Term, decided that Unitarians must be excluded from all participation in, or management of, the trust; but he deferred making a formal decree until the decision in Lady Hewley's case (which involved the same principle) was given. The House of Lords having, in August last, dismissed the Unitarian appeal in the Hewley charity, and displaced the trustees, the present case was now moved again for final judgment.'

The Lord Chancellor decided that Unitarians must be excluded from the benefits or management of the property, but that they were not liable to be assessed for the costs of the litigation. His words are as follows in the report of the case before us.

'I shall give them their costs out of the funds; and I shall order all the fifteen trustees to be removed, and new trustees to be appointed, in accordance with the declaration with which I commenced. I shall follow precisely the course as in Lady Hewley's case. I shall declare that Unitarians are not within the scope of the provisions of the deed. I shall follow that literally, and give the trustees the costs.'

The same disposition which we have noticed in the beginning of this article, has been developed in the operations at the Bulfinch Street Church so called. The Unitarians have pro tempore obtained possession of the house of worship built by the Central Universalist Society. We say pro tempore, for we are quite sure that their possession of it cannot be permanent; such iniquitous deeds as they have performed in this case, can never be sanctioned by the blessing of heaven.—They know that the Unitarians did not build that Church; they know it was never intended for a Unitarian Church; they know that they have obtained temporary possession of it by a mean stratagem, dishonest and unchristian; they know there has been a course of tyrannical, wicked miserable acts of misrule on the part of those who now for a short time are in the majority.—And what will be the result? Let the decisions in the Lady Hewley's case answer. Let the late decisions in Ireland answer. We have no doubt, that when the Courts of Massachusetts shall give judgment in the matters now pending before them touching the Bulfinch Street Church, dismay and mortification will seize upon the hearts of the usurpers there. They never will succeed; they never will be blessed. They must give up that Meeting-House; it is not theirs; it was not built for Unitarians; it was built by Universalists, and by them it must be retained.

Another Fatal Case.

We copy from the 'Gospel Banner' the following account of a case of suicide, produced by the doctrine of endless misery, in Madison, Me. It is in the language of the editor of that paper; and the facts were communicated to him by a respectable gentleman in the neighboring town of Anson.

It seems that one Ferrington, a Methodist preacher, and a noted 'revivalist,' got up a protracted meeting in that quiet neighborhood, and succeeded in raising a great excitement. One young man attended, by the name of Chas. Jenkins, son of Mr. Joseph Jenkins, a wealthy and respectable citizen of M. He partook of the excitement, became powerfully wrought upon—so powerfully, that reason was driven from its throne, and in one week, his father found him in the barn intent on suicide! This purpose was prevented at the time; but on the 21st ult., he accomplished his dreadful purpose by hanging himself! He is dead. His age was 22 years—'he possessed a naturally warm and benevolent heart, a lively imagination and a happy disposition. His prospects in the world were flattering, and he bid fair to become an honor to his parents, and a blessing to society. But alas! in an evil hour the destroyer came.'

Br. Joseph B. Jackson, of Racine county, W. T. near Geneva, has recently commenced preaching the doctrine of restitution in that section.—May he prove highly useful in the cause.

Congregations in Boston.

Some writer in the 'Puritan,' that leading partialist journal, has furnished a communication for that paper of the 3d inst., in which he gives the average number in attendance at the Orthodox, Episcopal, Catholic, Unitarian and Universalist congregations. We suppose that some person has been employed for each congregation to attend through the month of January, and by an actual count to find the average number in attendance through that month. The orthodox are at some pains to find out who has the fullest meetings.—The following is the table which appeared in the 'Puritan.'

Thus it will be seen there are 13 Orthodox congregations, 6 Episcopal, 4 Catholic, 17 Unitarian and 5 Universalist congregations in Boston. Universalists should be written down six, but by mean and unjust stratagem, a Unitarian minister has been foisted upon the Central Universalist Society for a season. We have made a cast, and we find that setting aside the Catholic congregations, two of which are enormous, the Universalist congregations are larger on an average than any mentioned in the above table. Thus the Orthodox have 13 congregations, with an aggregate of 6851 hearers, giving 527 persons to each.—The Episcopalians have 6, with an aggregate of 2503, giving 417 to each. The Unitarians have 17, with an aggregate of 6741, giving 396 to each. The Universalists have 5, with an aggregate of 2762, giving 552 to each. As follows:

	No. Cong.	Aggreg.	Averag. Cong.
Orthodox	13	6851	527
Episcopalians	6	2503	417
Unitarians	17	6742	396
Universalists	5	2762	552

It will oe observed, that all the congregations in the city are not put down in the table copied from the 'Puritan.' The Baptists and Methodists do not appear. It is quite certain they would not vary the result. Let it then be observed, that the Universalist congregations are the largest on an average of any Protestant congregations in our city; and that the largest Protestant congregation in Boston, is the Fifth Universalist, in Warren Street, averaging eleven hundred hearers.

We wonder how those sage philosophers will account for these facts who have constantly maintained, that if Universalism should prevail, all religion would run down, that the churches would be deserted and public worship abolished? And what will the world think now of those graceless slanderers, who have asserted that Universalists are a prayerless, irreligious set of men, who have no reverence for God, nor for the ordinances of his house?

They come, they come.

Converts multiply fast. Scarce a day passes that does not bring us tidings of persons brought to the knowledge of the truth in all its fulness. We cut the following from the 'Star and Palladium.' It is addressed to the pastor of the Free Will Baptist Church in Lowell, by one of the members. Universalism continues to prevail.

Lowell, Feb. 3, 1843.

Rev. Mr. Woodman,—Dear Sir:—I address you as pastor of the First Free-Will Baptist Church in Lowell. I have been a member of said Church for nearly two years.

My object in writing is to say, that, after patient thought and study, I have come to the conclusion that God will, in his own time, reconcile all things unto himself through Jesus Christ, and bring all mankind to perfect holiness and happiness. I am, therefore, no longer a member of your Church. I assure you, however, that I entertain for yourself, and the Church over which you are placed, the most kind and Christian feelings; and pray that you may be saved from error, and come to a knowledge of the truth.

Yours, in the love of the Gospel, J. B.

Third Universalist Society in Lowell.

We see by the papers, that a petition is before the Legislature to incorporate the Third Universalist Society in Lowell. This is no ephemeral affair. The land is already purchased, at an expence of about $6000, for their new Meeting-House. It is one of the most conspicuous lots in the city. We believe this Society will pay for its house of worship, if it builds one. There will be no Thurstonism in the matter.

Remember the Widow.

We have been requested to say, that any clergyman who can give a Sabbath's preaching to the Universalist Society at West Haverhill, Mass. will do a great favor to the widow of our late Br. Nichols, of that place, as in such an event, the amount, for the day's services, is paid to her.

Brs. Drew and Grosh.

We copy the following article from the 'Magazine and Advocate' of the 10th inst. It is from the pen of Br. Grosh:

Br. Drew appears to have assumed, of late, the office of Corrector General of all the philosophical and philological errors of our periodicals; and to have engaged with such zeal in weeding out the gardens of his neighbors, that he not only suffers his own to go without weeding, but even pulls up some plants in others' gardens, which his neighbors deem a little better than weeds! He and Br. Cobb came near getting at loggerheads the other day, on this account—and Br. Whittemore complains that he has been misrepresented in the 'Banner'—and one of Br. Drew's correspondents is out on him in the 'Amulet' for misrepresenting him, and refusing to correct it—and we notice in the very paper from which we copy the foregoing, several blunders, some of which we will correct, for fun's sake, in another place.

Br. Grosh in another article, states that he has looked over three and a half columns of Br. Drew's paper, and he alleges that he finds a large number of errors, as to facts, grammar, &c. &c. as well as Irishisms in abundance. Br. Grosh concludes as follows:

There, Br. Drew, we have criticised only three columns and a half of your paper—weeded three and a half beds of your garden—and I am sure you will confess that you never Drew larger, ranker, rarer or droller weeds out of any body's garden you ever generously undertook to weed for them, whether they are willing or not. In view of this sample, would it not be well to attend a little more to your own, and a little less to other folks'—especially as those other folks appear so ungrateful for your kindness? 'I ask only for information!'

Nashua, N. H.

We learn that there is a strong crusade going on at the present time against Universalism in Nashua, N. H. The leaders in this crusade, if we may judge from reports, are outwardly very serious and apparently sanctified, going through the regular forms of religion with much precision; but they are men whose hearts are full of malice towards Universalists, and who have no scruples about a LIE, if they think it will subserve their cause. Why do not the Partialist clergy there try to check these things? Why in the name of all that is good and great, does not Rev. M. H. Smith deliver a sermon against lying?

Paper Mill Village, N. H.

Our correspondent in that place has sent us the following cheering facts in regard to the state of our great and good cause in that place. We are happy to hear of the success of our beloved Br. Randolph.

'Our Society has raised means to support preaching 48 Sabbaths (double the number heretofore had) the current year, and have given Br. Randolph a unanimous invitation to remain with us. Br. Randolph commences his fourth year with our Society on the first of February.—Our meetings have been well attended and our number has been steadily increasing, since the commencement of his labors with us, notwithstanding the vilest opposition. The Lord helping us, our Master's cause will advance in our midst, and the spirit and power of our doctrine will yield their rich increase of holy life. J. M.'

Dedication at Smithville, N. Y.

A new Universalist Meeting-House was dedicated at Smithville, Chenango County, N. Y. on Wednesday, Jan. 25th. We copy the following account of the services and of the house from the 'Magazine and Advocate':

1. Voluntary by the Choir. 2. Reading of Select Scriptures, by Br. A. O. Warren. 3. Hymn. 4. Introductory Prayer, by Br. J. T. Goodrich.—5. Dedicatory Hymn. 6. Sermon by Br. Dolphus Skinner, from Prov. ix. 1, 2. 7. Dedicatory Prayer, by the same. 8. Anthem. 9. Benediction.

In addition to the dedicatory services, those of the Conference were held during the two days. Sermons were preached on Wednesday by Brs. J. T. Goodrich and A. O. Warren, and on Thursday by Brs. D. Skinner and W. M. Delong. Notwithstanding the extreme inclemency of the weather and badness of the travelling, the congregation was large and very respectable. The house, especially on Wednesday, was much crowded, and a commendable zeal manifested by our brethren and friends in this place and the surrounding neighborhoods. The house is built of wood, 36 by 46 feet, with a vestibule and orchestra or small gallery in front, surmounted by a modest and well proportioned steeple, the whole finished in a plain but very neat and good style, and painted throughout.

Hasty admissions to the Church.

Our brethren of the partialist faith are in the habit of making very hasty admissions to their churches. We published, a few weeks ago, an account of a notorious scoundrel who was admitted into the Baptist Church in this city, under the charge of that very shrewd and honest pastor, Rev. Mr. Hague. The truth is, that certain sects are so exceedingly anxious to fill up their churches, that they are not very careful as to whom they take. Would it not be well for them to look more at the quality and less at the quantity of their converts. We have just been looking over the 'Christian Herald,' published at Exeter, N. H. and find that one of the partialist churches in that place has been admitting vagabonds and villains. We give the account in their own language.

Look out for a Swindler.—A villain by the name of Oliver D. Richardsen visited this town a few months ago, and by his pretended piety, was baptized and added to the Christian Church in this place. He was a journeyman boot maker, and worked a few weeks with Calvin G. Prescot, then commenced his villany on certain stores in this place, by getting goods under false pretences, and by his fair speeches deceived many out of various sums. Among the sufferers by him is myself, whom he succeeded in swindling out of more than $20. Since penning the above, I understand said Richardson has been in the State Prison, and the public will do well to be on their guard. R. E. CUTLER.

Exeter, Jan. 30, 1843.

Said Richardson is a tall stout man, about 35 years old, with his name marked on his left arm—and is supposed to be somewhere in the State of Maine. Editors of papers will confer a favor on the public by publishing this notice, as no doubt he will attempt his tricks in other places.

We the subscribers are witnesses to the above, and to the deceptions practiced by Richardson in this place.

Miller Tabernacle.

The Grand Jury of Suffolk has presented the Miller Tabernacle in this city, as dangerous to the lives of the citizens. We have no faith that the end of the world will come in April; but we are not sure the end of the congregation will not come, which shall attempt to meet in that house.

Capital Punishment.

Great excitement in Boston—discussions—uncivilized nations ahead of the people of Massachusetts—parliament of the Windward Islands, capital punishment abolished there, &c. &c.

There never has been a time, we think, when the subject of capital punishment was so much thought of in Massachusetts, especially in Boston, as it is at the present time. Petitions are coming in to the Legislature from different parts of the Commonwealth for its abolition. Discussions have been held in the State House, and in some of the churches of the city, during several evenings, which large numbers of the members of the Legislature have attended. We are happy to witness this movement—it betokens much good.

We present below an account of a debate on the subject of capital punishment, in a parliament of the Windward Islands, among the converted heathen. It is very interesting. We hope the Legislators of Massachusetts will read it, and not only be moved by the arguments of semi-savages, but see an example worthy of imitation in their meekness, forbearness and kind and noble bearing. Savages though they are, they suffer not in comparison with the Congress of our own nation; may our Congress falls far below them in dignity. Read, understand, and be profited.

To show the spirit and candor, as well as good sense with which the discussions were conducted, we shall furnish a sketch of some of the principal speeches delivered on the first and second day, in reference to death or banishment for murder.

On the question being proposed, Hitoti, the principal chief of Papeete stood up, and, bowing to the president and the persons around him, said: 'None doubt this is a good law,'—the proposed punishment was exile for life to a desolate island,—'but a thought has been growing in my heart for several days, and when you have heard my little speech you will understand what it is. The laws of England, from which country we have received so much good of every kind—must not they be good? And do not the laws of England punish murderers by death? Now, my thought is, that as England does so, it would be well for us to do so. That is my thought.'

Perfect silence followed;—and it may be observed here that, during the whole eight days' meetings of this Parliament, in no instance were two speakers on their legs at the same time; there was not an angry word uttered by one against another; nor did any assume the possession of more knowledge than the rest. In fact, none controverted the opinion of a preceding speaker, or even remarked upon it, without some respectful commendations of what appeared praiseworthy in it, while, for reasons which he modestly but manfully assigned, he deemed another sentiment better.

After looking round to see whether any body were already up before him, Utami, the principal chief of Buanaauia, rose, and thus addressed the president: 'The chief of Papeete has said well, that we have received a great many good things from the kind christian people of England. Indeed, what have we not received from Beretane? Did they not send us (area) the gospel? But does not Hitoti's speech go too far? If we take the laws of England for our guide, then must we not punish with death those who break into a house?—those who write a wrong name?—those who steal a sheep? And will any man in Tahiti say that death should grow for these? No, no; this goes too far; so I think we should stop. The law, as it is written, I think is good; perhaps I am wrong; but that is my thought.'

After a moment or two of stillness, Upuparu, a noble, intelligent, and stately chief stood forth. It was a pleasure to look upon his animated countenance and frank demeanor, without the smallest affectation either of superiority or condescension. He paid several graceful compliments to the former speakers while, according to his thought, in some things each was right, and each was wrong. 'My brother, Hitoti, who proposed that we should punish murder with death, because England does so, was wrong, as has been shown by Utami.—For they are not the laws of England which are to guide us, though they are good;—the Bible is our perfect guide. Now, Mitti Trutu (the missionary Crook) was preaching to us on (naming the day) from the scripture, 'He that sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed;' and he told us that this was the reason of the law of England. My thought, therefore, is not with Utami, but with Hitoti (though not because the law of England, but because the Bible, orders it) that we ought to punish with death every one found guilty of murder.'

There was a lively exchange of looks all thro' the assembly, as if each had been deeply struck with the sentiments of the speaker, especially when he placed the ground of the punishment of death, not upon English precedent, but scripture authority. Another chief followed, and 'rising, seemed a pillar of state,' one whose aspect, and presence, and costume of dress (richly native) made the spectators forget even him who had just sat down. His name was Tati; and on him all eyes were immediately and intensely fixed, while, with not less simplicity and deference to others than those who had preceded him, he spoke thus: 'Perhaps some of you may be surprised that I, who am the chief here, and next to the royal family, should have held my peace so long. I wished to hear what my brethren would say, that I might gather what thoughts had grown in their breasts on this great question. I am glad that I waited, because some thoughts are now growing in my own breast which I did not bring with me. The chiefs, who have spoken before me, have spoken well. But is not the speech of Upuparu like that of his brother, Hitoti—in this way? If we cannot follow the laws of England, in all things, as Hitoti's thoughts would perhaps lead us, because they go too far,—must we not stop short of Upuparu, because his thought goes too far likewise? The Bible, he says, is our perfect guide. It is. But what does that scripture mean, 'He that sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.' Does not this go so far that we cannot follow it to the end, any more than we can follow the laws of England all the way? I am Tati; I am a judge; a man is convicted before me; he has shed blood; I order him to be put to death; I shed his blood; then who shall shed mine? Here, because I cannot go so far, I must stop. This cannot be the meaning of those words. But, perhaps, since many of the laws of the Old Testament were thrown down by the Lord Jesus Christ, and only some kept standing upright,—perhaps, I say, this is one of those which were thrown down. However, as I am ignorant, some one else will show me, that, in the New Testament, our Saviour, or his apostles have said the same thing concerning him that sheddeth man's blood as is said in the Old Testament. Show me this in the New Testament, and then it must be our guide.'

Much cordial approbation was evident at the conclusion of Tati's speech, and its evangelical appeal seemed to remove some difficulty and doubt respecting the true scriptural authority applicable to the case.

Next rose Pati, a chief and a judge of Eimeo, formerly a high-priest of Oro, and the first who, at the hazard of his life, had abjured idolatry.—'My breast,' he exclaimed, 'is full of thought, and surprise, and delight. When I look round at this fure hure ra (house of God) in which we are assembled, and consider who we are that take sweet counsel together here, it is to me all mea huru e (a thing of amazement), and mea faaoaoa te aau (a thing that makes glad my heart). Tati has settled the question; for is it not the gospel that is our guide?—and who can find directions for putting to death? I know many passages which forbid, but I know not one which commands, to kill. But then another thought is growing in my breast, and, if you will hearken to my little speech, you shall know what it is.—Laws, to punish those that commit crime, are good for us. But tell me, why do christians punish? Is it because we are angry, and have pleasure in causing pain? Is it because we love revenge, as we did when we were heathens? None of these: Christians do not love revenge; Christians must not be angry; they cannot have pleasure in causing pain. Christians do not, therefore, punish for these. Is it not that, by the suffering which is inflicted, we may prevent the criminal from repeating his crime, and frighten others from doing as he has done to deserve the like? Well, then, does not every body know that it would be a greater punishment to be banished forever from Tahiti, to a desolate island, than just, in a moment, to be put to death? And could the banished man commit murder again there?—And would not others be more frightened by such a sentence than by one to take away his life?—So my thought is that Tati is right, and the law had best remain as it has been written.'

One of the taati rii, or little men, a commoner, or representative of a district, now presented himself, and was listened to with as much attention as had been given to the lordly personages who preceded him. He said, 'As no one else stands up, I will make a little speech, because several pleasant thoughts have been growing in my breast, and I wish you to hear them. Perhaps every thing good and necessary has been said already by the chiefs; yet, as we are not met to adopt this law or that law, because one great man or another recommends it, but as we, the taata rii, just the same as the chiefs, are to throw all our thoughts together, that out of the whole heap the meeting may make those to stand upright which are best, whencesoever they come—this is my thought. All that Pati said was good; but he did not mention that one reason for punishing (as a missionary said, when he was reading the law to us, in private) is, to make the offender good again if possible. Now, if we kill a murderer, how can we make him better? But if he be sent to a desolate island, where he is all solitary, and compelled to think for himself, it may please God to make the bad things in his heart to die, and good things to grow there. But, if we kill him, where will his soul go?'

Others spoke to the same purport, and, in the result, it was unanimously determined that banishment, not death, should be inflicted on murderers. It followed, of course, that the extreme exercise of magisterial power, to take away life, was excluded from every other case.

Spurious Revivals condemned by a Methodist.

We find an important article in the 'Star in the West,' of the 4th inst. in regard to the subject of partialist revivals. It is too valuable to be passed over by us without notice. Rev. Saml. Drew was an eminent Methodist preacher in England. He wrote on the subject of 'revivals of religion.' The extract will show that some Methodists, who have been reckoned among the best and most intelligent, do not approve of the human artifices at times wickedly ascribed to the influence of the spirit of God. The extract is taken from the life of Drew.

'If the phrase 'revival of religion, be taken in its proper sense, as denoting the extension and increase of vital godliness, I should be no christian were I to view it with indifference or aversion.—If you couple it with noise and excited feeling, (and without these many would think the term inapplicable,) I pause before I either approve or condemn. In point of reason, speculation, propriety and decorum, my voice is decidedly against the manner, and if I thought it was the effect of human artifice, I would condemn it altogether.

I fear, however, there is an artifice with some preachers and people to light up this contagious fire. I have been behind the curtain, and have seen a little of it; and I am filled with disgust in proportion to the discovery. If the work be of God, he does not want the tricks I have witnessed. The question of permanency, too, presents itself. Are the present effects beneficial? Do these new converts stand? The history of past year teaches us that their apostacy has been nearly as extensive and sudden as their reformation. The benefit in such cases is lost, while the disgust excited in the minds of the sober persons still remains. In many instances, I conceive, these things have created and confirmed prejudices which an age will hardly wipe away. With my present views, and with all I ever had, I cannot join in these reveries without being an arrant hypocrite.'—Life of Drew, pp. 333, 354.

So much for the testimony of an eminent Methodist divine. He honestly expressed his opinions.

We find also in the same paper the following testimony from Rev. Mr. Goodsell, of Troy, N.Y. (believed to be a Methodist preacher) in relation to the reported conversions at a certain time at a revival in that city.

'By turning to the Minutes of 1832, it will be found that a much greater number was reported then in our city, than has been at any time since. The truth is, in that number was reported about 300 probationers, gathered at a revival under the labors of Rev. John N. Maffit. However disagreeable this fact may be, but few of these probationers comparatively ever became members of the Church, and now even but few of those who did are to be found.'

Spiritual Prosperity.

If Universalists would grow in grace, as fast as they are increasing in numbers, it would be a happy event. We believe they are doing much in the way of spiritual improvement, but we wish them to do more. Let every one seek to put on the whole armor of God. Let us seek first for the kingdom of God, and then we shall be sure of every other blessing. Conference Meetings are doing much to bring our denomination into a happy state—a state of devotion, zeal and love.

SEAR'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, for February has appeared. This is a valuable magazine. It is not filled with trash, but substantial matter. It is somewhat in its character like the celebrated Penny Magazine; and yet it is not unsuitable for a higher order of minds than the latter work was designed for. Saxton, Peirce & Co. 133 1-2 Washington St. are the publishers.—We heartily wish the work success.

ROSINA MEADOWS, THE VILLAGE MAID: OR Temptations Unveiled. By William B. English. This is a fiction of stirring incidents, the main object of which is to impress on unsuspecting females the dangers they encounter in entering a city life. It is dedicated to Mrs. L. H. Sigourney. It makes us weep for human nature. For sale by C. H. Brainard, No. 9 Court St. and at Redding & Co. No. 8 State St.

General Intelligence.

The cause of Peace is a great and good cause. Christians are required to labor for 'those things that make for peace.' In obedience to that command, and also agreeably to the request of the Secretary of the American Peace Society, we publish the following:

Peace Meeting in the Capitol.

On Wednesday evening, Feb. 8th, the American Peace Society held, in the Hall of the Representatives, a public meeting for the discussion of subjects relative to the cause of Peace. In the absence of the President, ROBERT RANTOUL, Esq. of Beverly, was called to the Chair, and the following resolutions, prepared by a Committee of Arrangements, were presented by G. C. Beckwith.

1. Resolved, That war, as a method for the settlement of National difficulties, is an unchristian and inefficient system, and ought to be discontinued by all civilized communities.

2. Resolved, That preparations for war, so far from checking this evil, occasion far more wars than they prevent, and are the chief means of continuing the custom.

3. Resolved, That the recent adjustment of our difficulties with England, which had baffled the efforts of more than half a century, evinces a most auspicious change in public opinion, and illustrates the possibility of settling all National disputes by better means than the sword.

4. Resolved, That the general peace of Christendom for nearly thirty years, longer than had been known before since the commencement of the Christian era, is owing mainly to the efforts and influences which together constitute the cause of Peace; and such success from the small amount of means hitherto used, calls for devout gratitude to the God of peace, and strongly encourages a large increase of exertions in behalf of this great philanthropic enterprise.

5. Resolved, That peace, as a pioneer or auxiliary to all efforts for the good of mankind, deserves the support especially of those who are embarked in other enterprises of benevolence and reform.

6. Resolved, That, since the cause of universal and permanent peace will require concert among nations, we hail with satisfaction and hope the proposal for a General Conference on the subject in London next June.

7. Resolved, That, relying for ultimate success mainly on the education of the young in the pacific principles of the gospel, we believe it the duty of all preachers, of all parents, and of teachers in all our seminaries of learning, to combine their efforts in training up such a generation of peace-makers as would spontaneously keep the peace of the world.

Mr. Beckwith, as the Society's Secretary made a few explanatory statements, and was followed in pertinent, spirited and eloquent addresses by Dr. W. Channing, Rufus P. Stebbins, Frederick W. Holland, Charles Spear, and E. S. Gannett. Persons of different views were invited to speak; and fresh interest was given to the meeting by a discussion springing from some forcible remarks of Mr. Adams, of Marblehead, replied to by Messrs. Stebbins, Gannett and Blanchard, but the lateness of the hour would not permit a long continuance of the debate. The resolves were passed and the meeting dissolved at half past 10 o'clock.

Mementoes of Washington and Franklin.

IN CONGRESS—FEB. 7.

Mr. Summers of Virginia, rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise for the purpose of discharging an office not connected with the ordinary business of a legislative assembly. Yet, in asking permission to interupt, for a moment the regular order of parliamentary proceedings, I cannot doubt that the proposition which I have to submit will prove as gratifying as it may be unusual.

Mr. Samuel T. Washington, a citizen of Kanawha county, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and one of my constituents, has honored me with the commision of presenting, in his name and on his behalf, to the Congress of the United States, and through that body to the people of the United States, two most interesting and valuable relics connected with the past history of our country, and with men whose achievements, both in the field and in the Cabinet, best illustrate and adorn our annals.

One is the sword worn by George Washington, first as a Colonel in the Colonial service of Virginia, in Forbe's campaign against the French and Indians, and afterwards during the whole period of the war of Independence as Commander-in-Chief of the American army.

It is a plain cutlass or hanger, with a green hilt and silver guard. On the upper ward of the scabbard is engraven 'J. Bailey Fish Kill.' It is accompanied by a buckskin belt, which is secured by a silver buckle and clasp, whereon are engraven the letters 'G. W.' and the figures '1757.' These are all of the plainest workmanship, but substantial, and in keeping with the man and with the times to which they belonged.

The history of this sword is perfectly authentic and leaves no shadow of doubt as to its identity. The last will and testament of General Washington, bearing date on the 9th day of February, 1799, contains, among a great variety of bequests the following clause:

'To each of my nephews, William Augustine Washington, George Lewis, George Steptoe Washington, Bushrod Washington, and Samuel Washington, I give one of the swords or cutlaxes of which I may die possessed: and they are to choose in the order they are named. These swords are accompanied by an injunction not to unsheath them for the purpose of shedding blood except it be for self defence, or in defence of their country and its rights; and, in the latter case, to keep them unsheathed, and prefer falling with them in their hands to the relinquishment thereof.'

In the distribution of the swords hereby devised among the five nephews therein enumerated, the one now presented fell to the share of Samuel Washington, the devisee last named in the clause of the will which I have just read.

This gentleman, who died a few years since in the county of Kanawha, and who was the father of Samuel T. Washington, the donor, I knew well. I have often seen this sword in his possession, and received from himself the following account of the manner in which it became his property in the division made among the devisees:

He said that he knew it to have been the sidearm of General Washington during the Revolutionary war; not that used on occasions of parade and review, but the constant service sword of the great chief; that he had himself seen General Washington wear this identical sword, he presumed, for the last time, when, in 1794, he reviewed the Virginia and Maryland forces, then concentrated at Cumberland under command of General Lee, and destined to co-operate with the Pennsylvania and New Jersey troops, then assembled at Bedford, in suppressing what has been called the 'Whiskey Insurrection.'

General Washington was then President of the United States, and as such was Commander-in-Chief of the army. It is known that it was his intention to lead the army in person upon that occasion had he found it necessary, and he went to Bedford and Cumberland prepared for that event. The condition of things did not require it, and he returned to his civil duties at Philadelphia.

Mr. Samuel Washington held the commission of a captain at that time himself and served in that campaign, many of the incidents of which he has related to me.

He was anxious to obtain this particular sword and preferred it to all the others, among which was the ornamented and costly present from the great Frederick.

At the time of the division among the nephews without intimating what his preference was, he jocosely remarked 'that inasmuch as he was the only one of them who had participated in miltary service, they ought to permit him to take choice.' This suggestion was met in the same spirit in which it was made, and the selection being awarded him, he chose this, the plainest, and, intrinsically, the least valuable of any, simply because it was the 'Battle Sword.'

I am also in possession of the most satisfactory evidence, furnished by Col. Geo. Washington, of Georgetown, the nearest male relative now living of General Washington, as to the identity of this sword. His information as to its history, was derived from his father, William Augustine Washington, the devisee first named in the clause of the will which I have read, from his uncle, the late Judge Bushrod Washington, of the Supreme Court; and Major Lawrence Lewis, the acting executor of General Washington's will; all of whom concurred in the statement that the true service sword was that selected by Capt. Samuel Washington.

It remained in this gentleman's possession until his death, esteemed by him as the most precious memento of his illustrious kinsman. It then became the property of his son, who animated by that patriotism which so characterized the 'Father of his country,' has consented that such a relic ought not to be appropriated by an individual citizen, and has instructed me, his representative, to offer it to the nation, to be preserved in its public depositories as the common property of all, since its office has been to secure the common liberty of all.

He has, in like manner, requested me to present this Cane to the Congress of the United States, deeming it not unworthy the public acceptance.

This was once the property of the philosopher and patriot Benjamin Franklin.

By a codicil to his last will and Testament, we find it thus disposed of:

'My fine crab-tree walking stick, with a gold head, curiously wrought in the form of the cap of Liberty, I give to my friend, and the friend of mankind, Gen. Washington. If it were a sceptre he has merited it and would become it.'

Gen. Washington in his will, devises this cane as follows:

'Item. To my brother, Charles Washington, I give and bequeath the gold headed cane left me by Dr. Franklin in his will.'

Captain Samuel Washington was the only son of Charles Washington, the devise from whom he derived, by inheritance, this interesting memorial; and having transmitted it to his son, Samuel T. Washington, the latter thus seeks to bestow it worthily, by associating it with the battle-sword in a gift to his countrymen.

I cordially concur with Mr. Washington in the opinion that they each merit public preservation; and I obey with pleasure, his wishes in here presenting them, in his name to the nation.

Let the sword of the Hero and the staff of the Philosopher go together. Let them have place among the proudest trophies and most honored memorials of our national achievements.

Upon that staff once leaned the sage, of whom it has been said, 'He snatched the lightning from heaven and the sceptre from tyrants.'

A mighty arm once wielded this sword in a righteous cause, even unto the dismemberment of Empire. In the hand of Washington this was 'the sword of the Lord, and of Gideon.'

It was never drawn except in the defence of public liberty; it was never sheathed until a glorious and triumphant success returned it to the scabbard, without a stain of cruelty or dishonor upon its blade; it was never surrendered except to that country which bestowed it.

[At the conclusion of this address the galleries which were crowded, sent forth emphatic manifestations of approbation.]

Mr. John Quincy Adams then rose and addressed the House as follows:

In presenting this resolution to the House, it may perhaps be expected that I should accompany it with some suitable remarks; and, yet, sir, I never rose to address this House under a deeper conviction of the want of words to express the emotions that I feel. It is precisely because occasions like this are adapted to produce universal sympathy, that little can be said by any one, but what, in the language of the heart, in tones not loud but deep, every one present has silently said to himself. My respected friend from Virginia, by whom this offering of patriotic sentiment has been presented to the representative assembly of the nation, has, it seems to me, already said all that can be said suitable to this occasion. In parting from him, as after a few short days, we must all do, it will, on my part, be sorrowing that in all probability I shall see his face no more. But his words of this day are planted in my memory, and will there remain till the last pulsation of my heart.

The sword of WASHINGTON! The staff of FRANKLIN! Oh, sir, what associations are linked in adamant with those names! Washington, the warrior of human freedom—Washington, whose sword, as my friend has said, was never drawn but in the cause of his country, and never sheathed when wielded in his country's cause!—Franklin, the philosopher of the thunderbolt, the printing-press and the ploughshare! What names are these in the scanty catalogue of benefactors of human kind! Washington and Franklin! What other two men, whose lives belong to the eighteenth century of Christendom, have left a deeper impression of themselves upon the age in which they lived, and upon all after time! Washington, the warrior and the legislator! In War, contending by the waget of battle for the independence of his country, and for the freedom of the human race; ever manifesting amidst its horrors, by precept and example, his reverence for the laws of Peace, and for the tenderest sympathies of humanity: in Peace, soothing the ferocious spirit of discord, among his own countrymen, into harmony and union, and giving to that very sword now presented to his country a charm more potent than that attributed in ancient times to the lyre of Orpheus. Franklin the mechanic of his own fortune, teaching, in early youth, under the shackles of indigence, the way to wealth, and in the shade of obscurity, the path to greatness; in the maturity of manhood, disarming the thunder of its terrors, the lightning of its fatal blast, and wrestling from the tyrant's hand the still more afflictive sceptre of opression: while descending into the vale of years, traversing the Atlantic Ocean, braving in the dead of winter the battle and the breeze, bearing in his hand the charter of Independence, which he had contributed to form, and tendering, from the self created nation to the highest monarchs of Europe, the olive-branch of peace, the mercurial wand of commerce, and the amulet of protection and safety to the man of peace on the pathless ocean, from the inexorable cruelty and merciless rapacity of war. And finally, in the last stage of life, with fourscore winters on his head, under the torture of an incurable disease, returning to his native land, closing his days as the chief magistrate of his adopted Commonwealth, after contributing by his counsels, under the Presidency of Washington, and recording his name, under the sanction of devout prayer invoked by him to God, to that constitution under the authority of which we are here assembled, as the Representatives of the North American People, to receive in their name and for them, these venerable relics of the wise, the valiant, and the good founders of our great confederated Republic—these sacred symbols of our golden age.

May they be deposited among the archives of our Government! and may every American who shall hereafter behold them ejaculate a mingled offering of praise to that Supreme Ruler of the Universe by whose tender mercies our union has hitherto been preserved through all the vicissitudes and revolutions of this turbulent world, and of prayer for the continuance of the blessings, by the dispensation of his Providence, to our beloved country from age to age, till time shall be no more!

[The same tokens of approbation which had greeted the address of Mr. Summers were exhibited at the close of Mr. Adams's remarks.]

Mr. Adams concluded by offering the following resolution which was adopted unanimously:

'Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of this Congress be presented to Samuel T. Washington, of Kanawha county Virginia, for the present of the sword used by his illustrious relative, George Washington, in the military career of his early youth in the seven years' war and throughout the war of the National Independence, and of the staff bequeathed by the patriot, statesman and sage, Benjamin Franklin, to the same leader of the armies of Freedom in the Revolutionary war, Geo. Washington. That these precious relics are hereby accepted in the name of the Nation; that they be deposited for safe keeping in the Department of State of the United States, and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the said Samuel T. Washington.'

On motion of Mr. Taliaferro, the addresses of Mr. Summers and Mr. Adams were ordered to be entered on the Journal, and copies of both transmitted to Mr. Samuel T. Washington.

Mr. McKennan said that after the deep feeling which had been elicited by the exciting scene just witnessed, it seemed to him that the House was not prepared to enter again on the ordinary business of the session. He moved, therefore, that the House adjourn.

No voice dissenting, the House adjourned.

A letter received in this city, dated Port au Prince, 14th ult, states that in the fire on the 9th 500 houses were destroyed, and property to the amount of $8,000,000. The calamity had put a stop to all business.

J. N. E. Mann, of Dedham, has been appointed Sheriff for Norfolk county, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Baker, the late incumbent.

It is said that the Millerites of Philadelphia intend purchasing the vacant lot on which the late Abolition Hall stood, in Sixth, near Race street, and build upon it a temple similar to the one in progress of construction in Boston.

We learn from the Mercantile, that the society of Swedenborgians, in Boston, purpose erecting a new Church for public worship. The estimated cost is $35,000, twenty-five thousand of which has been already subscribed. The site contemplated is at the foot of Somerset Court, on the hill north of Bowdoin street.

Fire. The dweling house owned and occupied by Mr. John Blittin of Durham Me., was destroyed on Sunday morning last. The fire originated in a defect in the oven, and had made such progress when discovered that it was impossible to arrest the progress of the flames. Mr. B. lost, besides his house, a part of his furniture and all his stock of provisions, among which was 80 bushels of wheat. His loss is estimated from 1200 to 1500 dollars. $700 was insured on his house.

An Outrage. A man has been arrested at New Orleans for robbing the grave of a rich widow, who was buried ten years ago, with much valuable jewelry. He had taken one pair of diamond earrings, several rings of diamonds, one gold necklace, several buckles, and seven large diamonds not mounted.

Frightful occurrence. A little boy in Warren county, Miss., was killed on the 14th ult., in the following shocking manner:—A keg of powder had been left open in the house, and, during a temporary absence of the mother, the child communicated fire to the keg, and blew up the house.

Escape from Prison. On Wednesday afternoon a man named John McCready who was in prison charged with a burglary, effected his escape from the City Prison, N. York, by walking out of the door in open day light. The fellow displayed such cool effrontery in making his way out, that the deputy keepers of the prison mistook him for one of the visiters who had gone into the prison a few minutes before. He has not been found.—Portland Argus.

A female was taken out of the Harlem Railroad cars, on Saturday, in such a state of raving madness that it required four persons to hold her. Her insanity was occasioned by the influence of the doctrines of Millerism.

Fatal Accident. A little girl passing along Coates street, near Fifth, New York, on Monday fell upon the pavement from the slippery state of the side walks, and dislocated her neck. She died almost immediately.

Epidemic in Vermont. We learn from the Montpelier Vt. Watchman that a very dangerous Epidemic is prevailing in the northern part of that town, in Charlestown, Newark, Burke, and various other sections of the State. In some districts it is said that the number of those that are well, is scarcely sufficient to take care of the sick and bury the dead. The same disease prevailed to a dreadful extent last season at Burlington and in its vicinity, where many of the most valuable citizens fell victims to its violence. It is a disease until recently unknown in that section of country, and is thought to be a species of erysipelas.

Post Office Decision. The Second Assistant Post Master General has decided 'that the making of lines round an advertisement, or paragraph in a newspaper, with ink or pencil, unaccompanied by any writing upon the same, is not considered to be 'memorandum,' within the meaning of the 13th and 30th section of 1825.' A person, then, may mark an advertisement in a newspapsr and send it through the mail, without incurring a fine for violation of Post Office laws.

A Touching Story. The Salem Register records the following extraordinary circumstance connected with a case of insanity:

It seems there has been in the Ipswich Alms House, or House of Correction, for about twenty years, an Insane man who was sent there from Salem, and who has always gone by the name of 'Captain.' Of his real name and residence nothing was ever known by the authorities, nor has any thing been discovered until within a few months. The man is perfectly harmless, his malady tending rather to idiocy, and he has long been allowed to go about freely, sometimes wandering into the neighboring towns, but always returning in safety. A few months ago, the keeper presented a card to him, and said, 'Captain, will you give me your address?' The Captain very readily took the card, and writing upon it, in an elegant hand, a gentleman's name, with the name of a town in the State of New York, returned it. As it was some what uncertain if this was really his name, a few days afterwards another card was handed to him with the request that he would give his father's address. He immediately wrote the same surname and town, with another christian name. It was then supposed that he might have given his real address, and, to ascertain the fact, a letter was accordingly forwarded to the place mentioned, directed to the person whose name was given as the father, with a request to the postmaster, if such a person had ever resided there and had removed, to forward the letter to the present place of residence of the gentleman or his family, if it could be ascertained.

Nothing further was heard until a few weeks ago, when a letter was received from New York, on the subject. The letter was shown to the 'Captain,' and as soon as his eyes fell upon the superscription, his countenance changed, his eyes were suffused with tears of joy, and he cried out in the most touching tone, 'My mother! My mother!' It was in fact a letter from his mother—the father having been dead a number of years. She wrote that nothing had been heard of this son for twenty-two or twenty-three years and he was supposed to be long since deceased. The 'Captain' was extremely affected on perusing the letter. The mother is at present residing with another son in the city of New York. A further correspondence has taken place between the parties, and some of the relatives are expected to come on shortly and take the lost, restored home. With what fervor can this mother exclaim, when she greets the wanderer, 'For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost and is found.

Worcester Conference.

The Worcester County Conference will hold its next quarterly meeting at Barre, on Wednesday next, Feb. 22d. There will be services on the Tuesday evening previous. Visiting friends are requested to call on Br. Jason Haskins and Creighton Ruggles for directions to places of entertainment. ☞The ministers belonging to this Conference are particularly requested to attend. S. P. LANDERS, Clerk.

Union Conference Meeting.

A Conference Meeting of the Universalists of Boston and vicinity, will be held in Charlestown, at the Universalist Church, next TUESDAY, commencing at half past 10 o'clock, A. M, continuing through the afternoon and evening. Ministering and lay brethren are affectionately invited to attend. It is expected that this Conference will be the first of a series, and it is earnestly hoped that there will be a full attendance, and a profitable meeting.

Strafford Quarterly Conference.

The next session of this body will be holden on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (1st and 2d) of March, at the new Meeting-House on LEE PARADE, N. H.

At the request of the brethren, there will be religious services at the above place, the evening previous, (Tuesday,) at 6 o'clock.

Friends from abroad will call on Br. Nicholas D. Meserve, on Lee Parade,—Josiah Bartlett, Esq., at the Hook,—or, Gardner Towle, Esq., Wadley's Falls, for directions.

A general invitation is extended to all of like precious faith, and others, to come up and sit with us 'in heavenly places.' To the ministering brethren, a particular request is made.

The friends in Lee are very desirous of greeting a large number of the good and true. What say! shall we have a real gospel season of refreshing! Come one—come ALL who can. E. FRANCIS, Clerk.

MARRIED:

In this city, by Rev. S. Streeter, Mr. Lemuel P. Eaton to Miss Mary A. Stinson. Mr. Michael Schwartz to Miss Jane M. Crooker, of Medford.

In Cambridgeport, by Rev. L. Willis, Mr. Oscar Stratton to Miss Mary Jane, eldest daughter of Walter R. Mason, Esq.

In Lynn, by the same, Mr. Edward Bassett, of Chelsea, to Miss Clara Jane Morgan.

Also, at the same time and place, by Rev. Parsons Cooke, Mr. Nathaniel P. Martin, of Holliston, to Miss Mary Ann Morgan.

In Stafford, Ct. by Rev. W. Lyon, Mr. Rufus A. Fish, of Worcester, to Miss Mary H. Green.

DIED:

In this city, Mr. Ezra P. Hall, 18. Mr. Benja. C. W. Davenport, 20. Mr. Leonard Young, 23. Mr. John Nelson, 70. Mr. Nathaniel Frickett, 27.

In Easton, Mr. Joshua Williams, aged 26.

In this city, Mr. HOSEA MARBLE, in the 44th year of his age. He was an industrious mechanic, a peaceable and virtuous citizen, a faithful and kind husband, and a provident guardian. He has left a widow to mourn, who for a number of years has been deprived of sight. To her, this bereavement is peculiarly afflictive. Mr. M. died of consumption. During his sickness I frequently visited him, and always found him calm, resigned and happy. He desired me to make it publicly known, after he was gone, that the faith of the gospel of God's universal and impartial grace, gave him that consolation and confidence which a dying man so much needs. The reason he assigned why he would have such notice made public, was that people of a different faith frequently had reported that Universalists renounced their belief on a bed of death. I promised to comply with the request of the dying man, though it gives pain when I realize the fact, that it is necessary in order to guard against false reports of professed christians. H. BALLOU.

In Charlestown, Dec. 31, Mrs. LOUISA SWEETSER, aged 37. Mrs. S. was afflicted by that long and wasting disease, consumption. The writer of this visited her frequently during her latter days, and is happy to believe that she was sustained and comforted by the religion of Jesus Christ. At times, her mind had been shaken by doubts and fears, but at the last, she put her trust in the goodness of her heavenly Father, and had faith in Him and in Christ. It was not to be expected that she could at all times feel calm, and in an equal frame of mind, for she was often disturbed by physical pain, and prostrated by bodily weakness. But her frequent answer was, that she felt at peace in her mind. So, gradually, she passed away, the frail body yielding to the hand of disease, but the immortal soul triumphing in that which alone can shed light upon the darkness of the grave, and give strength to the departing spirit, the religion of Jesus. May that religion be the consolation and the guide of her husband, relatives and friends. It was but a little while before her death, that Mrs. S. joined herself to the Universalist Church, and partook of the Communion, with a number of her christian friends, in the sick chamber. May we meet in a communion beyond the skies, where we shall not be surrounded with the tokens of decay, and the shadows of death, but where all will be immortal, blessed, and full of light. E. H. C.

In Provincetown, Feb. 3d, Mr. NATHANIEL S. PARKER, aged 27, son of Mr. Samuel Parker. He died of consumption, and has been gradually failing for more than two years, and during the whole of this protracted and wasting disease, he exercised great patience and resignation to Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. He trusted in God as the Saviour of all men, and though he could not fully comprehend the beneficial results of his chastening rod of affliction that was laid so heavily upon him, nevertheless, he believed that he did not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men; but would have compassion according to the multitude of his tender mercies, which endure forever. He had long meditated upon the subject of death, and at length it seemed to lose its sting, and he looked forward by the eye of faith to the world of immortality and blessedness, and even wished for the time to come for to be delivered from this body of sin and death. May the aged parents be supported and comforted under this affliction, by the sweet tidings of the gospel of peace. H. P. S.

SACRED CONCERT.

THE SINGING CHOIR attached to Rev. E. H. CHAPIN'S Society in Charlestown, would respectfully give notice that they will give a CONCERT OF SACRED MUSIC, on SUNDAY evening next, Feb. 19th, (postponed from the 5th on account of the storm,) for the benefit of their Leader, Mr. JOHN BARTLETT. They are happy to inform the public that they will be assisted by the following distinguished Vocalists, who have kindly volunteered their services:—Mrs. Phipps, Mrs. Raymond, Miss Wetherbee, Mr. Marshall, Mr. Oliver, Mr. Lathrop, and Mr. W. White. Mr. FERGUS will preside at the Organ.

☞Between the first and second parts, the Rev. E. H. CHAPIN will deliver an Address on Music.

☞Concert to commence at half past 6 o'clock.

☞Tickets 25 cents each, to be had of E. Crafts, jr. Main-street, and at the door.

GATES' ACADEMY, Marlboro', Mass. The next Term of this Institution will commence on Tuesday, February 28th.

Tuition in English, $4,00
in the Languages, 4,50 per term.

Students can be accommodated in the family of the Preceptor for $27 per term. This charge includes board, tuition, washing, &c.

It is the endeavor of the Instructor to teach THINGS and not WORDS merely. For the better accomplishment of this object a very good apparatus has been procured, and a Geological and Mineralogical Cabinet, &c. are at the service of the Students. We deem it sufficient recommendation of the present Principal, Mr. O. W. ALBEE, to state that he has been employed 10 years by the same Board of Trustees, and each year with increasing patronage.

S. F. BUCKLIN, B. W. HILDRETH, S. R. PHELPS, } Committee of the Trustees.

PAIGE'S QUESTIONS, FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'QUESTIONS ON SELECT PORTIONS OF THE GOSPELS; designed for the use of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. By LUCIUS R. PAIGE, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Cambridge.' Price 25 cents single; $2,50 per dozen.

DAVIS' IMPROVED OXYGENATED SOAP. The Oxygenated Soap, as a Cosmetic and for Shaving, stands unrivalled. It is a composition in which pure Caustic Alkali is exhibited in its mildest form, united with a large portion of oxygen—a substance so well known to be essential to life, that it has obtained, in its gaseous forms, the name of Vital Air.

In external applications, especially when aided by the cleansing virtues of soap, it has a beneficial effect. It renders the skin soft and pliable, and preserves it in a healthy state; it gives it the bloom and purity of youth, and by its invigorating and strengthening qualities, enables the skin to perform its functions, known to be so necessary in the economy of nature for the preservation of beauty and the enjoyment of health. It removes all cutaneous eruptions, and is recommended as the best remedy for roughness of hands, Freckles, &c. that has ever been offered to the public.

This celebrated article is for sale in any quantity, on reasonable terms, at Messrs. THOMAS WHITTEMORE, 37 Cornhill; W. C. Stimson & Co's. south side Faneuil Hall; J. P. Hall Union street; Brewster, Stephens & Cushing, Washington st; A. G. Peck & Co, cor. of Killby and Water st; Lowe & Read, Merchants-Row; J. Kidder, Court st; Lewis & Co Trott & Bigelow, State street. Also, retailed by Druggists generally in this city and throughout the United States.

BELLS, CLOCKS, ORGANS. GEORGE H. HOLBROOK, East Medway, Mass. manufactures CHURCH BELLS, CHURCH CLOCKS and CHURCH ORGANS.

Holbrook's BELLS are well known. It is the general testimony of those who are judges, and who have had opportunities of forming an opinion, that his Bells are the best which are manufactured in the United States, both for strength and brilliancy of tone. The best Bells in Boston, New York, and other great cities, are from Holbrook's Foundry.

Mr. Holbrook's CLOCKS are well known. There are probably a greater number of tower Clocks in Massachusetts manufactured by him, than any other man. He has facilities for manufacture, which enable him not only to make good Clocks, but to undersell all other manufacturers. These are the causes of the great number he has sold.

His ORGANS may be judged of by the Organ at the Marlboro' Chapel, which is from his manufacture.

The public are assured that it will be for their interest to call, if they wish to purchase either Bells, Clocks or Organs.

FOURTH EDITION OF CONFERENCE HYMNS. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'

Price $1,25 per dozen—12 1-2 cents single.

Poetry.

Capital Punishment.

Is not that a beautiful sentiment of John G. Whittier? We copy from a poem published in the Democratic Review, in October last. The first eight lines are surpassingly clear and gospel-like.—Editor Trumpet.

Thank God! that I have lived to see the time
When the great truth begins at last to find
An utterance from the deep heart of mankind,
Earnest and clear, that ALL REVENGE IS CRIME!
That man is holier than a creed—that all
Restraint upon him must consult his good,
Hope's sunshine linger on his prison wall,
And love look in upon his solitude.
The beautiful lesson which our Saviour taught
Through long, dark centuries, its way hath wrought
Into the common mind, the popular thought;
And words, to which by Galilee's shore
The humble fishers listened with hushed oar,
Hath found an echo in the general heart,
And of the public faith become a living part.

Who shall arrest this tendency? Bring back
The cells of Venice and the bigot's rack?
Harden the softening human heart again,
To cold indifference to a brother's pain?
Ye most unhappy men!—who, turn'd away
From the mild sunshine of the gospel day,
Grope in the shadows of Man's twilight time,
What mean ye, that with ghowl-like zest ye brood
O'er these foul altars streaming with warm blood,
Permitted in another age and clime?
Why cite that law with which the bigot Jew
Rebuked the Pagan's mercy, when he knew
No evil in the Just One?—Wherefore turn
To the dark cruel past?—Can ye not learn
From the pure Teacher's life, how mildly free
Is the great gospel of Humanity?
The Flamen's knife is bloodless, and no more
Mexitli's altars soak with human gore.
No more the ghastly sacrifices smoke
Through the green arches of the Druid's oak;
And ye of milder faith, with your high claim
Of prophet-utterance of the Holiest name,
Will ye become the Druids of our time?
Set up your scaffold altars in our land,
And, consecrators of Law's darkest crime,
Urge to its loathsome work the Hangman's hand?
Beware—lest human nature, roused at last,
From its peeled shoulder your incumbrance cast,
And, sick to loathing of your cry for blood,
Rank ye with those who led their victims round
The Celt's red altar and the Indian's mound,
Abhorr'd of Earth and Heaven—a pagan brotherhood!

A chapter from my Experience.

BY REV. C. F. LEFEVRE.

It would be impossible for me fully to describe the sensations which I experienced when first the truth burst upon my mind, that 'all flesh shall see the salvation of God.'—While there was a vastness in the thought too big for utterance, there was at the same time a glory in it too bright for concealment. I had been patiently laboring to obtain a correct understanding of those passages of Scripture which seemed to block up my pathway, and prevent me from arriving at the object of my search. My experience resembled that of a traveller in the wilderness, seeking for a river which he feels fully assured lies beyond the wilds that he is traversing. All his observations tend to confirm him in this belief, and if at any time his heart faints or his faith fails him, it is not from any doubt with respect to the existence of the water in question, but of his arriving at it from the difficulties that lie in his pathway. He has dry, desolate, scorching sands to pass over; steep and rugged mountains to ascend, deep and tangled forests to penetrate. Patiently, perseveringly, but painfully, one by one, he overcomes these obstacles, and at last the desired object of all his toil bursts upon his view. How beautiful! how glorious does that stream appear to him! how sweet, how cooling, how refreshing its waters! Never will he forget the rapture of that moment; never will another drink of water seem so delightful as his first taste of that pure river.

My joy in discovering the great salvation is but feebly imaged forth in the above comparison. I had been seeking that place,

'Where living waters sweetly pass,
And full salvation flows.'

Every discovery I had made, every one which I was daily making, all convinced me that 'there was a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God.' I had meditated on the divine goodness as displayed in the works of creation and providence around me; I had watched all the workings within me; I had carefully examined all those broad and plain declarations of Holy Writ which pointed to this blessed and glorious consummation, and I felt assured that 'it must be so.' But then again, like the traveller to whom I have alluded in illustrating this experience, there were formidable difficulties to surmount.—Fear would have persuaded me that inquiry was dangerous; humility whispered in my ear that the indulgence of such a hope was presumption; education defied me to renounce the doctrines which I had been taught from my infancy; self-interest threatened me with poverty; friendship with desertion; the religious world with contempt. These were mighty and fearful odds to contend with, and all that I had to bring against them was an ill-defined but complete conviction that the doctrine I was seeking for, was the truth of God. It was an army arrayed against a single man. Faithfully, perseveringly, quietly, one by one, did I meet and overcome these difficulties; and when the last obstruction was removed, that great river of the water of life which I had so earnestly, so diligently, so devotedly sought, burst on my enraptured vision. It is a time to be remembered. There was in it a transport, an ecstacy, a bliss which is beautifully described in Scripture as imparting to the soul, 'a joy unspeakable and full of glory.' From that hour a shadow of doubt has never clouded my mind on this subject. I have since read much in opposition to my faith; I have also heard much in public and private controversy, but I have never met with objections furnished either by reason or Scripture, greater than those which myown mind supplied, before I came into a belief of the doctrine.

But I must again return to the time when the happy discovery was revealed to my longing sight. How light my heart felt! how joyful my spirit! how warm my devotion!—how fervent my gratitude! If it did not impart to me another sense, it quickened and enlivened those which I already possessed.—I thought that the sun looked brighter; the music of the birds sounded more melodious; the fruits of the earth tasted sweeter; the flowers smelt more fragrant; and the very air of heaven felt more balmy. There might be some slight touches of enthusiasm in all this; perhaps there were; but the pleasure imparted was not the less real. I have since conversed with others whose impressions corresponded with my own; and I do not see that there is any thing unreasonable in believing, that the liberation of the spirit should give an additional zest to every enjoyment.

I had often read, often conversed, and for many years preached about a great, a perfect, a full, an everlasting, a common salvation;—but till the truth burst upon my mind, I had never felt the meaning of the words I had uttered. I had desired the eternal welfare of all my fellow creatures in that happy and peaceful world which lies beyond the dark stream of Jordan; I had fervently prayed for such an event, and I had used the little talents which had been given me, to help, as I thought, in advancing it. But when I came to compare these wishes, these prayers and these labors with my faith, I found them sadly deficient. What could all this effect in a work of such vast magnitude? If God did not himself perform the work, what could man effect? A nest of ants that should attempt to remove the earth presented a case less hopeless than salvation to be wrought by mortal arm. These reflections would often distress me, and when 'the salvation of the world' was the theme of meditation or discourse, I felt how much there was wanting to accomplish that object. But when I came into the knowledge of the truth, my faith removed the mountain and planted it in the depths of the sea. I saw another will engaged than mine, another's pleasure to be performed, and another arm at work, and I knew that He who purposed was both able and willing to accomplish his design. It was when I thus trusted I found rest; it was then that 'peace flowed as a river and righteousness as the waves of the sea.'

'Have I not remembered thee in my bed, and thought upon thee when I was waking?' was the language of the Psalmist. It was mine also. Dear and precious to me were those secluded and silent hours, when I meditated on the divine love. How full of meaning were the expressions—'Our Father who art in heaven'—'the Father of the spirits of all flesh.' I had never before comprehended the force of these terms, for I had believed that millions would at last find God any thing but a Father; but now all such fears were laid aside and I dwelt upon the word 'Father' with all that fondness which the little child manifests, when he first finds that he has power to speak the dear parental name. I have enjoyed many happy seasons of communion since that period; I hope still to enjoy many more; I look to this faith to sustain me in my passage down the dark valley which lies between this world of light and shadows, and that world of supernal splendor 'where the sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give her light unto thee, but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory.' But however blest I may be with the divine favor, I never expect on earth to feel such ecstatic joy as when I first emerged from the darkness of unbelief into the marvellous light of the gospel; or to use the illustration which I have already introduced, when I first quenched my thirst from the streams of the waters of life.

Call to the Christian Warfare.

Sung in a favorite tune—to be published in the second part of the Conference Hymns and Tunes.

'Take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness; and your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God.'—Eph. vi. 13-17.

Our Leader calls to duty;
We heed the well-known, cheering word;
We'll wear, in all its beauty,
The 'armor of our God.'
Pray on, shout on,
Ye soldiers of the great I AM;
Pray on, shout on,
Ye follow'rs of the Lamb.

Prepare ye for the contest,
And go in might and glory forth;
The vict'ry shall be won best
By those 'begirt with truth.'
Pray on, shout on, &c.

No danger shall affright us,—
The 'breastplate' shall protect the heart,—
And righteousness delight us,
And perfect peace impart.
Pray on, shout on, &c.

'Shod with the preparation'
Of truth, and victory and love,
We'll spread the great salvation,
The blessing from above.
Pray on, shout on, &c.

No danger can alarm us,
A sure defence the Christian hath,—
No 'fiery darts' can harm us,
We bear 'the shield of faith.'
Pray on, shout on, &c.

'The helmet of salvation,'
Doth glitter on the Christian's brow,
And men of ev'ry nation,
His noble daring know.
Pray on, shout on, &c.

Prepare ye for the contest,
Unsheath the spirit's mighty sword,
It hath the vict'ry won best,
It is 'the word of God.'
Pray on, shout on, &c.

The prize is now before us;
Dismay and treason stand afar;
The good with prayer assure us,
It is a holy war.
Pray on, shout on, &c.

Lord, make us faithful ever,
Whate'er we do, where'er we roam,—
And death shall fright us never,
'To die is to go home.'*
Pray on, shout on, &c.

*The words of the dying Hanscom.

True Christianity.

We take pleasure in relating an anecdote which tends to show, that in these 'degenerate times' there yet exists a spirit in the heart of some persons to follow out that precept of the Bible which renders every one good for evil.

A Clergyman of this city, who has recently left the country for his health, and who is well known for his benevolent disposition, was a short time since much interested for the welfare of a mechanic, and had frequently during these 'hard times,' given small sums of money to the man. On one occasion, he loaned this man thirty dollars, and for which he was to receive an equal amount of work; but before the work was commenced, the man took the benefit of the Bankrupt Law, and on his books had made it appear that the minister was owing him the thirty dollars, instead of being a creditor! Consequently, the assignee called on the Reverend gentleman and told him there was a demand against him for the amount due the mechanic. The minister told him he was mistaken, and then stated the fact of the case, but as the officer could do nothing of himself, he referred to the mechanic, who had the audacity to swear that his book account was correct, and that the minister really owed him the money. On the strength of this, a warrant was issued to attach the minister's horse, which was done, and the horse, valued at two hundred dollars, was sold at auction for about half this sum; after the thirty dollars and the expenses were deducted, the balance was offered to the minister, who indignantly refused it, and requested the assignee to present it to the mechanic, for, said he, the man is poor and needs it.

On the following Sunday he preached from these words:—'If any man sue thee at the law and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.' After a most eloquent discourse, in which he stated, that there were certain cases which the law could not reach to do justice to, for a Judge and Jury might be convinced that a cause was just, and yet, from the want of proper evidence, they would be obliged to render a verdict contrary to their inclinations; he then briefly related the circumstance of his being so basely cheated of his money, and concluded in these words: 'Should I ever return to this country I will repay that man, and in a manner to make him feel sensible of his injustice; for should I ever again see him in want, I would assist him.'—From the well known character of the Clergyman referred to, we have no doubt, that should he again see that mechanic in a destitute situation, he would cheerfully assist him, making himself a living witness of the truth of the cause in which he labors, and not only carrying out the principle laid down in his text, but fulfiling that command which says, 'If any man smite thee on the one cheek turn to him the other also.'—Bulletin.

Convent Discipline.

We lately published an extract from Madame Calderon's interesting work on Mexico, descriptive of the ceremony of taking the veil. Our readers will not wonder that the scene excited commiseration, when they read the following account of the interior discipline of another Convent which Madame C. visited. As we have before mentioned, the position of Mad. Calderon afforded her very favorable opportunities of witnessing scenes and customs which are never exposed to the eye of ordinary travellers, or even residents of Mexico. This position—arising from the official character of her distinguished husband—was to her a perfect 'Open sesame!' in every quarter. She had permision from the Archbishop to visit the Convent of Santa Teresa, accompanied by one young married lady, who had a sister there. The Archbishop desired that the visit should be kept a secret, but she says it somehow oozed out, and exposed her to a veto on future applications. The Santa Teresa has twenty one nuns. Mad. C. was also accompanied by a bishop, a young man, splendidly dressed. His robes were of a purple satin, covered with fine point lace, with a large cross of diamonds and amethyst. He also wore a cloak of very fine purple cloth, lined with crimson velvet—crimson stockings and an immense amethyst ring. When the bishop came in, Madame C. says:—

'We found that the nuns had permission to put up their veils, rarely allowed in this order in the presence of strangers. They have a small garden and fountain, plenty of flowers, and some fruit; but all is on a smaller scale, and sadder, than in the Convent of the Incarnation. The refrectory is in a large room with a long narrow table running all around it; a plain deal table with wooden benches; before the place of each nun, an earthen bowl, an earthen cup with an apple in it, a wooden plate and a wooden spoon;—at the top of the table a grinning skull, to remind them that even these indulgences they shall not long enjoy.

'In one corner of the room is a reading desk, a sort of elevated pulpit, where one reads aloud from some holy book, whilst the others discuss their simple fare. They showed us a crown of thorns which, on certain days is worn by one of their number, by way of penmance. It is made of iron, so that the nails entering inwards, run into the head and make it bleed. While she wears this on her head a sort of wooden bit is put into her mouth, and she lies prostrate on her face till dinner is ended; and while in this condition her food is given her, of which she eats as much as she can, which probably is none.

'We visited the different cells, and were horror-struck at the self inflicted tortures.—Each bed consists of a wooden plank raised in the middle, and on days of penitence, crossed by wooden bars. The pillow is wooden, with a cross lying on it, which they hold in their hands when they lie down. The nun lies on the penitential couch, embracing the cross, and her feet hanging out; as the bed is made too short for her upon principle. Round her waist she occasionally wears a band with iron points turning inwards; on her breast a cross with nails, of which the points enter the flesh, of the truth of which I had melancholy ocular demonstration. Then after having scourged herself with a whip covered with iron nails, she lies down for a few hours, on the wooden bars, and rises at 4 o'clock. All these instruments of discipline which each nun keeps in a little box beside her bed, look as if their fitting place would be in the dungeons of the Inquisition. They made me try their bed and board, which I told them would give me a very decided taste for early rising.

'Yet they all seem as cheerful as possible, though it must be confessed, that many of them look pale and unhealthy. It is said, that, when they are strong enough to stand this mode of life, they live very long; but it frequently happens that girls who come into this convent, are obliged to leave it from sickness, long before the expiration of their noviciate.

'They had taken the trouble to prepare an elegant supper for us. The Bishop took his place in an antique velvet chair, the Senora —— and I were placed on each side of him. The room was very well lighted, and there was a great profusion of custards, jellies and ices, as if we had been supping at the most profane cafe. The nuns did not sit down, but walked about, pressing us to eat, the Bishop now and then giving them cakes, with permission to eat them, which they received laughing. They have the most humble and caressing manners, and really appear to be the most excellent women in the world.—They seem to make no ostentation of virtue, but to be seriously impresed with the conviction that they have chosen the true road to salvation; nor are there in them any visible symtoms of that spiritual pride from which few devotees are exempt.

'After supper a small harp was brought in, which had been sent for by the Bishop's permission. It was terribly out of tune, with half the strings broke; but we were determined to grudge no trouble in putting it in order, and giving these poor recluses what they considered so great a gratification. We got it into some sort of condition at last, and when they heard it played, they were vehement in their expressions of delight. The Senora —— who has a charming voice, afterwards sang to them, the Bishop being very indulgent, and permitting us to select whatever songs we chose, so that when rather a profane canticle 'The Virgin of the Pillar,' (La Virgin del Pillar,) was sung, he very kindly turned a deaf ear to it, and seemed busily engaged in conversation with an old Madre, till it was over.

'We were really sorry to leave them; particularly as it is next to impossible that we shall ever see them again; and it seemed as if in a few hours a friendship had been formed between us and these recluses, whose sensations are so few, they must be the more lasting. The thoughts of these poor women cost me a sad and sleepless night. They wear the coarsest and hardest stuff next their skin, in itself a perpetual penance. In these robes they are burried; and one would think that if any human being can ever leave this world without a feeling of regret, it must be a nun of the Santa Teresa.'

Ambition.

Napoleon's ambition reached a point unprecedented in the annals of national history. It cost France the lives of 2,500,000 of her countrymen, besides tens of thousands of Germans, Swiss, Poles, Italians and Neapolitans, in all about 500,000; thus perished 3,000,000 of his own followers. About as many fell on the side of his adversaries, making in the aggregate the awful number of 6,000,000 of human beings immolated upon the altar of one man's ambition.

The errand of mercy; or, the drunkard reclaimed. A story of fact.

I had frequently noticed a broken-hearted lad pass by my office with an oil-can in his hand, that might hold perhaps a gallon. His tattered garments and melancholy face were such as to attract both observation and pity. It was but too evident that the vessel he carried had been diverted from its appropriate end, and that it was now used, not for oil, but as a whiskey jug. Having seen him pass twice in one day, with his burden, I had the curiosity to accost him, and did so by inquiring his residence.

'I live,' said he, 'in reply to my inquiry, 'five miles from the city, on the ——road.'

'You have been to the city once before, to-day, have you not?'

'Yes, sir, I came down in the morning; but I could not get what I was sent for, and had to come again.'

'What was you sent for, my lad? It must be something very important to make it necessary for you to walk twenty miles in a storm like this.'

'Why, sir, it was whiskey I was sent for. Father had no money, and so he sent me to Mr.——'s, to get trusted. But he would not trust any more, and so I had to go home without it; but father sent me back again.'

'How do you expect to get it now, when you could not this morning?'

'Why, sir, I have brought a pair of shoes that sister sent mother. Mr.—— will give whiskey for them. He has got two or three pair of mother's shoes now.'

'Do you like to carry whiskey home, my boy?'

'O, no sir, for it makes us all so unhappy; but I can't help it.'

Advising the boy not to fulfil his errand, I went home with him. The family I found consisted ot a husband, wife, and four children, the oldest (the boy) not being more than ten years of age, while the youngest was an infant of a few months. The day was keenly cold and blustering; the north wind blew harshly, and came rough and unbidden through the numberless crevices of the poor man's hovel. A few embers were in the fire-place, around which were huddled the thin and half-naked children, and the wo-stricken mother and wife. Her face was haggard, her eyes sunken, her hair dishevelled, and her clothing tattered and unclean. She was seated on an old broken chair, and was mechanically swinging to and fro, as if endeavoring to quiet the infant which mourned pitifully in her arms. It had been sick from its birth, and was now seemingly struggling to free itself from the harsh world into which it had but a few months before been ushered. There was no tear in the eye of the mother as she gazed upon the expiring babe. The fountain of tears had long been dried up by the inward fires that alcohol had kindled and fed. She was the picture of despair. And I could not but fancy, as she sat thus, that her thoughts were wandering back to the happy past, to the days of her infancy and childhood, or to her early and happy home. Poor sufferer!—She had given her deep affections, with her hand, to a man who had taken the first steps in intemperance. She had left her father's house full of joyous and buoyant hopes—hopes, alas, never to be realized, to spend a life of misery with a sot. Broken-hearted, cast out from the society of former friends, frowned upon by the 'good society' humane, spoken of as the miserable wife of a miserable drunkard, with no hand to help, and no heart to pity, she very soon became a tippler and a drunkard herself.

By the side of this wo-smitten mother kneeled a little girl of five or six years of age, down whose sallow cheeks tears were coursing, and who ever and anon exclaimed, 'Poor little Willie, must you die?' 'O, mother, must Willie die?' And then kissing the cold, clammy sweat from little 'Willie's' brow, she covered her face with her tattered apron and wept.

By the opposite corner of the chimney, and among the ashes that covered the hearth, sat a boy of about seven years, dragging from the half-dead embers a potato, which he broke open with the remark, 'Mother, give this to little Willie. May be he is hungry. I'm hungry, too, and so is sister; but Willie is sick; give him this, mother, do.'

'No, poor boy,' said the mother, 'Willie will never be hungry again. He will soon be dead!' This remark at once drew all the children around the mother and the dying child. The father was sitting on what was intended for a bedstead, having on neither shoes nor coat, and apparently indifferent to all that was passing around him. His head was resting on his breast, and his blurred and blood-shot eyes were fastened on the floor, as if he were afraid to look up at the sad and sorrowing group who were watching the countenance of the dying infant.

There was a moment of deep silence.—Not a sound was heard. Even the sobs of the little girl had ceased. Death was there. The very breathings of the household seemed suspended, when a slight shivering of the limbs of the infant, and a shriek from the half-conscious mother, told that the vital spark had fled.

And now, for the first time, the father moved. Slowly advancing to where his wife was seated, with quivering lips, he whispered, 'Is Willie dead?'

'Yes, James, the poor babe is dead!' was the choking reply of the mother, who still sat gazing, as at first, on the face of the little one.

Without uttering another word, the long brutalized, but now melted father, left the house, uttering, as he left, 'My God, how long!'

At this moment, a kind-hearted lady came in who had heard, but a few moments before, of the dangerous illness of the child. She had brought with her some medicine, but her angel visit was too late. The gentle spirit of the babe had fled, and it only remained for her to comfort the living. As she was doing this, I followed the father, related to him the circumstances that had led me to his house, and briefly spoke of the misery which inevitably follows in the wake of intemperance.

'I know it, sir,' said he. 'I have long, long known it. I have not always been what now you see me. Alcohol, and my unrestrained appetite, have brought me to this depth of degradation.'

'Why not, then, master that appetite? You have the power. Thousands have proved it.'

'Sir, I believe it. I have seen others, as far gone as myself, restored and made happy; but you are the first who has ever spoken to me on the subject, and I had too strong a passion for drinking, ever to think of reforming myself.'

'Well, will you not now make the effort?'

'I will. It has occupied my thoughts during the whole morning. And now in the presence of Almighty God, I swear never again to touch the accursed thing which has ruined me and made my family beggars.'

Rejoiced, to my inmost soul, to hear this manly resolution, I returned with him to the house, and, in due time made the fact known to his wife, and producing a copy of the pledge, the whole family signed it upon the table which held the body of their dead child, while all were affected to tears.

* * * * * * * *

Two years had passed away, and the incident was almost forgotten, when it was recalled to my mind by a warm greeting and shake of the hand, from a gentleman who was returning westward with a stock of dry goods which he had just purchased in New York.

IT WAS THE MAN WHO SIGNED THE TEMPERANCE PLEDGE BY THE BODY OF HIS DEAD CHILD.—N. Y. Evangelist.

Marriage.

One of the most remarkable features of this extraordinary institution is the successive changes it undergoes in the course of its history. When the young husband and wife first enter on their new relation, how little do they foresee of what is before them. As they take possesion for the first time of their new house, and enjoy its cheering aspect, its regularity and quiet, and its expression of domestic peace and joy, how little do they anticipate the trials and vicissitudes, the deep and yet unseen fountains of joy and sorrow which are in their future way! In a few years how changed! One after another has been added in various ways to the company which began only with two, until at length they find themselves presiding over children; relatives and domestics; the parents both involved in responsibilities from which they would have altogether shrunk, had they anticipated them at the begining. In a few years the happy circle must be broken in upon and scattered.—Death comes in and makes them one after another his prey; others may gradually arrive at maturity and leave their father's roof to seek other homes, and to return no more to the ark which sheltered them first, and at last the father and mother are left alone to spend their declining years at their solitary fireside, to look back upon scenes of captivity, trial and enjoyment which can never return. Such is the outline of the history of thousands of families.

Some After-Scenes of Battle.

On the field of Borodino.—Fifty days after the battle of Borodino, no less than 20,000 of the slain were found lying where they had fallen; and the whole plain was strewed with half buried carcases of men and horses intermingled with garments dyed in blood, and gnawed by dogs and vultures. 'As we were marching over the scene of the battle,' says Labaume, 'we heard a piteous sound at a distance; and, on reaching the spot, we found a French soldier stretched on the ground, with both his legs broken. 'I was wounded,' said he, 'on the day of the great battle; and, finding myself in a lonely place where I could gain no assistance, I dragged myself with my hands to the brink of a rivulet, and have lived nearly two months on grass and roots, and a few pieces of bread which I found among the dead bodies. At night I have lain in the carcases of dead horses, and with the flesh of these animals I have dressed my wounds.'

Hospital Scenes.—An eminent surgeon, present in the hospitals after the battle of Waterloo, says, 'The wounded French continued to be brought in for several successive days—and the British soldiers, who had in the morning been moved by the piteous cries of those they carried, I saw in the evening so hardened by the repetition of the scene and by fatigue as to become indifferent to the sufferings they occasioned?'

'It was now the thirteenth day after the battle. It is impossible to conceive the sufferings of men rudely carried at such a period of their wounds. When I first entered the hospital, these Frenchmen had been roused and excited in an extraordinary degree; and in the glance of their eyes there was a character of fierceness which I never expected to witness in the human countenance. On the second day, the temporary excitement had subsided; and, turn which way I would, I encountered every form of entreaty from those whose condition left no need of words to stir compassion: Surgeon Major, Oh! how I suffer! Dress my wounds! Doctor, I commend myself to you. Cut off my leg. Oh! I suffer too much! And when these entreaties were unavailing, you might hear in a weak, inward tone of despair, I shall die! I am a dead man!'

In the hospitals of Wilna there were left more than seventeen thousand dead and dying, frozen and freezing. The bodies of the former were taken up to stop the cavities in the windows, floors, and walls; and in the corridor of the Great Convent about fifteen hundred were pilled up transversely, like pigs of lead or iron!

GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM. FIFTH EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No 37 Cornhill, 'THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM—designed to lead inquirers to the belief of that doctrine, and believers to the practice of it.' By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. This work consists of 408 pages, handsomely bound; and will be sold at the low price of ONE DOLLAR a copy.

I. It gives a brief history of the doctrine from the earliest ages, and notices of its most eminent defenders.

II. It clearly and particularly sets forth the sentiments of Universalists.

III. It gives the evidences of Universalism as contained in the sacred Scriptures, by which it is infallibly proved that said doctrine is the doctrine of the Bible.

IV & V. It explains all the principal passages, both in the Old and New Testaments, which have been used to disprove Universalism, amounting to upwards of ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY, in which all the different subjects are discussed, whereon light is so much needed,—such as the words rendered 'hell,' the 'lake of fire,' the 'furnace of fire,' 'unquenchable fire,' 'everlasting fire,' 'everlasting destruction,' 'eternal judgment,' 'coming forth from the graves to condemnation,' the 'sin against the Holy Ghost,' 'day of judgment,' 'destruction of the soul,' 'kingdom of heaven,' &c. &c.

VI. It answers the common objections to Universalism.

VII. It points out the moral tendency of Universalism, and the duties of those who believe in that benign and heart-cheering sentiment.

VIII. It furnishes a Constitution for Universalist Societies, and advice in regard to the formation and management of the same; showing the only way in which they can enjoy prosperity. It also gives all the laws of the Commonwealth in regard to religious Societies.

IX. It gives directions in regard to the formation of Churches,—presents a plan of Church Government,—gives scriptural views of the Lord's Supper,—and a form of the administration of that service, for the benefit of young clergymen.

X. This chapter is on the evidences of revealed religion; and presents entire that masterly work, which never has been answered, and never can be refuted, Leslie's 'Short Method with the Deists.' Never but one Infidel attempted to answer it, and he gave up the task in despair.

This work is bound firm and strong, because we wish Universalists to lend it freely among their opponents.

MILLER'S THEORY REFUTED. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY. THIRD EDITION. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by THOMAS WHITTEMORE, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of SHORT ANTHEMS, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Lang, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the LESSONS or RUDIMENTS, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

DEAR SIR,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

JOTHAM S. FRENCH.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

''GOSPEL HARMONIST.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

ILLUSTRATION OF THE PARABLES. TENTH EDITION. For sale at this Office, the work entitled 'NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PARABLES OF THE NEW-TESTAMENT, arranged according to the time in which they were spoken. By THOMAS WHITTEMORE.' 352 pages large 12mo at the low price of 75 cents per copy. Twenty per cent discount by the dozen. All the parables of the New Testament are explained at length in this work, and illustrated by appeals to the sacred Scriptures. Particular attention has been paid to those parables which have been used to prove the doctrine of future endless misery; and extracts are given from Orthodox Commentators, of great respectability, to show that they have explained them as Universalists now od

BOOK OF PROMISES. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. BULFINCH EMMONS. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

Price of the work 25 cents. 125 pages.

PRACTICAL AND EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the following new and excellent work—'Practical and Experimental Religion; or the Teachings and Tendencies of Universalism. Designed as a Companion to the 'Christian Comforter.' By HENRY BACON.' Read this book and learn the moral power of Universalism. 'It is good to live by, and it is good to die by.' Price 50 cents.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

SERMON II.

BY REV. EDWIN H. CHAPIN, OF CHARLESTOWN.

Capital Punishment Inexpedient.

'Overcome evil with good.'—Rom. xii. 21.

The advocate of Capital Punishment will say, that if not necessary as an act of absolute self-protection, this penalty is one of urgent expediency as preventing crime. That it not only removes the dangerous murderer from society, but it restrains him who has murder in his heart, from committing the overt act. Thus it is not only an executioner, but a guardian—an unsheathed sword placed before the awful sanctity of human life, whose edge not only falls upon the transgressor, but that frightens him who approaches for crime, by its dazzling and terrible keenness. So Capital Punishment is expedient—which is but another term here for necessary, since it is absolutely essential to the security of life. For, if you break down this barrier, you give looser reins to crime, and the licentious thirst for blood has not the awful severity of death to check it

It is this argument, the argument from expediency, in favor of Capital Punishment, that I propose to notice in this discourse. I have no doubt that it weighs heavily with many. This is the main argument in their minds—that if Capital Punishment was abolished, murder, and other capital crimes, would be committed with greater impunity. Could they be assured that individuals and society would be as secure in case of some other penalty—that crime would be no more frequent; they would, doubtless, willingly vote for the abolition of Capital Punishment. But, say they, 'it is an expedient to which we are driven by necessity.'

I would remark upon this argument, in the first place, that to me there is no expediency in this matter save that which may be dictatated by necessity. I cannot consent that human life may be violated by a mere policy, that selects this penalty as a bloody terror, to frighten men, without any deeper consideration. If society can be as secure, if life and that kind of honor that is dearer than life, can be preserved as well by other penalties, then the question of expediency is, with me, at an end. I hold that there is no right to take life except in self-defence—that which is not right is not lawful—that which is unlawful is inexpedient. If a midnight burglar attempts your life, and you prevent him, or if he takes the life of one of your family, and you secure him to deliver him up to justice, I hold that you have no right to slay him upon an after-consideration that his death may prevent like attacks in future. It must be clearly demonstrated both in this case, and in the case of Capital Punishment by society, that crime is actually prevented, that the death of the criminal is positively necessary to restrain others whose hands are all ready to repeat the bloody act. I cannot support the holding up of anything as a mere bugbear, of holding up a terror, without being assured that it accomplishes some good end. Least of all, can I consent that life shall be the sacrifice to the irrational and impotent experiment.

Again: I would remark upon this idea that many seem to have concerning the efficacy of Capital Punishment as a preventive of crime, that it is founded upon the erroneous notion that a punishment is efficacious in proportion as it is severe. I would reply to this, that it is not the severity but the certainty of punishment that constitutes its efficacy. No man would break open a store or pillage it, if he knew, if he was morally certain, that upon re-crossing its threshold he would be crushed to death. But he depends upon chances, he calculates to escape with impunity. So with any crime. The criminal calculates to escape with impunity. He has no intention of suffering the penalty at all, therefore its severity or its mildness weighs nothing in the scale. I am arguing now upon the general philosophy of punishment, shewing the motives that operate upon the mind of the criminal. The ground which I am combatting, assumes that the more severe the punishment, the more will the criminal be deterred. I maintain, that the more certain the punishment, the more will the criminal be deterred. Of course, a punishment must be severe enough to be felt as a punishment, but, if so, its certainty not its severity, will be the motive in the mind of the criminal. Now, if the objector says,—'Very well, you must acknowledge that if you make Capital Punishment certain, it will be efficacious;' I answer, that, in that point of view, there is no necessity for Capital Punishment, because there are other penalties equally certain; and if you would have Capital Punishment only because of its certainty, you abandon the chief ground on which it rests, namely, its severity. If you grant that punishment is efficacious in proportion to its certainty, I contend that Capital Punishment has no distinction in its favor above many other penalties, which are equally certain. But it is not practically felt that Capital Punishment is peculiarly certain, but that it is peculiarly severe, and men cling to it under the idea that its severity constitutes its efficacy—which, I say, is not the motive that operates upon the mind of the criminal. If the severity of a punishment constitutes its efficacy, why not affix Capital Punishment to all offences? It should, upon this ground, check them at once. If the severity of Capital Punishment constitutes eits ffiicacy, then the English code, dripping all over with blood, is indeed a wise one. Under that code, he who sets fire to a stack of hay, out in a field, with neither life nor house in danger, has been convicted of murder and executed. It was all right according to this principle. That execution might prevent men from setting fire to stacks of hay in future—though some wary rogue might calculate that such a punishment was too abhorrent to the better feelings of our nature to secure many executions under it, and that stacks of hay might be set on fire with more impunity than if the penalty were imprisonment, or a fine, which would be more likely to be enforced. If the severity of punishment constitutes its efficacy, be consistent, and affix Capital Punishment to all crimes. If it is answered to this, that there must be degrees of crime recognized, and that one penalty would confound all such degrees, then I say—affix Capital Punishment to the worst crimes. I can conceive of a worse crime than murder under some circumstances. Take the death-blow that is dealt under a sense of the keenest wrong—the blow that is dealt to the murderer of domestic peace—is this as bad as the vile seduction that lures innocence to its embrace and leaves it to die, while it goes unchecked and even applauded? Is it as bad as the smooth fraud, that cheats the weak man, and goes clad in silk and broadcloth?—You would make some distinction between degrees of crime, you say. Why not make it here—and imprison the insulted murderer in the one case, and hang up the seducer and the villian in the other?

The fact is, the philosophy of criminal jurisprudence is out of joint here. It would have punishment severe, because severity is efficacious; and then, when pressed to the conclusion that it is the certainty not the severity of punishment that ensures its efficacy, it would have Capital Punishment because it may be made certain; and when urged that other and milder penalties may be equally certain, it returns to the severity of the punishment as more safe than milder penalties; and when asked to be consistent, and affix the severest punishment to all crimes, it urges the confusion of degrees of guilt that would take place thereby; and when pressed to affix the severest penalty to the blackest sins, it throws itself upon the customs of society, and remains silent.

Now, I undertake to say, in the language of Montesquieu, that 'If we inquire into the cause of all human corruptions, we shall find that they proceed from the impunity of crimes, and not the moderation of punishments.' Impunity—that is the motive with the offender. He reasons not upon what his punishment is to be, but how he is to evade it. And, in cases of murder, how deeply, think you, does the severity of the penalty have an influence? Most murders are committed, it is probable, in hot blood. They ensue in a quarrel, or from the passionate dictates of revenge, or as security from detection in a lesser crime, and all glimpses of the penalty are lost sight of. Or, if the murder is a cool and calculated crime, then everything else is calculated, and escape is calculated among the rest. Now I do candidly believe that this penalty of death hinders no man, or at least very few men, if so disposed, from the commission of murder. Else, why do we see murders committed right under the shadow of the gallows, and amid the very excitement of an execution? Why, in the year 1822, one Lechler,* was executed, in Lancaster, Penn., for murder. An immense number of people witnessed the event. Among them was one Wilson, who in the evening met one Burns, with whom he was at variance, and stabbed him mortally. He was committed to jail, says a writer, 'and had the same irons put on him which had scarcely been lain off long enough by Lechler to get cold.' An execution took place at Paisley, in Scotland, in 1837, which was followed by many murders, in a district where this crime was rare. 'Very lately, in the State of Ohio,' says Mr. Rantoul in his Report in 1836, 'on the day in which a man was executed for the murder of his wife, under circumstances of peculiar cruelty, another man, near the place of execution, murdered his wife in the same manner.'

I might, doubtless, find many more instances of this kind. I do not say, at this stage of my argument, that Capital Punishment suggested these crimes, but I do say that their occurrence refutes the idea of its efficacy. I ask its advocates to show us where is its efficacy. It certainly does not lie in its severity. And if it does not lie in its severity, then so severe a punishment is not required. It has no more efficacy, then, than milder penalties. But all that can for one moment prop the administration of a punishment that takes life, is the fact of its necessity, as being a penalty of greater efficacy than any other. It is not so. Then society is no safer because of it. Let it be abolished, then. Let us not continue a punishment that takes one life for another with no practical benefit—let us not continue a punishment that contradicts what Eden, a celebrated writer on Penal Law, styles 'The unwritten law of God imprinted on the heart of man; that natural sympathy better felt than expressed, which forbids us to give unnecessary pain to each other; or, in fuller words, to extend the severity of punishments beyond what is essentially necessary to the preservation and morality of society.' Let us remember, in the language of the same writer, that 'nothing but the evident hand of necessity can authorize the destruction of mankind by the hand of man.'

I have thus examined the idea which seems to lie at the foundation of that tenacity with which men cling to Capital Punishment. Because it is a severe punishment it is not therefore efficacious, and there is no danger in a milder penalty from the mere fact that it is mild; since the efficacy of a punishment consists not in its degree of severity, but its degree of certainty. It is true, at this stage of our argument, we may admit that other penalties are no more certain than Capital Punishment, but they have equal claims as safeguards of society if they are as certain, and greater claims as being more humane, more beneficial, and more certain—which we intend to show.

But thus far I have been showing why other penalties are as expedient as Capital Punishment, without showing that Capital Punishment is positively inexpedient. This I now propose to do, from several reasons, which I must present briefly. I have not room in one discourse to bring up every argument, or to enter into statistical details. My object is to excite thought upon the subject, rather than to impart complete information, and if I do this, and present some of the leading arguments for the abolition of Capital Punishment on the ground of expediency, I shall be satisfied.

* I am indebted for this and many other facts, to the valuable Report of Mr. O'Sullivan, before the New-York Legislature.

In the first place, then, let me remark that Capital Punishment is inexpedient because of the uncertainty of its infliction, and therefore the chance of impunity to the criminal. Now there are some, it is quite probable, who view the attempt to abolish Capital Punishment as an effort of ill-judging mercy. They call it a weak philanthropy, or a morbid feeling. I think that this is a false charge. The attempt to abolish Capital Punishment is not an effort of weak pity, but a dictate of sound policy, and a regard to the true welfare of community.—We would have a penalty so reasonable that all reasonable minds must approve of it, and not so severe that it shall defeat its very objects. And why would we have all reasonable minds approve of it? Not alone because the criminal shall thereby suffer a less severe punishment, but because he will be more likely to suffer some punishment. Not because a morbid sympathy is excited in his behalf, but because his penalty being clearly seen to be just and humane, no room will be given for the existence of any morbid sympathy.—Now I find Capital Punishment to be an uncertain penalty. In the first place, under such a penalty, Juries have a great reluctance to convict a man of a capital crime. They will hang upon the least thread of evidence in his behalf and will acquit him by it. Once acquitted, he goes clear—no punishment is inflicted—although to every one it is plain that he deserves some retribution. Now, it may be replied to this, that the Jury is, perhaps, a packed one, selected by the prisoner himself, after many challenges, and is likely to have some friend of the criminal in its number who will hold out against all evidence, and thus procure his discharge. But, certainly, this is throwing a grave charge upon many men, and why is it, moreover, that this reluctance is not confined to Jurors? The Judge manifests it in discharging his heavy duty.—And why such a shudder at the sight of an executioner? Why is he, the agent of a just law, as many would term it,—why is he, the executioner, held in such universal abhorrence? An isolated being—a blood-spotted leper, among men; of whom men can say no more detestable thing, than that he is the common hangman. Is all this the product of morbid feeling? Does it spring from a desire that crime should go unpunished? Are men so heedless of their own security as to wish all murderers free? No—it is not a morbid feeling, but a sympathy created by re-action.—The true sentiment of justice in men's bosoms has been over-strained by the rude hand of the law—and this is the result. 'If men feel so,' some will say, 'it is evidently a diseased feeling—let them get rid of it.' I say, remove the cause of it. Your punishment is too severe. Men do not wish to give impunity to crime, but they shudder at violating the shrine of human life, and taking that boon which God alone can give. And this is why Juries so often acquit men. I know that it is possible that at times there may be packed Juries. But I cannot make this so sweeping a charge as to call it a general rule. Juries do have this reluctance to convict. In the year 1831, the Duke of Sussex, presented in the House of Lords, a petition of upwards of eleven hundred, who had either served, or were liable to serve as Jurors, praying that the House would abolish 'the penalty of death in all cases in which the legislative power cannot justify, in the eyes of God and man, that last and dreadful alternative—the extermination of the offender.' When,' said the Duke, in introducing this petition, 'when we see ninety-one names, on the first skin of the petition, of merchants and others, whose annual returns in trade amount to no less a sum than ten millions sterling, I think I have stated to your Lordships sufficient to convince you that this petition is entitled to great consideration and respect. These respectable persons state to your Lordships their own private feelings, and the situation to which they are frequently reduced in fulfilling their painful duties.' The following is an extract from the petition, in which, although they speak of the penalty of death as affixed to crimes against property, we may see the natural struggle that rises in any human bosom that is the arbiter of life and death, and that will account for the many acquittals that are made in the face of strong evidence, without referring that result to packed Juries, or to criminal confederates. 'In the present state of the law,' says the petition, 'Juries feel extremely reluctant to convict where the penal consequences of the offence excite a conscientious horror on their minds, lest the rigorous performance of their duty as Jurors should make them accessory to judicial murder. Hence in Courts of Justice a most unnecessary and painful struggle is occasioned, by the conflict of the feelings of a just humanity with the sense of the obligation of an oath.' Men even in the Jury-box, and under the sanctity of an oath, cannot be indifferent to the sentiments of humanity, unless, in the words of Lord Byron, 'we have twelve butchers for a Jury, and a Jeffries for a Judge.'

How often, too, is insanity rendered as a plea for murder! We seldom hear of it in other crimes. True, murder is more congenial to insanity than many other crimes.—Yet, if the penalty of murder were not death, but imprisonment, more would be convicted who plead insanity, since even in that case the security and discipline of a well-ordered prison would be better than perfect freedom and impunity. Capital Punishment is uncertain, then, because Jurors are reluctant to convict.

But, after the conviction has been secured, then come applications for pardon—or, at least, for commutation, and even the latter proves that the sober dictate of reason and humanity is more for imprisonment than for death—but the petition is often for pardon.—Now I know that there is, frequently, some ground for the charge of morbid sympathy here. Men pity the murderer, but not the murdered—they pity that man whose hands are stained with crime, but not the unprotected family of him who was called, suddenly and in violence from their bosom. This is undue and unjust, and should be corrected. But what is the cause of it? The severity of the penalty! If imprisonment was the punishment, there would be none, or but little of this. And, say what you will of the feeling, and grant that it goes too far, it comes from a legitimate source in the human heart. It will not do to dismiss it contemptuously, with the expression, 'morbid feeling!' It is plainly an effect of reason and humanity, pleading against a punishment that is unreasonable and inhuman—it does not flow from a dislike of laws and penalties. It is a proof that 'penal laws are to check the arm of wickedness, not to wage war with the natural sentiments of the heart.' Men with the consciousness of perfect security cannot do in cool blood what the murderer did in a passion—take life. It is a dreadful extremity, and if there is anything morbid in connexion with the subject, it issues from that fact. Capital Punishment, then, is uncertain, because it excites a sympathy in behalf of the criminal that procures his pardon from all punishment.

I might add here, that Capital Punishment sometimes defeats the pardon of men who deserve to be pardoned, and in this way. After several immunities have been granted, the public mind becomes alarmed, and by the law of re-action goes to the other extreme, and severity is demanded. Then the next man that is convicted will be pretty sure to be hung, although he may really deserve acquittal more than many who have gone before him. 'Legislators should remember,' says Eden, 'that the acerbity of justice deadens its execution, and that the increase of human corruptions proceeds not from the moderation of human punishments, but from the impunity of criminals.'

Again: Capital Punishment is inexpedient, because it excites the very passion that leads to murder, and violates the sanctity of the very principle that it would defend. It should be a prime object of all laws to create a healthful public sentiment. They should aim below the overt act to the motive, and not confining themselves to the security of order, endeavor to foster right dispositions. Now, I ask, what is the position that the law takes in the case of Capital Punishment? Why, this—that as life has been taken once, it can only be atoned for by the life of him who was guilty of the violation. This, I say, is the position of the law. Now men of enlightened minds, of penetrating reason and legal knowledge, may see the difference between the exercise of this principle in the hands of the law, and in the hands of individuals—may see why the community may exercise it safely and individuals not; though I confess I am one who cannot see the principle in an aimable light in whatever position it is viewed. Still, I say, however this may be with enlightened and reasoning men, the great mass of minds, especially the ignorant and the vicious—the very men in whom you wish to plant sound and healthful sentiments, are not likely to become casuists upon the subject; but discern in Capital Punishment only a phase of the law of retaliation—'blow for blow, wound for wound, stripe for stripe.'—This principle, then, becomes sanctified to them by the example of the law. And this is the very principle that often leads to murder. The law has not taught them what it should teach them—to 'overcome evil with good;' but to overcome evil with evil; to atone for life with life. I grant that you might reason safely upon this subject, but these men do not reason at all; or if they do, they reason from the law as it appears, not as it means. Thus the strong principle of revenge is sanctified and nourished—which must be eradicated ere murder ceases from the land. Men in a passion reason, if they reason at all, as the law seems to reason in a full Court of Justice—men without efficient means of legal justification, reason individually, as the law seems to reasons, and assume as individuals a right which the law pretends can only be held by community—the right to take life for life.

But let us look further at this matter. One would naturally think that the best way to secure life, would be to inculcate its inviolable sanctity—to teach impressively that as God breathed it into this human organism, God alone can dismiss it hence. Let it so teach. How emphatically might it so teach, if it refused to shed even the blood of the criminal who has taken life! Yes, there he is, a red-handed man, who has cleft the heart of his brother, and taken from him that which no human power can bestow. Yet all that the law does, is to lay its hand upon him that he do so no more. This principle of life must not be risked by his freedom, but even in him it must be respected. So precious is life that the law regards it even in him.—True Justice, that is God's agent upon the earth, the likest Him in its beneficent legislation and its harmonious order—that administers to protect, and punishes to reform—pauses before the awful sanctity of life. The sword she bears is given as a symbol of authority, but not as an instrument of death. There is one who has taken life, but she has no power to take life in return. If she takes property, she can also repay; if she deprives of liberty, she can also set free; but life she cannot give again. It is like no other principle. God alone is its Arbiter. She sheathes her sword, shudders at and punishes the crime; but ventures not herself to break the very law to which she points the criminal; the law written by God's own finger; proclaimed by God's own voice—'Thou shalt not kill.'

Is not this the way to inculcate the preciousness of life, and to show to men the awful guilt of murder? But how is it shown now? How is the preciousness of life made known? Why by the taking of life. Life is shown to be sacred by the muffling cap, the hangman, and the gallows. Think you men can well see how this demonstrates its sanctity?

But I wish to look a little further into this matter; for it is, at bottom, the great objection to Capital Punishment. I ask, is it not true that familiarity with blood ceases to make it precious? Is it not so with soldiers, with pirates, with murderers? Does it not seem natural that the first murder should excite more horror than the second, or the tenth? This, I believe, is a sound principle—that familiarity with the sacrifice of life is apt to beget a disregard for life. I have already alluded to the fact that murders are committed under the very gallows. Certainly it is not there that the preciousness of life is taught. A curious instance of the operation of this principle is related by the celebrated Volney. Just after the Reign of Terror, that awful epoch when blood ran free as water, and moistened the earth instead of rain from heaven, and cried with ten thousand gory lips from the ground—just after that time, he relates that he was powerfully affected by the spectacle of crowds of children, in different parts of France, guillotining cats and chickens for sport. Even childhood had become inured to sights of blood, and imitated the most frightful tragedies for sport! 'Away with this cruelty from the State,' says Cicero,*—'allow it not, O judges, to prevail any longer in the Commonwealth. It has not only the fatal effect of cutting off so many of your fellow-citizens in a most atrocious manner, but it hath even banished from men of the mildest disposition, the sentiment of mercy, by the familiar practice of slaughter.'

Now it is granted that executions in our country, are, at the most, rare, and therefore the mind is not familiar with them; still as far as they occur, I say, instead of checking the disposition to disregard human life, they are calculated to nourish it. How much curiosity and effort are expended, as if an execution were a raree-show! Look at the recent instance of one man travelling some three hundred miles to witness that purposed execution in New-York, which was prevented by such a dreadful catastrophe. See the apprentices on board the Somers, pointing at the dead bodies of their late comrades, and laughing,—see the crowds of sharpers, thieves, harlots, yea, murderers, that throng the place of execution. Look candidly at all these things, and ask, if, instead of begetting a healthful sentiment on this subject—if, instead of creating a reverence for life, Capital Punishment does not produce indifference, heartlessness, callousness, yea, murder? Why if Capital Punishment, is indeed a salutary terror, have some States abolished hanging in public, holding their executions in the prison-yards? Plainly, because they produce more evil than good, and brutalize instead of softening hearts already prone to crime.

I say, then, that Capital Punishment is inexpedient, because it excites the very passion that leads to murder, and violates the sanctity of the very principle that it is established to defend.

Once more: Capital Punishment is inexpedient, because wherever it is adopted among civilized nations, crimes prevail more than in those nations where it is abolished—or more during the period of its existence in a nation, than they do during the periods of its discontinuance in the same nation; thus showing a connection between bloody penalties and bloody deeds, that stands almost in the relation of cause and effect. This is a matter of statistics. Let us look at a few instances.—Leopold, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, abolished the penalty of death, at first, as an experiment. What was the result of that experiment? It was such as to induce him, after twenty-one years' trial, to decree the abolition of Capital Punishment forever; 'for,' said he, 'all crimes have diminished, and those of an atrocious nature have become extremely rare.' 'In Tuscany,' says Mr. Livingston, quoting Franklin as authority, 'where murder was not punished with death, only five had been committed in twenty years; while in Rome, where that punishment is inflicted with great pomp and parade, sixty murders were committed in the short space of three months, in the city and vicinity . . . . . the manners, principles and religion of the inhabitants of Tuscany and those of Rome are exactly the same. The abolition of death alone as a punishment for murder, produced this difference in the moral character of the two nations.' Bonaparte restored Capital Punishment in Tuscany. 'On comparing three successive periods of twenty years,' says Mr. L. 'in the first period Capital Punishment existing, in the second abolished, and in the third again restored, it is found that fewer crimes, and fewer murders were perpetrated in the middle twenty years, while no executions took place, than in either the preceding or succeeding twenty years, while the scaffold was in use.' So, you will perceive, that the change could be owing to nothing but the abolition of Capital Punishment.

Elizabeth of Russia, did not inflict the punishment of death. The experiment was so successful as to recommend itself to her successor, Catherine the Great, who never employed Capital Punishment except in some rare cases of crime against the state. From that time to the present, Capital Punishment has been inflicted in Russia, but twice. Count de Segur says, that Russia is one of the countries in which the least number of murders is committed, and adopts the following profound saying of Catherine: 'We must punish crime without imitating it; the penalty of death is rarely any thing but a useless barbarity.' Such, O Legislators of free America, is the language of a Russian sovereign.

Says a writer, 'During the time that amiable and kind-hearted man, Sir James Mackintosh, was Recorder of Bombay, a period of seven years, the punishment of death was entirely discontinued. If the experiment ever was to fail, its failure might have been expected in such a place as Bombay—a crowded Indian sea-port, composed of a mixed and shifting population. But what was the result? It had been most successful; for Sir J. Mackintosh declared from the bench, in his last charge, when he was about to return to England, that the district had been governed without Capital Punishment, and with no diminution in the security of the lives and property of man.' This at least shows that the security of society is not in Capital Punishment.

I could refer you to other instances of successful experiment in this matter—could show you that the crime of murder keeps pace with Capital Punishment—but have not time to enter into further details. Enough has been said to show that at least Capital Punishment has no efficacy to restrain murder, or to shield society from violent crime—that, on the other hand, it has a tendency to produce violence, and by imitating a crime to increase the very evil it should diminish.

Thus, my friends, the argument for the expediency of Capital Punishment, from the assumption that it tends to restrain violence, and to shield community from crime, is met by facts—showing that it not only does not exercise this conservative or protective influence, but that it is positively inexpedient. All outward penalties must be more or less imperfect—all human laws evince the frailty and the sin of man. There is nothing that can effectually stay crime, but the disposition that is fostered by christian principle. But that which comes next in efficacy to this inward power, is the spirit of Christianity manifested in legislation—in our laws and penalties. If these laws and penalties breathe revenge and violence, the maladies of society will only be aggravated—if these rest upon the great mandate of our text—the Christian mode, the Christian expediency of overcoming evil with good; these social diseases, if not eradicated, will at least be soothed and diminished. 'Overcome evil with good,' is a mighty principle! It shall accomplish more in one brief hour than years of iron torture, bloody racks, and fearful gibbets. It shall appeal to man in the power of kindness, and even while punishing, seek to restore. It shall enact no partial penalty, but seek the good of community, of the criminal, of all.

There is one other consideration which I wish to present here, that seems, of itself, sufficient to counterbalance all the benefit that is derived from the penalty of Capital Punishment, viewed as a mere expedient—which, of itself, calls for the abolition of that penalty, unless we are assured, solemnly assured, that in no other way can life and safety be preserved. I allude to the fact that men are often executed who are entirely INNOCENT. It is said that upwards of one hundred cases of this kind are known in the annals of English jurisprudence. And how many in this country, the Omniscient only can know. Think of this, and shudder. Upwards of one hundred men, have gone, innocent, to a felon's grave! Gone, amid maledictions and denunciations, knowing that they were innocent, yet led on by an irresistible power to their execution. Is it not horrid to think of? May we not well pause, and weigh the benefits of a penalty that incurs such fearful liabilities? Who, in fact, is safe? Human tribunals are fallible—circumstancial evidence is often strong, apparently irresistible; and who, I ask, though free from crime as the innocent babe, may not become entangled in its toils? You and I are as liable to be unjustly executed as many innocent men who have been. It is miserable consolation to the innocent man to think that he shall one day be found guiltless, and flags waved and cannon discharged above his grave. Paley, who with a christian heart and an acute intellect, held, in some respects, a strange morality, says, that 'he who falls by a mistaken sentence, may be considered as falling for his country, while he suffers under the operation of those rules by the general effect and tendency of which the welfare of the community is maintained and upheld.' To which Sir Samuel Romilly has well replied,—'When the innocent become the victims of the law, the law is not merely inefficient, it does not merely fail of accomplishing its intended object, it injures the persons it was meant to protect, it creates the very evil it was to cure, and destroys the security it was made to preserve.' This, I say, was a sound answer. Do you not perceive that it virtually matters but little to the innocent man, whether he dies by felon-hands, or by the law, seeing he dies undeservingly. Again: do you not see the inexpediency of Capital Punishment, in this point of view, that when an innocent person has been executed it is calculated to weaken confidence in tribunals of justice, and to lower the majesty of the law in the eyes of unthinking men—the very men who need to feel its necessity?

Now, this danger of executing the innocent is not a mere bug-bear, a supposition conjured up to help our argument. It has been the case fearfully too often. I said, upwards of one hundred instances have occurred in the history of English jurisprudence. Mr. O'Sullivan, in his Report before the Legislature of New-York, specifies the trains of evidence that, in several instances, have been the foundation of the execution of innocent men.—'There have been cases,' says he, 'in which groans have been heard in the apartment of the crime, which have attracted the steps of those on whose testimony the case has turned—when on proceeding to the spot, they have found a man bending over the murdered body, a lantern in the left hand, and the knife yet dripping with the warm current, in the blood-stained right, with horror-striken countenance, and lips which in the presence of the dead, seemed to refuse to deny the crime, in the very act of which he is thus surprised—yet the man has been, many years after, when his memory alone could be benefitted by the discovery, ascertained not to have been the murderer. There have been cases in which a father has been found murdered in an out-house, the only person at home being a son, sworn by a sister to have been dissolute and undutiful, and anxious for the death of the father, and succession to the family property—when the track of his shoes in the snow is found from the house to the spot of the murder, and the hammer with which it was committed, (known as his own) found, on a search in a corner of one of his private drawers, with the bloody evidence of the deed only imperfectly effaced from it—and yet the son has been innocent! The sister, years after, on her death-bed, confessing herself the fratricide as well as the parricide. There have been cases in which two men have been seen fighting in a field—an old enmity existing between them—the one found dead, killed by a stroke from a pitch-fork known as belonging to the other, and which the other had been carrying—the pitch-fork lying by the side of the murdered man; and yet its owner has been afterwards found not to have been the author of the murder of which it had been the instrument—the true murderer sitting on the jury that tried him!'

Such, my friends, have been some of the fallibilities of the criminal law. There are horrid deaths enough—death by scorching flame, by racking torture, by being crushed under some immovable weight, and smothered; but of all deaths the most horrid are, that which is the result of being buried alive, and that in which a man dies by the hands of the law as a criminal, yet innocent. Which of these two is the worst, they only can know who experience, in either case, its dying pangs.

But is it not time that we were awake to the matter of the abolition of Capital Punishment? Awake to it, as a matter of sound policy—as a matter of social and individual security. Upon each one of us, individually, rests the execution of this penalty. It is your voice, it is mine, so long as we uphold it, that condemns a man to death. The judge, the executioner, is but our agent. Consider what sound policy, what true justice, what reason, and above all, what Christianity requires us to do. Consider the uncertainty of Capital Punishment. Consider its great disregard of the sanctity of life. Consider the increase of crime under its administration, the decrease of crime when it is abolished—and then consider the innocent men who have suffered under it, that had imprisonment been the penalty might have lived to be restored in honor and in peace back to society. Let me close with this point, and if I appeal to your feelings in doing so, remember that I do not draw upon imagination, but from fatal facts.

Let us look upon the man who dies guiltless, and yet who dies a felon's death. His last hour has come. Time and disease have been forestalled by justice. Let us enter his dungeon. Nay, look not around!—this is the common furniture of a prison, especially of the last abode of him, who, according to legal ethics, as he has sinned deeply must be sinned against in return. Look not around, but look at him—the doomed man. Is there not a dreadful calmness in his face, more awful than the malignity of guilt? But it is a fitful countenance, for now it is wild and fevered—as if the insulted soul were stunned with amazement at the suddenness and weight of its charge, or would rend its very clay to plead its innocence. He has parted from the few who loved him to the last. Perhaps there was but one. He kissed the cold lips, beneath which a heart was breaking, and, Oh!—thought to curdle the very blood in its fountain—perhaps over the embers even of that heart, a suspicion of his guilt is brooding like a spectre. But the time flies. Hark! it is the bell-toll—saying to him, 'Come! come! to a FELON'S death!' He is bewildered, he is amazed, he weeps, he says over the mockery of a prayer with stony lips as they lead him to the gibbet, with muffled feet, and creaking wheels, and doleful death-march. And what a crowd is there! Fashionable folly, rude profaneness, inebriety, thieving, lust, hoarse jesting with the executioner and the rope.—One more prayer—and his time has come.—The fatal cap is drawn. Stop! stop! the multitude heaves like the billows of a yawning sea. Conscience has done its work at last! A man staggers pale and moist through the dense crowd, and lifts his clammy hands, and screams with agonized voice, 'I am the murderer, not he!' Raise him up—raise up that INNOCENT man—let him hear it! Alas! it is too late. You may canonize his memory, but his spirit was bent too far. In that last struggle, it rushed from the presence of incredulous man, shrieking, 'Innocent! innocent!' up to the merciful God.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 25, 1843.

Meeting at Lynn.

Another storm—gloomy prospects—meeting at Lynn—postponed in the forenoon—great gathering in the afternoon and evening—Lyceum Hall—cause in Lynn, &c. &c.

Storm after storm has come upon us for a few weeks past. Last week a storm of snow begun on Tuesday morning and continued through the day and night. True to the determination to be at the meeting in Lynn on Wednesday, we repaired to the depot of the Eastern Railroad in Boston to take the quarter past 9 o'clock train. But the Agent assured us, there were no engines at this end of the road; they had all been sent down the night before to clear the track, and none had come back. The 7 o'clock train on Wednesday had not gone; and when a train would go, he could not tell. A gloomy prospect, thought we. While waiting at the depot, several Unitarian clergyman and delegates came in, who were on their way, or rather desired to be on their way to Dorchester, to attend the installation of Rev. Mr. Bigelow. At length in something like an hour after the proper time, a train arrived from Lynn, which started immediately on its return, and we took passage, with a few other friends bound to the Conference.

We found the friends in Lynn in low spirits.—They knew not what to do. Should the meeting be put off until the next day? or should they proceed? Very few had arrived from the neighboring towns, and there were not more than fifty persons present. It was at last agreed (about half past eleven) that meeting should be holden in the afternoon; that the bells of the Universalist Churches should be rung; and service should be commenced at 2 o'clock. But before 1 o'clock it was apparent, that the resolution to go on with the meeting was a wise one; for the friends from Salem, Danvers and Marblehead, who had been disappointed of their passage upon the Railroad, came pouring into town in sleighs, and at 2 o'clock a large number had assembled.

Lyceum Hall, which had been engaged for the occasion, is a splendid and spacious room. It is of the whole size of the building, and it is said it will seat comfortably about 1000 persons.—Neither of the Universalist Churches in that town would accommodate so many. Contrary to all expectation in the morning, the Hall was filled. The services proceeded as they usually do in a Conference Meeting, with this exception, that we think we never heard the singing equalled. Whether it was that we sung more with the spirit than usual, or whether some other circumstance produced it, we will not say; but surely we never heard such a chorus of praise.—Imagine from 800 to 1000 persons, all engaged, all familiar with the music, all inspired by the sentiments, and you may have some conception of the volume of praise which ascended to heaven. The Conference Hymns only were used, each family of Universalists bringing one or two copies of the work. The clergy present in the afternoon were Brs. Everett, of Salem, Austin, of Danvers, Gardner, of Iowa City, (providentially present,) Willis, of Cambridgeport, Damon, of Lynn, and ourself. Br. Atkinson, of Marblehead, did not venture to come over. Each of the brethren present endeavored to make the meeting interesting and profitable. Many of the laymen engaged in the services; and we were truly happy to perceive that they are growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The afternoon service continued two hours and a half. Every exertion was made by our friends at Lynn, to see that all visitors from other towns were accommodated. Their kindness will be long remembered.

The services of the evening commenced at half past 6 o'clock. By this time the Hall had become filled to its utmost capacity. Seats were carried into the aisles, which were all filled; and in looking upon the mingled throng, one seemed to be beholding a sea of heads. Perhaps this service was the more interesting of the two. A large number took part in the exercises. All the speakers were interesting and profitable in their remarks; but we were peculiarly touched with the testimony of those who had recently been brought to the knowledge of the truth. One young man arose and spoke as follows:—'I once lived in this town,' said he. 'I made myself miserable and low by my sins. You do not know me, for I am in one sense in a disguise. I used to be a loafer about your streets—I have slept in barns and sheds, and any place into which I could creep. I used to be a drunkard. It has been said (added he) that Universalism never produces conversion, never begets a change of heart, never produces a reformation of life. Look at me. I offer myself as a refutation of that objection.' Said he, 'I will tell you who I am, and then you will remember me. My name is P—— B——.' On his mentioning his name, there was a rush of interest through the audience. He had been redeemed by the power of the gospel and turned from the evil of his ways. May the Lord bless him, and make him faithful always. Another gentleman somewhat advanced in life arose. He had, he said, 'been a great opposer to Universalism.' 'I have often said if I believed that doctrine, I would launch out into all sin; I would lie, and steal, and murder. But my conscience used to condemn me even then when I said so.—I knew better; but I wished to say something evil of that doctrine that I was so much prejudiced against. But I thank God that my eyes are opened; I now love this doctrine; it gives me great peace; I desire to live and die in this faith; I hope I shall not dishonor it,' &c. Some gentleman at our side whispered, that he (the last speaker) was the last of the five Trustees of one of the Christian Societies that had been brought to the knowledge of the truth. The Meeting-House, congregation, trustees and all, are now devoted to the interests of Universalism.

Soon after arose Rev. B. F. Newhall, of Saugus, who has embraced Universalism within a year or two. He spoke first of the condition of our cause in that town. There were some discouragements; but there were some persons in that town who loved the gospel, and whose souls had felt its power. He spoke of the prejudice and enmity which reigned in some hearts in Saugus against the truth; and from this he turned very naturally to what used to be the state of his own mind in regard to Universalism. He early experienced religion, and felt his heart touched with the sweet influences of the love of God. But he had a strong prejudice against Universalists—he remembered well how he used to feel. But he began to inquire, to think for himself, to pray earnestly for light; and the more he thought and the more he prayed, the nearer he drew to the doctrine of the final happiness of all men. This was the only doctrine which resulted from just views of the love of God. When it became known that he was inclining to this doctrine, he was cautioned not to avow it; he could have retained his fellowship with his former brethren, notwithstanding his faith, if he had not avowed it. When he preached the great principles which lead to Universalism, no fault was found; he remembered one discourse, concerning the love of God, in which he laid down premises from which no other doctrine but Universalism could flow, and it was thought by his former brethren one of the best sermons he ever preached in the world. But he could not hide his light, and therefore avowed his faith in Christ as a Universal Saviour, and then he was called, like Paul, to labor and suffer reproch.

From the above our readers will get an idea of the late meeting at Lynn. It was a good meeting—it was a happy meeting—it was a very large meeting—it was a profitable meeting.

Elder Himes' Safe.

Elder Himes is one of the leaders of the Miller party. He insists that the world is coming to an end in the course of the year 1843, and perhaps very soon. But whatever the Elder's faith may be, it is certain that he has recently purchased one of Thayer & Edwards' Salamander Safes, and it is put up in his office. Now if the Elder believes the world is coming to an end so soon, what does he want of this Safe?

1. Is he fearful that he is not one of the righteous? Does he think he shall not be caught up into the air when the earth is burned? and does he intend to creep into this Salamander Safe?—Now, this is not a bad plan. The Elder wants two strings to his bow. If he is one of the righteous (of which he has some doubt) then he will be saved from the flames by being removed from the earth during the burning; but if it shall turn out that he is not one of the righteous (which is more probable,) he intends to be locked up in the Safe, and thus be secured from the fire. If the Elder has driven some people out of their wits, it is certain he has got a little cunning left to himself.

2. But there is another view we may take of this subject. We understand the Elder has made large sums of money by the Miller excitement.—He has, we believe, kept three or four presses running continually, and has sold large quantities of papers and books. He has made a large amount of money. The public may see some proof of it in his dress, for he is clad much better than he used to be. He keeps a large Salamander Safe to protect his cash from fire in case the building burns, as well as from thieves. Now is not this Elder a shrewd man? He does not wish to lose his cash, which has accrued to him from the excitement and the building which he occupies, is in as great danger of being consumed, by an accidental conflagration, as any other building. Is it not wise then for him to buy a Salamander Safe?

To be sure, the Elder preaches that the world is coming to an end very speedily; and if the world is so soon to end, we see no reason why the Elder should desire to hoard up cash in iron chests. Will he please to explain this a little?—He is making exertions to amass wealth. Where the excitement dies away a little, he is sure to add fuel to the fire to keep it going, even though he makes people insane. It is a money-making concern; and if the rum-sellers may make money out of what injures the community, why may not others do the same? Does not the Elder need an iron Safe? But we see no reason why he should desire to be rich? If his doctrine be true, what does he need of wealth and Salamander Safes?—Will not this transaction lead honest people to suspect that he is playing a deep game upon the credulity of the community, to make himself rich? and that he believes no more in the speedy end of the world than other folks?

☞The article on Capital Punishment in our last, giving an account of the debate in the Parliament of the savages of the Windward Islands, was taken from Tyermann and Bennett's Journal.

Think of it.

There is one fact, which is deserving public attention. In the controversy now going on in regard to capital punishment, all the orthodox editors, and clergy defend it. They plead for severe punishments; they plead for the continuance of the gallows. Rev. Mr. Cheever, of New York, (of Deacon Giles' memory) is defending it in that city; Rev. Parsons Cooke read a sermon in favor of it in the State House in Boston; the 'Puritan' and other orthodox papers in this region are giving their influence to it; and several of the orthodox clergy have preached and published discourses on the same side. Now, this is not to be wondered at. They believe in ENDLESS punishment; they believe that men will be tormented endlessly by their Creator without any design to do them good. It is perfectly in character therefore for them to defend the scaffold and the gallows. If they love the doctrine of endless torture, they can rejoice in the view of blood; the cries of the fallen will be music in their ears. Or to speak more mildly, if they can contemplate the hell in which they believe, without pain, no wonder that they can look unmoved upon the gallows. All unmerciful punishments are to be classed together.

On the other hand, the Universalists, with few exceptions, are opposed to capital punishment.—They are doing all in their power to cleanse our Statute books from that foul stain. And not only they, but the kind hearted every where, the meek, the mild, join their prayers together for a consummation so devoutly to be wished. We do not intend to say, that none but Universalists are opposed to capital punishment. There are many in other sects, whose hearts revolt at the doctrine of endless torture, but still who have not formally renounced it, who are utterly opposed to taking human life as a penalty. This reformation will go on, we are persuaded, until philanthropy and love are entirely successful.

The abettors of endless misery would fain persuade the public, that the opposition to capital punishment proceeds from a morbid feeling of sympathy. We think the effort springs from a healthy state of the public mind; we think it springs from sound views of scripture, of the rights of human government and of benevolence. We suspect the partialist clergy begin to feel, that if capital punishment be abolished, their cruel creeds must soon follow. For how long will men tolerate the doctrine of ENDLESS TORTURE, after they have punished the laws from all vindictive penalties? We can see very clearly, that the partialist clergy have reason for alarm.

Dr. Sharp's Sermon.

Rev. Daniel Sharp, D. D. is the pastor of the Third Baptist Church in this city. He is a divine, we hesitate not to say, who, for intelligence, for fidelity to the denomination to which he belongs, and to the society and church over which he is placed, for his kindness and manly bearing to other sects, and for the christian virtues in general, is not surpassed by any clergyman in Boston. We remember Dr. Sharp nearly thirty years ago. He was the contemporary and bosom friend of such men as Gano of Providence; Baldwin, Winchell and Wayland of this city; Jacobs, of Cambridgeport; Grafton, of Newton, &c. &c. men who were once the pride and boast of the Baptist denomination.

When Elder Knapp was brought to Boston, by such men as Messrs. Stowe and Neal, Dr. Sharp could not give him cordial co-operation; he did not approve his course; he believed it would be eventually detrimental to the cause of pure religion; and he stood aloof therefore, taking occasion, we believe, in a few instances to hear the Elder, on the ground, we suppose, of 'proving all things.' The Dr. was placed in a peculiar situation. The class of christians whom he loved, seemed to be running mad with the Knapp fanaticism; and he thought it his duty to discountenance it. Former friends grew cold; vast numbers were added to the other Baptist churches, and few to his own; his congregation was, in this manner, thrown somewhat in the shade; some were induced to withdraw from him; and in our opinion he has been called to taste of what the New Testament writers call suffering for righteousness sake.

The sermon before us, from Phil. ii. 2, 3, was preached on Oct. 9, 1842, which the Dr. describes as the 'commencement of another associational year.'

After certain very profitable suggestions, the Dr. approaches the subject of the excitement to which we have referred. He speaks of the 'peculiar combination of circumstances,' of the effect it had upon his society and church, and of his own conscientious scruples, in the following terms:

From a peculiar combination of circumstances our number during the past year has been greatly diminished. This fact, in contrast with the great accessions made to other churches in this city, has induced in many minds a feeling of discouragement, and in some a feeling of dissatisfaction. You cannot suppose that, under these circumstances, your Pastor has been a stranger to occasional despondency or distressing solicitude in regard to the continuance of a relation which had so long, and up to this period, without a solitary interuption, so harmoniously and happily subsisted. He knew that on himself to a great degree, would the responsibility rest of introducing 'new measures' into his congregation, or of preventing them; he knew also, that by their introduction, the church would be increased; many old friends would be pleased and many new ones gained.—Now, whether your Pastor has ever been converted or not,—a fact about which many have expressed their doubts,—it cannot be supposed that he could be indifferent to the continued attachment of his friends; or to the temporal benefits resulting from large accessions to the church. He knew, as well as any one could tell him, before that consideration was presented to him, that the pecuniary burdens of the society would thereby be lightened; and that many would be gratified, whose wishes he would have delighted to consult. But his judgement, his conscience, his sense of religious propriety; all his earliest and all his later habits; all his experience, all his observation; and all his convictions of the ultimate result of such measures on the moral and religious character of the church would not allow him to do, what other ministers felt at liberty to do. And yet, he knew before it happened, just as well as he has known since,—and uttered the prediction to some of the brethren in the ministry,—that, adopting these measures, they would be thought to have all the religion and himself little or none. He knew that, if he stood to his convictions and principles, he would suffer an almost total eclipse; but he knew also, as he does now, that the period of his obscuration would not last forever.

His mind remains the same. Not a shadow of a doubt has passed over it, as to the rectitude and propriety of the course he pursued. See the following section of the discourse.

It was with this foresight of the future, after days of anxiety and nights of sleepless thought, that your Pastor decided that he could not, without sinning against his own conscience and betraying, as he believed, the interests of truth and christianity, pursue any other course than that which he had pursued ever since he was a minister; nor has he ever had one misgiving thought, that he decided incorrectly. Nothing has occurred or is occurring to bring the shadow of a doubt over his mind, as to the propriety of his course. He knows that he was right. So entirely confident is he of this; that were he again placed in the same position, and subjected to the same trials, the same alienations, the same denunciations, and the same loss of friends, he would not swerve a hair-breadth from the course he pursued; except in one thing, instead of being silent, and bearing in quietness personal indignities and coarse and bitter rebukes, he would give his views publicly and explicitly, on the novel system of Evangelism, its measures and tendencies.

It may be necessary for him to speak more fully. Should a repetition of past scenes occur, he shall follow out the same general course he has pursued, except in bearing quietly 'personal indignities, and coarse and bitter rebukes.' He will speak out his convictions at length. To use his own words,—

Should occasion call for it, he will show who and what modern Evangelists are. He will show the unavoidably deleterious influence of the system of Evangelism as now pursued, on the Evangelists themselves. He will show, that the position and functions which they claim, and are allowed to exercise, tend to make them arrogant, despotic, vituperative, mercenary, and reckless in hastening multitudes into the churches; since they do not share the responsibilities of a Pastor, who is to abide the good or bad effects of such an indiscriminate increase. He will also show that Evangelists although good men, are under strong temptations to pursue an eccentric, and extravagant course; which, as it excites curiosity, attracts crowds: but is sure ultimately to bring the christian ministry and the christian religion into utter contempt; and that none but a heartless, coarse-minded, self-seeking man, would force himself on a minister who did not desire his services. He will also show the indelicacy and unkindness of any church in virtually forcing an Evangelist upon a Pastor, because the former happens to have some striking peculiarities. He will show, that it is a practical declaration, 'we would employ a person that can do your work better than you can yourself;' that is an encroachment on the office of a Pastor; and that no minister who clearly understands his own duties, or possesses a proper self-respect ought to submit to it; and that, whether intended or not by the churches, the effect of employing such helpers is to degrade their Pastors; to fill them with discouraging fears; to paralyze their efforts; to destroy the mutual confidence and respect which ought to subsist between them and their people; to unsettle, and render fluctuating and undesirable that connexion which, next to the marriage relation, should be considered sacred and inviolable.

And he can, and will make it appear, should it seem necessary, that this system of Evangelism is not less alarming, in that it will deter pious men, of good talents, sound learning and decent worldly prospects, from becoming ministers in our denomination; that, if this system continues to be patronized, a class of men, disqualified by mental imbecility for any other profession, and by idleness for any mechanical employment, will be found in the ministerial office, who will be ready to play a first, second, or third part, as their patrons may deign to assign them, rather than not obtain an easy although it be a vagrant support.

And should the crisis call for it, your Pastor will show the pernicious effects of modern Evangelism on the moral and religious character of the churches. He will not find it difficult to convince you, that mere religious excitement will be deemed every thing; and the developement of a beautiful religious character will be considered nothing; that additions to the churches will be substituted for conversions; and evanescent emotions for a scriptural faith and perseverance in well-doing,—whilst disunion, disorganization and apostacy, will take the place of that union, harmony, and well-established belief, which were once the glory and strength of our churches.

Notwithstanding the deep feeling we have in our own soul, we almost hesitate to commend what the Dr. here says, lest it should make some of his false brethren more opposed to him than they now are. They will cry, 'See, see how his course pleases the Universalists; see how it pleases the ungodly.' We shall therefore make but few remarks. We are glad to see the notice which the 'Recorder' has given of this sermon, written in a strain of careful commendation.

Thanks to Br. Thayer.

We feel quite obliged to Br. Thayer, of the 'Star and Palladium,' for his article in the last number of that paper, entitled 'Proposals for a new paper.' From what he says, we infer that he is heart-sick of the profusion of cards of thanks, begging articles, notices of donation parties, Cornucopian Rallies, charity porringers, &c. &c., with which certain of our papers have abounded. Such things are not in good taste;—they serve to lower the character of our journals; and we do not believe they are necessary. We acknowledge each editor has the right to do as he pleases; we speak for the good of the denomination, and to preserve the high character of our denominational papers.

The Outside.

Our outside does not present the usual variety to-day, but it is rich, unusually rich. The sermon on Capital Punishment, from the pen of Br. Chapin, is a powerful production, and ought to be read again and again. The article on the last page from the pen of Br. Le Fevre is very interesting, and taken in connexion with the other valuable articles, makes one of the best outsides we have given for a long time.

Death of Bishop Griswold.

Bishop Griswold, of the Episcopal Church, departed this life very suddenly, on Wednesday 15th inst. He was a kind man, catholic in his feelings, respectful to all sects, and his death has created a wide sensation. We copy the following account of his death from the 'Christian Witness.'

On the afternoon of Wednesday last, the Bishop left home in his usual health, to call upon the assistant bishop, and on reaching his house he suddenly fell upon the side-walk, before the window of Bishop Eastburn's study. An individual a few paces off saw him fall, and immediately coming to his assistance, helped him to rise. He asked the bishop if he was hurt, and he replied that he feared he was badly injured. Wm. Appleton, Esq. being in the vicinity, was in an instant at his side, and took his arm to support him as he walked towards the door of Bishop Eastburn's house. On the steps his limbs gave way, and he was carried into Bishop Eastburn's study, where he was extended upon the floor, and medical assistance directly sought. Two of our most eminent physicians were almost instantaneously present, and, they pronounced at once that he was in a dying state. In the space of five or six minutes after his fall, the bishop, without a struggle, breathed out his last breath. The manner of his dissolution was sudden, and were it for man to choose, we might have wished that he had had more timely warning of his approaching end; not for his own sake, for his work was done, and well done, but that the living might have been edified by the godly counsels and the patient example of resignation and peace, that would have been heard and seen at his dying-bed. But God's appointed time had come, and we bow to his sovereign will.

M. H. Smith's Book.

The Orthodox, so called, are making great efforts, to circulate the late work of M. H. Smith. We fully believe that they have very slight confidence in it; in fact some of the leading men of the denomination to which Mr. S. now belongs have told us, that they had no confidence in him whatsoever. But there is a class of men among them, who, whatever their opinions may be of said Smith, are willing to use him for the purpose of making sectarian capital. Such are the most violent sectarians in the world, who are ready to sacrifice every thing, except their own dear selves, for the advantage of their party. We suppose the publishers of Mr. Smith's book (Tappan & Dennett) will do their utmost to circulate the work for the profits' sake. They make money on it—perhaps they have a large premium. To sell it among the Methodists, they advertise it in Zion's Herald; to sell it among other sects, they advertise it in the papers of each sect; they get it puffed as much as possible; and then they try to work it off. How many copies they have sold, we know not; but probably not a very large number, for the partialists generally have little confidence in it.

No one can read the book without being persuaded, that the writer, or writers (for we learn that Smith had aid) were filled with MALICE towards Universalists. A. W. M'Clure, late of Malden, the same who wrote the lectures on Ultra Universalism, was associated with Mr. Smith in the preparation of the work. A package of proof-sheets, directed to Mr. M'Clure, were sent to Malden by stage, and they accidentally fell into the hands of a gentleman of a similar name, who opened the package, and examined it, before he discovered the mistake; and he learned enough from the proof-sheets, the copy and the letter accompanying them, to convince him that the work was the joint production of Messrs. Smith and M'Clure. We do not mention this as a fact of any considerable importance in itself, but merely to show that Mr. M'Clure is in part responsible for the work.

As it respects the statements in the book in regard to Universalists, the partialists themselves do not believe them; they cannot if they would; they know Universalists too well. They know the statements are incorrect; they know that they cannot place confidence in what Mr. Smith says. Some persons among them there are of small information, who may possibly suppose them true; and it is for their benefit we shall offer a few remarks occasionally in regard to the character of the book.

As a specimen of Smith's misrepresentations, we call attention to the following. Mr. Smith is endeavoring to prove, that Universalists use their churches for the purpose of dramatic exhibitions. Take the following passage from the book.

Their places of worship have in their eyes nothing of a sacred character. They are opened for infidel lectures, and for theatrical shows and exhibitions. In proof of this, read the following from the 'Trumpet' of April 6, 1839:

'Dramatic Exhibitions in Milford, Mass.—Somebody has sent us a bill of a dramatic exhibition, given by the Milford Social Club, at the UNIVERSALIST MEETING-HOUSE IN MILFORD, on Friday evening, 29th ult., consisting, 1st. Of the tragedy of Douglas; 2d. A few silly songs; and 3d. A farce, in one act, called a Race for a Dinner; the whole concluded with the Raccoon Hunt, by Mr. Freeman.'

Now a person would suppose from the above that Universalists are, or had been, in the habit of using their churches for dramatic exhibitions. But it is not so; Universalists were never in such a habit. We have known orthodox churches opened for exhibitions of a dramatic character, on occasions of the examinations of academies and the like; but any one who supposes that Universalist churches are used for dramatic purposes, is in a great error. Mr. Smith knew better; he knew that his representation was deceptive, and he must have intended it should be. Why did he not tell his readers, that he never knew of but one instance of the kind, instead of representing it as a general thing? A person would suppose from his representation that it was a general practice, and that the article copied from the 'Trumpet' was a regular advertisement of the play. Would any one of Mr. Smith's readers judge from his representation, that the article was published in the 'Trumpet,' for the sake of passing a decided CONDEMNATION on such a desecration of a house of worship? In order to show the reader that Mr. Smith had the facts before his eyes, and that he kept them back intentionally, and thereby intended to deceive his readers, we here subjoin the whole article, from the 'Trumpet' of April 6, 1839.

Dramatic Exhibitions in Milford, Ms.

Somebody has sent us a bill of a dramatic exhibition, given by the Milford Social Club, at the Universalist Meeting-House in Milford, on Friday evening, 29th ult., consisting, 1st. Of the tragedy of Douglas; 2d. A few silly songs; and 3d. A farce, in one act, called a Race for a Dinner; the whole concluded with the Raccoon Hunt, by Mr, Freeman.

It appears to us a very lamentable consideration that a meeting house, built for religious purposes, and solemnly consecrated to the worship of God, should be desecrated by such performances as these. Surely, the spirit of religion must have fled from that house. We know not the prevalent sentiments of the inhabitants of Milford in regard to this matter, but we are confident there must be some to whom such a desecration of a house erected for different purposes, must be a source of the deepest grief. It is, in our view, altogether improper.

We beg of the young gentlemen and ladies of Milford, if they must pursue these dramatic exhibitions, to spare the house of God. Is there no Town-House, or other building, that might be used? It is an offence against the good taste of society, and the religious sentiments of mankind, to introduce such services into a meeting-house. We beg of the proprietors of that house to interpose and save not only their meeting-house from disgrace, but the denomination of christians to which, in former years they professed to belong. If they cannot do this, we beg of them to drop the name Universalist, and no longer connect it with a house desecrated as theirs has been. We wish the public to know, that this is the only meeting-house in the land, called a Universalist meeting-house, that is used for such purposes.—Such is certainly the case, as far as we have any knowledge.

Now let any person compare the partial statement in Smith's book, with the whole statement from the 'Trumpet,' and then say whether Mr. Smith did not study to deceive the public, and to slander Universalists. There is no excuse,—the matter is not capable of excuse. He had all the facts before his eyes; he did suppress them knowingly and wilfully; and he is guilty of intentionally deceiving the public for the purpose of harming Universalists. Let these facts be duly pondered; and if there were no other similar case in the book, would not this stamp the work as altogether unworthy of belief?

A great stumbling block.

There is no passage of scripture, we apprehend, which so much blocks up the way of our partialist friends, as that glorious passage 1 Cor. xv. 22, 'As in Adam ALL die, even so in Christ shall ALL be made alive.' In the 'Trumpet' for Aug. 27, 1842, we gave a long article on this subject, in which we extracted a copious passage from Barnes' Notes, on that text. Barnes insists, 'If this passage means that in Adam, or by Adam, all men became sinners, then the correspondent declaration, 'all shall be made alive,' must mean that ALL MEN shall become righteous, or that all shall be saved.' Again, he says, 'If the phrase 'all die' there means all become sinners, then the phrase 'all be made alive' must mean all shall be made holy, or be recovered from their spiritual death, and thus an obvious argument is furnished for the doctrine of universal salvation which it is difficult, if not impossible to meet.' Such is the reasoning of Dr. Barnes, one of the great leaders among the partialists, whose works are in high repute. Again, he adds, 'It will not do to say, that the word 'all,' in the latter part of the sentence, means all the elect, or all the righteous; for its most natural and obvious meaning is, that it is co-extensive with the word all in the former part of the verse.' So we say also. If all men be referred to in the former part of the verse, all must be referred to in the latter part. Dr. Barnes believed that all men were intended in both clauses of the verse; but he held that it was the resurrection of all men, and not their salvation, which is asserted in the latter part.

But other writers will not admit Dr. Barnes' explanation. They declare it leads directly to Universalism; and this shows as we intimated at the beginning, that this passage is a great stumbling block to the partialists. One insists that you must get by it upon the one side, and the other insists you must go by it upon the other; and thus they conflict with each other.

Our neighbor, the editor of the 'Christian Witness,' maintains, that if the word all in the latter part of the verse be applied to all men, it will beyond all question prove the salvation of all men. Take an extract from his paper.

'Let us now see whether the old interpretation of 1 Cor. xv. places that chapter in the hands of Universalists. The Universalist takes verse 22, and demands, if all are raised in Christ,' what authority have we for saying that any portion of them will be taken out of Christ hereafter? How will 'Amicus' answer? The apostle describes in the next verse who are raised, and says it is those who 'are Christ's at his coming.' And, says the Universalist, if all are raised at that time, then all 'are Christ's.' Moreover, he adds, the apostle declares that the subjects of the resurrection are 'raised in glory,' are 'raised in incorruption,' are 'raised in power,' are 'raised a spiritual body;' that they shall 'bear the image of the heavenly,' shall 'put on incorruption,' shall 'put on immortality,' shall shout, 'O death, where is the sting?' shall find that 'sin,' which is the 'sting of death' is gone; and shall give 'thanks to God for the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.' And if all are thus raised, and with these feelings of triumph, and with this release from sin, then all must be saved. Now it will not do to neglect this reasoning. If we admit that the apostle is speaking of a general resurrection, this conclusion is linked to the premises with 'hooks of steel.'—It is unnecessary to say that our view of this chapter removes the difficulty.'

Thus we have it in plain terms. The learned Episcopalian says, if you make 1 Cor. xv. 22, apply to all men, ALL MEN must be saved. 'This conclusion is linked to the premises with hooks of steel.' Well, Dr. Barnes says, the passage does respect all men; this he affirms 'is its most natural and obvious meaning.' And what is the conclusion to which these two doctors will drive the community? Surely, they will by their arguments and concessions compel men to believe in the ultimate happiness of all. And yet they threaten us with endless damnation, if we believe that doctrine.

But to the Scriptures. The Bible is the man of our counsel. What is the evident intent of Paul's reasoning? It was to show, that as Jesus has risen from the dead, all men shall rise; and as they had all borne the earthly, or Adamic nature, incident to sin and death, so they should all bear the heaven'y nature, which shall be incorruptible and immortal. All shall be made alive in Christ. Not merely through Christ, nor by Christ, but IN Christ. This expression is often used by Paul. Its general sense is, to believe in him, to be filled with his spirit, to be renewed and made holy. Hence Paul says, Rom. xvi. 7, 'Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellow prisoners, who are of note among the apostles, who also were IN CHRIST before me.' To be in Christ in this sense, was to be made anew, to be Christians. So also in 2 Cor. v. 17, 'If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away, and behold all things are become new.' Here is a full exposition of the phrase. That this is the sense in 1 Cor. xv. 22, is evident from the context. See the 18th verse, 'Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished.' In Christ here means, in the faith and spirit of Christ. Again, ver. 18, 'If in this life only we have hope in Christ,' &c. that is, have hope founded in him, resting in his teachings and character. Then comes the 22d verse, 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' Does not this preposition (for it is the same Greek preposition in all the cases) signify the same in the 22d that it does in the 18th and 19th verses? All the dead shall be made alive in Christ, as those are said to have been asleep in Christ mentioned in the 18th verse. To be made alive in Christ signifies to be made a new creature, 2 Cor. v. 17, to be raised in the faith, spirit and moral nature of the Lord Jesus. All men are to be drawn to him, John xii. 32. In his name every knee shall bow; and every tongue shall confess him Lord, Phil. ii. 9—11. In the dispensation of the fulness of times, God will gather together in one all things in Christ, Eph. i. 10.

That we have correctly defined this great matter will be evident to every one who will read Christ's account of the condition of men in the immortal state. See Matt. xxii. 29, 30, and Luke xx. 35, 36. It will be further evident from Paul's continued account of the resurrection in the 15th of 1st Cor. Christ is the 'first fruits' of the resurrection, ver. 20; the general harvest must be of the same nature. He is to put down every enemy,—not men, but principles; and death, the last in the train, shall be destroyed. ver. 26. All things are to be subdued to him, even as he is to be subject to the Father, that God may be all in all. ver. 28. Paul speaks of the different glories; but he sees only two degrees; the one is the glory of the present state, the other of the immortal. 'The glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.' ver. 40. Paul knew only of those two states. Now see the glories described: 'It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory: It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body.' The first man (Adam) was of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven, and of course is heavenly. ver 47. Now shall all who died in Adam's nature be made alive in Christ's nature? Yes surely; for 'as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the IMAGE OF THE HEAVENLY.' ver. 49. Well, if they shall all bear the image of the heavenly, shall they not all be made alive in Christ's image? The dead shall be raised incorruptible and immortal, ver. 53; death shall be swallowed up in victory, ver. 54; SIN, the sting of death, shall be destroyed, vers. 55, 56; and the resurrection shall be a glorious victory to all, ver. 57. How clearly does this show, that to be made alive in Christ is to be made alive in Christ's image and spirit. Confute this scriptural argument who can.

Paul has a somewhat similar argument in the 5th of Romans. He speaks of Adam's sin, and of men sinning after the similitude of Adam's transgression. He concludes by saying, that 'as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.' ver. 18. And this is further explained in the next verse, 'For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many (the same who were made sinners) BE MADE RIGHTEOUS, ver. 19; not merely be made alive from the dead, but be made RIGHTEOUS. And the full work of the Redeemer can never be done, until all are brought into this situation.

We know not that we can understand all that Paul says about Adam in Romans v. and 1 Cor. xv; but if there was ever any thing plain, it is this, that all the ruins of the fall shall be repaired by the Lord Jesus Christ; that his grace shall abound more than sin, Rom. v. 20; and that all those shall be made righteous under Christ, who had been sinners under Adam. ver. 19. This is begun, but not completed in this world. Paul carries it beyond the grave; nor shall the kingdom of Jesus be resigned, until all are changed into the image of God, and God shall be all in all.

Elder Knapp and the Washingtonians.

It has been widely reported, that Elder Jacob Knapp was the cause of the origin of the Washingtonian Temperance movement in Baltimore. Knowing the many large stories the Elder has told about Universalists, we have heretofore taken occasion to say, that we had no confidence in his statement that he was the prime mover of the Washingtonian reform. Through the columns of the 'Trumpet,' Elder Knapp's claim reached Baltimore, where it met the eye of Rev. James Shrigley, who addressed a letter to W. K. Mitchell, Esq the worthy President of the Washington Temperance Society of that city, and one of the 'immortal six,' who first formed the Society, and gave motion to the reform. Mr. Mitchell addressed Mr. Shrigley as follows:

Baltimore, Jan. 11, 1843.

DEAR SIR:—I have received yours of the 9th inst. and take great pleasure in communicating to you the information you desire, of which the accompanying certificate and book will I hope be conclusive and satisfactory.

I have received several communications on the subject from individuals with whom I had no personal acquaintance, and of whose responsibility I had no knowledge. But the request, coming from a gentlemen so well known and so highly esteemed, is one which affords us much pleasure to satisfy.

Very respectfully your ob't servant,
W. K. MITCHELL.*

To Rev. J. Shrigley, Baltimore.

* The original letter of Mr. Mitchell may be seen at the Trumpet office.

CERTIFICATE.

'Baltimore, Jan. 11, 1843.

'We, the undersigned, survivors of the original six founders of the Washington Temperance Society, certify, that Elder Jacob Knapp had no agency in the formation of the Washington Temperance Society, and that its formation cannot with truth or justice be attributed in any manner to his influence or exertions, directly or indirectly. The act was spontaneous among ourselves, without the agency of any known human influence, and we can ascribe it only to the manifestation of the beneficence of the Divine Author of all good.

The origin, history and characteristics of the Society are truly and fully explained in a book published by John Zug, a member of the Society, and entitled 'The Foundation, Progress, and Principles of the Washington Temperance Society of Baltimore, and the influence it has had on the Temperance movements in the United States.'

Signed, W. K. MITCHELL,
JAMES MCCURLEY,
DAVID ANDERSON,
ARCHABALD CAMPBELL,
JOHN F. HOES.

The above letter and certificate were published in the 'Trumpet' of Jan. 28th; and they have drawn out from Mr. John H. W. Hawkins the following letters, which we copy from the 'Mercantile Journal' of Saturday last. We shall only remark, that we have now given the public all the documents, and they must judge between Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Hawkins. At any rate, the FIVE survivors of the 'immortal six,' all testify, that 'Elder Knapp had no agency in the formation of the Washington Temperance Society; and that its formation cannot with truth or justice be attributed IN ANY MANNER to his influence or exertions, DIRECTLY OR INDIRECTLY.' So far as Elder Knapp is concerned, that must settle the matter forever.

Boston, Feb. 18, 1843.

Mr. JOHN HAWKINS,—DEAR SIR—I noticed in the Tetotaller of the 11th inst. an article which I think not only affects the credit of Elder Jacob Knapp, but calls in question your veracity.

The Tetotaller thinks it would be well for the friends of Mr. Knapp, in his absence, to make the requisite explanation.

The most important part of the article alluded to, is a certificate from the five survivors of the original six founders of the Washington Temperance Society; and the most important part of that certificate is the following sentence:

'Elder Jacob Knapp had no agency in the formation of the Washington Temperance Society, and its formation cannot, with truth and justice, be attributed in any manner to his influence or exertions, directly or INDIRECTLY.'

As a friend of Temperance and Religion, and anxious for the reputation of men devoted to these causes, allow me to ask whether you have ever made a contrary statement, and if so upon what authority.

'Honor to whom honor is due.'

Yours, respectfully. W. S. DAMRELL.

Boston, Feb. 18, 1843.

Mr. W. S. DAMRELL,—DEAR SIR—In answer to your note of this morning, I regret to say that Mr. Mitchell's letter, with the certificate, places me in an unpleasant position. I can give you the facts in the case, so far as I am concerned, and leave you and the public to judge.

In November, 1841, I visited Baltimore for the purpose of seeing my friends, and to bring my daughter Elizabeth to Boston.

I left Baltimore on the 8th of November.—Going to the cars with my daughter, we fell in company with Wm. K. Mitchell, one of the original founders named in the certificate, who stated to me of his own accord, that it was the Temperance sermon preached by Elder Knapp, that brought about this reform. This was the first intimation that I ever had that any such fact existed, to the best of my knowledge. Upon this authority, I made a public statement of it, upon my return—first in Providence, R. I., and again in the Rev. Mr. Stowe's church, in this city as well as elsewhere.

'I tell the truth—I lie not.'

Yours respectfully, JOHN H. W. HAWKINS.

Sectarism not Charity.

When Elder Knapp, the Baptist revivalist, was in Marblehead, the Baptist Society gave him, in one form and another, the sum of TWO HUNDRED DOLLARS, which he carried off out of the town with him.

Two or three weeks ago, a collection was taken up in all the Churches in that town, to aid the distressed families of several poor shipwrecked mariners, and this same Church and Society contributed the enormous sum of TWELVE DOLLARS.

Such are the fruits of the religion which flourishes under the preaching of Elder Knapp. He reaps the harvest—let the poor suffer.

Conference at Danvers.

A Union Conference Meeting will be holden in Danvers, New Mills, on Wednesday next, March 1st. It is a continuation of the series of meetings which have been holden in Marblehead, Danvers and Lynn. The brethren are desirous to have a good and profitable meeting; and they extend an invitation to all the brethren and sisters in the region round about to be present on that occasion. We have no doubt, should the weather be fair or foul, it will be a large and happy meeting.

Salem, Mass.

The good cause continues to progress in Salem and vicinity. At the last communion, 27 were added to the Church in that city; making an addition of 100 in the short time since Br. Everett has had the charge of the Society. We rejoice in these indications of spiritual growth among our beloved friends in that region. May the good work continue.

Br. Drew,

We shall publish that part of your article next week, which you have requested us to do, albeit you have taken good care to publish no part of ours. You ask of us, what you have not granted to us. But we will overlook that, and many things too which your article contains; and do as you desire.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Great Struggle in Danvers.

BR. WHITTEMORE,—In the last 'Zion's Advocate' there is a letter published from my Methodist brother Barras, descriptive of the wonderful works which have been done in Danvers this winter. Among other things he informs the public that 'efforts have been made to stop the work, but in the struggle between the priests of God and the priests of Baal, Elisha's God [I suppose he means Elijah's] hath triumphed, and salvation's chariot still is rolling onward. God speed the work.'

As to any efforts which have been made to 'stop the work' among the Methodists, perhaps he refers to his Orthodox or Baptist neighbors, as I have understood there has been some jealousies and heart-burnings between them. If not to these, I know not to whom he can in truth, allude. There are none others, to my knowledge, who have made efforts to 'stop the work' in the little Methodist Society here. I have heard that our Methodist friends have made strenuous efforts to get up an excitement by spreading their sails and catching a few of the last puffs of the Miller and Knapp whirlwinds, but that any body could try to 'stop the work,' seems almost impossible. People do not generally exert themselves to stop a work they deem unworthy a moment's notice. It requires but a small gust of wind to raise the dust in a dry time; and those who are in the midst of the whirl, may imagine for the moment, that the very foundations of the earth are being torn asunder. But when the brief commotion ceases, it is seen that the whirlwind has removed nothing but the lighter substances—the leaves and straws, which lie upon the surface—while every thing that possesses even a small amount of stability and strength, remains precisely as before. It is soon ascertained to be but 'a tempest in a tea-pot.'

I was not aware until I read this letter, that there had been such a war between the 'priests' in Danvers. It seems, however, that Br. Barras has been for sometime engaged in a tremendous struggle against 'the priests of God.' It is a good trait in him, I think, to acknowledge his defeat in this 'struggle,' so candidly and publicly. He does not even attempt to conceal it. 'In the strength,' he says, 'between the priests of God and the priests of Baal, Elijah's God hath triumphed.' Now this confession manifests true humility and lowly mindedness—it shows that he has no disposition to conceal his defeat by loud boasting and shouting! But I marvel he should have so readily and so openly described himself as a priest of Baal. Surely a man of his liberal and christian and charitable character, would not be guilty of calling his neighbors such hard names; hence he must, with all meekness, have alluded to himself and his brother ministers who have assisted him in his great 'struggle.' And, moreover, who can mistake the propriety of such an application of his remarks? The ancient priests of Baal were those who leaped on their altars—who put themselves in a great variety of postures, and went through many manœuvres and changing of places, in the worship—who cried aloud to their god, and shouted with great vociferation, from noon till sunset, and I have no doubt, in many instances, from sunset till midnight. If there are any modern priests of Baal, they must be those who conduct theirs in a similar manner, from day to day, and night to night, and week to week. This is an unavoidable conclusion.

Was their ever a coat that fitted its owner better? It is to be hoped that Br. Barras' defeat, so frankly acknowledged, will have a tendency to induce him to leave the ranks of the priests of Baal, as many of his ministering brethren have already done—or that at least it will convince him of the futility of ever again 'struggling' against the priests of the One true God.

The conclusion of his letter is literally true.—Elijah's God has triumphed! 'The chariot of salvation'—(not of endless damnation)—the chariot of a world's salvation, 'is still rolling onward,' in this town and the surrounding region, with a power never before witnessed. To which I would with him respond, 'God speed the work!'

Danvers, Feb. 11, 1843. J. M A.

Stafford, Jan. 30, 1843.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—At the request of the friends, I send you the following:—Died in Wales, Dec. 24, 1842, Mrs. PURBEY STOWELL, wife of Mr. Lewis Stowell, aged 24. Her funeral was attended in the Baptist Meeting-House by a large concourse of people, when the writer of this delivered an Address from these words:—'If a man die shall he live again?, And as he spake of the resurrection of the dead, some of the professedly pious ones mocked,* and others said, we will hear thee again touching this matter. In concluding our remarks, we spake something as follows: In the life and death of your departed companion, mother, sister, daughter and friend, you have seen an illustration of the nature and power of gospel faith. Religion with her was not a mere matter of form, of expediency, of worldly policy; but a fixed and an abiding principle of action. It consisted of an unwavering confidence in God, and a cheerful, voluntary obedience to his requirements. It was the union of faith and works, and it manifested itself in all the domestic and social relations of life. As a wife, she was confiding; as a parent, indulgent; as a sister, affectionate; as a child, obedient; as a friend, she was constant, and as a neighbor she was kind. In short, she lived the doctrine she professed. She was a Universalist in theory and in practice. She believed that God was kind to the evil and the unthankful; that he had compassion on the wayward and the wandering; that he would overcome all evil with good, and she was therefore guided by the law of kindness, and manifested its spirit in her intercourse with the world.

Such was the religion of her life. Did it fail to comfort and sustain her in the hours of sickness and death? Did she cast it aside when the destroying angel approached her? I tell you nay. It was then she cherished it most fondly.—It was then she felt its mighty power, and appreciated its true value. During her short illness, she repeatedly requested her companion to read to her from the Bible and the 'Universalist Magazine,' and the good news of salvation through the blood of the Lamb, was like cold water to the thirsty soul. It refreshed her drooping spirit, and buoyed her up amid her trials. And when the lamp of life burned but dimly, and its feeble blaze began to flicker in its socket, her faith grew stronger, and her hopes brighter, until she sweetly fell asleep in Jesus, to awake in his likeness on the morning of the resurrection. When told by her physician that she was dying, she said she was happy and willing to go. Death had no terrors for her. She feared not the gloom of the grave, and her exit from time, was a triumphant refutation of the oft repeated saying, 'Universalism will not do to die by.' It will do to die by, my friends, and it is the only system of faith under heaven that can give complete victory in the last, sad, trying moment.

I counsel you, therefore, to cherish this faith, to walk by its light, to live under its influence, and enjoy its reward. May the mourners, one and all, find comfort in all their afflictions from the consideration of a reunion with the departed in another and a better world.

WALDO LYON.

*The spirit manifested by the Rev. Mr. Cooper who took part in the services, has served to open the eyes of some to a sense of their duty. Yesterday I preached in Wales to a very respectable congregation, and our friends there are making an effort to have meetings one-fourth of the time the coming year. So true it is that the wrath of man shall praise the Lord.

General Intelligence.

Arrival of the Acadia. The Royal Mail steamship Acadia, Capt. Ryrie, arrived at her berth, East Boston, on Sunday morning about half past 10 o'clock, from Liverpool, having accomplished her passage in 14 days, including the detention at Halifax. She did not leave Liverpool until the 5th inst., being detained on account of the severity of the weather. She reached Halifax on the 17th inst., at 12 o'clock, noon, and left the same day at 4 P. M.

The Britania which sailed from this port on the first of January, arrived at Liverpool on the 16th.

The British Queen steamer was so much damaged on her last voyage from New York that the cost of repairing her will be very large.

Another fine steamship has been added to the Liverpool, Halifax and Boston line, called the Hibernia, and to be commanded by Capt. Judkins recently of the Columbia. She is 1250 tons burthen, and has engines of 350 horse power each. Her saloon on deck 40 feet by 19.

Com. Isaac Hull. This gallant officer and accomplished gentleman died in Philadelphia, on Monday evening, at five o'clock, after a severe but short illness. His many distinguished services in the cause of his country, his private virtues and christian character, are his best eulogy.

Wonderful Escape. In Cincinnati, on the evening of the 7th inst., at the close of the performances at the theatre, a man, supposed to be intoxicated, fell from the second tier of boxes into the pit, a height of about twenty feet, lighting on his head. He was considerably stunned, as might be supposed, but in a few minutes got upon his legs and walked off.

Novel. A steamboat is being built at New Castle, Del., by captain Robinson upon an entirely new plan. She is constructed without frame or timbers, being put together upon the principle of a hogshead, with iron hoops. She is 85 feet long, has 12 feet beam, guards included, 21 feet hold, and when ready, will not draw more than two and a half feet of water. The hooping does away with caulking, and having no frame, gives her more room and less weight, as well as being a great saving of timber and money.

Fire in Blackstone street. Between 12 and 1 o'clock this morning, a fire broke out in the grocery store of Messrs. More & Salisbury, 45 Blackstone street. The fire was extinguished without great damage to the building, but the goods were considerably damaged by the smoke and water. We learn that there was an insurance on both building and stock. The fire is supposed to have originated from the stove pipe.—Mail.

Fire in Millbury. The Boston and Millbury Singletary factory with all its machinery, &c., was destroyed by fire on Tuesday night. The progress of the flames was so extremely rapid, none of the contents, except a small quantity of wool, which was stored in one end of it, were saved. The loss is estimated at $20,000, and is covered by insurance in Worcester. It is not known how the fire originated.—Post.

The East Boston Ferry Company have built a new slip for their boats on this side of the water. It is on the same wharf as the new depot of the railroad company. In a short time the old slip will be altogether abandoned—it is used now only for the railroad ferry boat. From present appearances it cannot be long before the new depot will be ready for use. There are two slips on this wharf, so that the East Boston ferry boats and the railroad boats are entirely independent of each other.—Journal.

A new microscope has been exhibited at the Polytechnic Institution, the powers of which are said to surpass all previous instruments. It consists of six powers. The second magnifies the wings of a locust to twenty-seven feet in length. The fourth the sting of the bee to twenty-seven feet. By the sixth, each lens in the eye of a fly is so magnified, that it appears to be fourteen inches in diameter; and a human hair, 13 inches in diameter, or 4 feet in circumference.

A Profitable Cow. One of the cows at the State Lunatic Hospital has given this year, one thousand and thirteen gallons of milk. The account has been kept by the farmer of the establishment, Capt. Chaffin. One other cow is estimated to have done as well, and a third has fallen but little short of the other two. The cows are of common breeds, purchased of farmers in this town. The milk of the one cow at four cents a quart would be worth $162,08. The keeping costs about $75.—Worcester Spy.

Melancholy Suicide. We learn from the Mail, that Mr. Oriok, a highly respectable citizen of Roxbury, committed suicide yesterday, by hanging himself in the upper story of his house, having first tied his hands together with a handkerchief. The cause is supposed to have been reverses in business. He was for many years a merchant in India street, in this city. He left some writing, addressed 'To the Mother of his Children,' in which he detailed very minutely the causes that conduced to this act. He was 42 years of age, and has left a wife and six children.

Dreadful Mortality. Letters received in this city from the Sandwich Islands, overland to the 30th of Oct., state that the Captain and six seamen of the whaling ship George, of New Bedford had died of scurvy, and not one of the survivors was able to manage the helm. They had tried to reach the harbor of Honolulu—but could go no further than to make the island, when some of the Missionaries went on board and anchored the ship. The mate had since died.

We learn from the New Bedford Mercury, of this morning, that as soon as the intelligence reached Honolulu, Capt. Cash, late of ship Jefferson, of Nantucket, with Dr. Hood, and a party of seamen, were despatched to render assistance, and the George was taken into the harbor of Honolulu on the first of November. The crew were all removed on shore, and would probably recover.

The ship was refitting and would be sent home in charge of Capt. Cash. She had 1400 barrels of oil, and would take sperm oil on freight for home.—Transcript.

Singular Case. The National Intelligencer of yesterday says that the Supreme Court of the United States was to be occupied that day with the case of Jewell vs. Jewell, from South Carolina, which involves a question of marriage between a Catholic woman and a Jew, who, after living fifteen years together, and bearing eight children, separated, and Jewell married a Jewess and died intestate, leaving two families. The contest is which is legitimate? The parties are highly respectable, and the event of the suit momentous. The legal records of valid marriage will be discussed. The Attorney General and Mr. Coxe for the appellants, and Mr. Hunt, of Charleston for the defendant.

The Humane Society of Massachusetts have awarded gold medals to Joseph Marshall, of Patch's Beach, Ipswich, and to T. S. Greenwood of the same town, in testimony of the exertions of each, whereby the lives of the survivors from the wreck of the schr. Deposit, on Lakeman's Ledge, were preserved when in imminent danger on the 23d of December, 1839. This award, so justly deserved, would probably have been made at an earlier day, had the circumstances of the case been made known to the Society.

By the death of Bishop Griswold, the Eastern Diocese is dissolved. Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, will hereafter constitute three Dioceses. The Episcopal Church in each of these States must now choose a Bishop for itself or request a neighboring Diocese to excercise episcopal supervision over the same.—Prov. Chronicle

Avalanche, or Sand Slide—Twenty-five or thirty persons buried in the ruins. The Albany mail of Saturday evening brought an account of a horrid catastrophe, which has swept into eternity twenty-five or thirty human beings! About 5 o'clock on Friday afternoon, in the city of Troy, N. Y., a sand slide took place from a hill situated in the southwest part of the city, known by the name of Mt. Ida, and elevated about 70 feet above the Hudson. Eight or ten houses were crushed in the mass of earth. It is supposed that some thirty or forty persons were in the houses at the time, only twelve of whom had at 6 o'clock that evening been extricated—five of these were dead, and the remaining seven were expected to recover. The whole extent of the disaster is at present impossible to calculate. Had this avalanche occurred during the night, the destruction of life would undoubtedly been much greater as many of the male occupants of the houses were absent at their daily labor. So sudden was the slide that a countryman who was passing with a load of wood had but just time to jump off, when his horses, sled and all, were buried beneath a mass of earth. The poor countryman proved to be a Millerite, and when out of harm's way, threw up his hands, exclaiming, 'The end is coming,' and ran hurriedly away. The scene is represented as one of horror and desolation—women mourning over the loss of their children, and digging frantically round the spot where their houses and their all is buried. Thousands were almost immediately gathered around the scene of destruction, and a corps of efficient men are engaged in digging for those who are missing, and clearing away the fragments of the destroyed buildings.

The driver of the Troy stage reports that the avalanche covered over four acres of land—that a woman who came out of her house to see what the matter was, instantly returned to get her child, and before she had time to escape, the woman and her child were buried under the earth—but was afterwards dug out alive with her child.

It is stated that since the recent earthquake, a large whirlpool has been formed in the Mississippi river, fifteen hundred miles below St. Louis.

Counterfeit threes, upon the 'Eastern Bank, Bangor,' are in circulation.

The Legislature of Missouri have passed a law, which has been approved by the Governor, totally abolishing imprisonment for debt.

A slight shock of an earthquake was experienced in Washington on Wednesday, about 20 minutes past 10 o'clock, P.M.

Strafford Quarterly Conference.

The next session of this body will be holden on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (1st and 2d) of March, at the new Meeting-House on LEE PARADE, N. H.

At the request of the brethren, there will be religious services at the above place, the evening previous, (Tuesday,) at 6 o'clock.

Friends from abroad will call on Br. Nicholas D. Meserve, on Lee Parade,—Josiah Bartlett, Esq., at the Hook,—or, Gardner Towle, Esq., Wadley's Falls, for directions.

A general invitation is extended to all of like precious faith, and others, to come up and sit with us 'in heavenly places.' To the ministering brethren, a particular request is made.

The friends in Lee are very desirous of greeting a large number of the good and true. What say! shall we have a real gospel season of refreshing? Come one—come ALL who can. E. FRANCIS, Clerk.

In Pottsville, Pa. Rev. Abel C. Thomas, late pastor of the 2d Universalist Society in Lowell, to Miss Mary Louisa Palmer.

DIED:

In this city, Mr. Thomas P. Clark, 54. Elijah Williams, Esq. 69.

In Cambridgeport, Feb. 10th, Mrs. Dorothy Osgood, aged 62, formerly of Saco, Me.

In Stow, Mr. Asa Goodrich, aged 32.

In Harvard, Harriet C. daughter of Mr. Willard Dickinson, aged 11 years.

In Marlboro', Feb. 21, Mrs. HANNAH, wife of Rev. Jacob Baker, aged 28. In recording this death the mind of the writer runs back, by an irresistible prompting, to the more youthful days of the deceased when in the midst of life's young joys, her thoughts were turned heavenward, and she was induced to choose that better part which could not be taken away. When in the days of her girlhood she connected herself with the Church of Christ, confessing him the seat of God to be the Saviour of the world. Then, she had embraced those principles which gave character to her after life, and made her, as she eminently was, respected and beloved by all who knew her. And for the influence of the gospel of Jesus, as exemplified in her character, the heart rises in devout gratitude to God.

Mrs. Baker was a UNIVERSALIST; and her life most beautifully reflected the spirit of her religion, wherever she moved. No ostentation or desire of display marked her course. But a meek and quiet spirit, breathing kindness and good will to all, was in her whole career. And although to speak of her as she was, may to those who were unacquainted with her seem eulogy, yet the simple truth is, that she so lived, that neither jealousy, envy, slander nor suspicion ever breathed upon her name. It is less than a year since Mrs. B. was called to follow her father to the grave. And it was by discharging the duties of filial affection, in watching incessantly over him in his last sickness, that she imbibed, or at least quickened that fatal disease, under which, from the midst of scenes full of pleasing promise and anticipation she has gone down early to the grave. But though she has left us thus early, she has gone in quiet submission to the will of God, imparting to her surviving friends a lesson of the value of our holy faith, which our souls would ever heed. By that faith, the usually startling spectacle of death's approach, rose into a scene of moral beauty and sublimity which could scarcely have failed to inspire the witnesses with the sentiment uttered by the disciple on the mount of transfiguration, 'It is good for us to be here.' For when the cold hand was upon her heart, and the death-film had well-nigh veiled all mortal scenes from her vision—when she knew that a few, faint pulsations and her heart should beat no more, so full was her soul, with that peaceful triumph her religion gave, that, with the last faint whisperings of affection's lip, she urged her husband to sing the praises of God, that her soul might as it were rise on the pinions of holy song to the light and the joy of heaven.

Mrs. Baker has left a husband in the bitterness of bereavement, with a little son who as yet knows not the loss which has befallen it; besides a widowed mother, numerous brothers and sisters, and a very large circle of friends to whom she was endeared, to mourn her departure from their midst. But they will be consoled by the blessed promise which the gospel gives, while faith assures a happy meeting beyond death's dark dominion, where God's salvation reigneth, and the smile of His countenance is the soul's light and joy forevermore. T. J. G.

In Lancaster, Mrs. NANCY, wife of Mr. J. W. Damon, aged 30 years. It may justly be said of Mrs. D. that she lived, and died a christian. Possessing a mild, benevolent and amiable disposition, she was universally esteemed and beloved by her acquaintances. Her last sickness, though attended with much suffering, was endured without a murmur or complaint. About thirty minutes before she breathed her last, she called to her bed side, her husband and her mother (all the near relatives then present) and bid them an affectionate farewell. She conversed particularly with her husband for a number of minutes, exhorting him to be reconciled to the bereavement which he must shortly experience, and to bear with resignation the trials which he would be called to endure. She said she believed she should be happy, and should meet all her friends again in a better world. She then very affectionately commended her infant babe to the care of her mother, expressing a desire that it might still enjoy the kindness of maternal love. During all these trying scenes, she manifested the most perfect composure of mind, and in a few moments after bidding farewell to her friends, she calmly resigned her spirit into the hands of her Redeemer, and fell asleep to awake in a better world. May this severe affliction be sanctified to the bereaved family and friends, and may the same gospel truths which imparted consolation to the subject of this notice in her last moments, be their comfort and support. J. H.

In Provincetown, Jan. 20, Mrs. SALLY DUNHAM, aged 52, wife of Mr. Nathan Dunham. It is truly a source of joy and consolation to every christian believer, when their friends are called away to the immortal world by the king of terrors, to have them bid adieu to the fading objects of this transitory state, triumphing and rejoicing in the blessed hope of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world. Such was the happy lot of sister Dunham, the subject of this notice. Her disease was consumption; and though, during the latter part of her sickness she was weak in the flesh, yet she was strong in the spirit, and firm in the faith of the salvation of all mankind from sin, fully persuaded that what God had promised, he was able also to perform. She of served to the writer of this notice, but a short time before her departure, that she had not a doubt on this subject. She said that she was now fully satisfied. The next time I visited her, she gave me a short account of her experience. She had been a believer in the doctrine of endless misery till within about eight years, when she became a firm believer in the blessed truth, that God is the Saviour of all men, and connected herself with the Universalist church in this place. And it is justly due to our departed sister to say, that she adorned the doctrine which she so much loved in life, and which gave so great joy in death, with a well ordered life and godly conversation. The next time I enjoyed the privilege of conversing with her on the subject of religion, her strength had so far failed, that she was unable to converse but little—but what she did say, was the expression of joy and peace. 'O,' said she, 'this room is a heaven to me! how happy I am! all is peace!' How true is the sentiment expressed in the words of the Poet:

'Jesus can make a dying bed
Feel soft as down pillows are,
While on his breast I lean my head,
And breath my life out sweetly there.'

Such was the happy condition of sister D., in her last moments. She had the Saviour to lean her head upon. She knew that her Redeemer liveth—and as he lived, she knew that she should live in him. She felt that it would be far better for her to depart and be with Christ,—that to die was to exchange the sorrows of earth for a glorious immortality. She died in the blessed faith of the gospel—in the firm belief of the salvation of the world through Jesus Christ, who is the resurrection and the life. And now she is where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest. We truly mourn the loss of so bright an example of christian piety, but we know that what is our loss is her gain. Husband, mourn not as those who have no hope, concerning thy companion who has fallen asleep. Children weep not for thy dear mother, for she has gone home, and you will meet her again to part no more forever. H. P. S.

EIGHT DOLLARS PER DOZEN!

The cheapest Book of Psalmody sold in Boston.

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, THIRD EDITION. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by THOMAS WHITTEMORE, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 300 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of SHORT ANTHEMS, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universalist Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Lang, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the LESSONS or RUDIMENTS, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

DEAR SIR,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

JOTHAM S. FRENCH.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

'GOSPEL HARMONIST.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

BELLS, CLOCKS, ORGANS, GEORGE H. HOLBROOK, East Medway, Mass. manufacture, CHURCH BELLS, CHURCH CLOCKS and CHURCH ORGANS.

Holbrook's BELLS are well known. It is the general testimony of those who are judges, and who have had opportunities of forming an opinion, that his Bells are the best which are manufactured in the United States, both for strength and brilliancy of tone. The best Bells in Boston, New York, and other great cities, are from Holbrook's Foundry.

Mr. Holbrook's CLOCKS are well known. There are probably a greater number of tower Clocks in Massachusetts manufactured by him, than any other man. He has facilities for manufacture, which enable him not only to make good Clocks, but to undersell all other manufacturers. These are the causes of the great number he has sold.

His ORGANS may be judged of by the Organ at the Marlboro' Chapel, which is from his manufacture.

The public are assured that it will be for their interest to call, if they wish to purchase either Bells, Clocks or Organs.

LINES

On the death of LUMAN M. son of Mr. Luman Barnard.

Is that voice of music silenced,
Are those charms forever fled?
And is our beloved Luman,
Number'd with the silent dead?
Yes, that sparkling eye has faded,
And his form is prostrate now,
Death has set his fearful signet
On his fair and lovely brow.

He to weeping friends and kindred
Now has bid a long adieu;
But O, fond and doting parents,
Sorrow heaviest falls on you!
In thy memory stricken mother
That last kiss will treasured be,
And his last and flattering accents,
Which expressed his love for thee.

Mourn not that he early left you,
That his journey soon was o'er,
That the heart which beat so lightly,
Soon was doomed to beat no more;
He has left a world of sorrow
For a land of heavenly rest;
Where no pain or grief or anguish,
Never can disturb his breast. S. E.

Religion.

What a sublime system is Religion. It embraces all that is valuable to man in the whole course of his journey on earth. It unites him by indissoluble links to the invisible Deity, and presents to his glowing imagination the prospect of an endless futurity of life, glory and felicity. There is not a moral feeling, or duty, or affection which it does not engender. It is the sum of all excellence. It exhibits the perfect unbounded love of God, operating in all His works and commands us to be perfect as he is perfect. Religion is heaven's sweetest gift to mortal man. It soothes, it inspires the soul, it calms all the tumultuous passions. It enters the heart and engenders the finest emotions and thrills upon every chord. Hope, friendship and affection gather from her more ardour and obtain from her store-house holier links to the charms which they entwine around the heart. It gives to oblivion our troubles, and begets a joyfulness in our woes. We admire it in the fulness of prosperity—in adversity it will sooth us still. It is a sunbeam on our path, a cordial in our cup, an exotic plant of bliss blooming in our midst, a celestial pinion vouchsafed us to refresh our minds by enabling us to soar away to a purer element—that our upward tending spirits may not always be doomed to couple with the low wants and evanescent joys of earth.

I have said that religion is a sublime system. It comes from God and reveals his character, his will and dispensation; his truth and grace. It comes to teach man to improve his faculties, his relations, his duties, and his ultimate destiny. Man without religion wanders through the world solitary and forlorn. All around him and all within him is gloomy and mysterious. In religion he finds an instructer, guide and companion. She unrols to his view the volume of nature; displays the chain of cause, opens the book of life and discourses of that great First Cause whom to know is life eternal. Religion not only reveals the true character of God, but she tells us that man is the child of supreme unchangable regard—the destined heir of immortality. She teaches us to behold in all the friends who are united by the ties of nature, the impress of filial regard—to acknowledge in every human countenance a brother whose interest she bids us respect and cherish, and whom it is our duty and privilege to love.—Religion is of God: a heavenly thought. It will support us in the hour of dissolving nature. If our hopes rest on him, we need not fear that hour, mournful and impressive as are the circumstances connected with it.—We can even rejoice in its near approach; for 'death is but an angel of mercy sent to convey us to heavenly abodes,' and we only leave a world of sorrow for one of bliss. We exchange the gloom of earth, for the glory of heaven: cease from time to exist in eternity. It is true we must part with those we love, but we shall meet them again on yonder banks of deliverance, clothed in angelic beauty, with crowns of never fading splendour, to unite in ceaseless praises, free from sickness, free from pain and disease, to spend an eternity with those shining ones above with harps and robes like theirs. A Page from Reflection.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 5. How sad and how solemn is this afternoon! The snow is descending thick and fast. The cold wind howls abroad; and gloom thickens around me. I am confined to my chamber by sickness; but my mind wanders to a scene far away, where the last funeral rites are being performed, over the remains of a beloved, and long cherished friend. . . . . It is half past three. Before this, the cold clod has rattled upon the coffin of the beloved one, and the snow has whitened her new made grave. Yes, she is taken from the home of her childhood, and is received into the bosom of her mother earth, and the pure snow lies gently upon her resting place, a fit emblem of her innocence and purity.

Although she is gone hence to be here no more, her many and endearing virtues will be long cherished by her youthful husband and numerous friends. When the first agony of grief has subsided, and religion sheds its soothing influence upon the mind, how sweet will be the remembrance of all that was good and lovely in the departed one! Every kind action, affectionate look, and heart-felt word, is treasured up in the memory of the survivor. And how cheering the thought that we can turn from the gloom of the grave, from earth and its sorrows, to 'that bright world beyond our own,' and there contemplate her enfranchised spirit in the abodes of bliss.—There the eye of faith is directed to a reunion with those who have gone before us; where the ties of love and friendship shall not be severed. And the little time of our sojourning here is rendered hallowed by the blissful thought—'we meet again!'

Revolutionary Anecdotes.

It will be remembered that a reward of 500*l.* was offered for the head of John Hancock.—When he signed the declaration of Independence, he did it with a bold hand, in a conspicuous manner, and rose from his seat, pointing to it, and exclaimed, 'There John Bull can read my name without spectacles, he may double his reward, and I put him at defiance.'

When I visited Mr. Adams in November, 1818, his hand trembled similar to that of Stephen Hopkins, the Quaker patriot from Rhode Island, who had been afflicted with a paralytic stroke. Mr. Adams acted as his amanuensis, and asked him if he should sign his name to the Declaration of Independence for him. 'No! I will sign it myself—if we are hung for signing it, you shall not be hung for it for me.'

Mr. Adams, then in imitation of Hopkins, took his pen, clasped his wrist with his left hand, went through the tremulous motion of signing his name, and in the language of Hopkins, emphatically said, 'If my hand trembles, John Bull will find my heart won't!' which Mr. Adams said electrified all Congress, and made the most timid firm in their purpose.—Advertiser.

A page from my Experience.

BY REV. C. F. LEFEVRE.

It was my good fortune on my entrance into the faith of Universal Salvation, to have an occular demonstration of the falsity of those objections which have since been so often obtruded upon me. I was told that in uniting myself with that denomination, I should be excluding myself from the worthy and respectable part of the community, and this was urged upon me as a very convincing argument to deter me from proclaiming what my conscience told me was the truth. But this advice came too late to affect me, for I had already proved its falseness. The particulars I will now narrate.

When I was ordained in England in the Episcopal Church, and for some time after I had taken possession of my parish in Canada, I knew little of Universalism as a doctrine, and still less of its professors as a denomination. I am not aware that I had ever heard the word used. I had once in my life attended service in a Universalist Church.—It was the one in which Mr. Mitchell officiated in Duane Street, New York. I was staying at the house of a friend in that city who went to that Church, and I was inquired of, when Sabbath morning came, to what Church I wished to go. I replied that I was myself a member of the Episcopal Church, but being, in a measure, a stranger in the city, I should be happy to accompany him. He expressed himself gratified with my ready compliance and accordingly I took a seat in his pew. This was more than twenty years ago and during Mr. Mitchell's palmy days. I cannot now remember the subject of the discourse, but it could not have touched on doctrine, for I thought all the time that I was worshipping in an Orthodox congregation.—I recollect, however, enough to know that I was well pleased with the sentiments expressed, and the elevated morality inculcated.—The audience was rather large than otherwise, very respectable in appearance, and apparently very attentive and interested in the services. My friend inquired of me how I liked the minister and the sermon, and I expressed myself well pleased. I never inquired of him, and he never informed me, to what kind of preaching I had been listening. I only knew that it was a dissenter's, a name which in England is applied to all who do not conform to the established Church; but whether Presbyterian, a Methodist, a Baptist, I knew not, and cared as little. One thing I did know, that the gentleman with whom I went was a highly respectable and valued citizen, and the congregation apparently as much so as any I had seen in New York. This was the first and indeed the last Universalist sermon that I ever heard till I preached the doctrine myself.

The first time that I heard any thing about Universalism was from a clergyman of the Church of England who said that he believed that doctrine. Some clerical business called me to Quebec, and I was, during my stay, introduced to the clergy of that city. At the house of the Bishop I met with the assistant Arch-deacon, who officiated in the Cathedral, who expressed a wish to visit the part of the country in which I resided, and, if feasible, to obtain a Church in my vicinity. I informed him that there would probably be a vacancy in a parish about sixteen miles from my residence, and, if agreeable, I should be pleased with his company on my return. He accepted the invitation, and took a seat in my sleigh. It was during this journey that he unfolded to me his view of the mystery of God's will, 'that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he would gather together in one all things in Christ.' I was immeasurably surprised at such a faith, and more so from its coming from such a source. I thought a good deal of this conversation, but 'I kept all these things in my heart.' On my arriving at the place of my residence, my friend found a letter which had been dispatched from Quebec, announcing the death of his father-in-law, and further stating that by immediate application he might succeed to his living and Church in Prince Edward's island, for he too was a clergyman. My travelling companion, therefore, immediately returned, and I have neither seen him nor heard of him from that day to the present. Here, then, was a very valuable and respectable clergyman of the Church, an avowed believer in that doctrine.

This short conversation made a deep impression on my mind, and although nothing of an argumentative turn had been given to the subject, I did not fail, when by myself, to submit to the process of objection. On the simple principles of reason I was not satisfied with any objection that I could raise. There was no possible way in which I could bring one that did not in opposing Universalism, as plainly oppose the attributes which are by common consent given to the Deity. But the Scriptures taught that some of the human family must dwell in endless sin and suffering, and that at once destroyed the doctrine of the salvation of the world. I know not how long I rested contented with this reasoning, but the thought was continually pressing me, whether the Scriptures could reveal any thing in the government of the Deity, which was subversive of his attributes. Here was a fresh difficulty, and I went very patiently to work to see what the Scriptures did teach. I was astonished to find so much which I had hitherto received as unquestionable evidence of the endless misery of some, although inadequate to sustain that sentiment when it came to be fairly weighed in the balance of the sanctuary. With the exception of two or three parables and some highly figuratively language in the book of Revelations, I could not place my finger on one single passage that I would dare to risk in controversy in opposition to this sentiment. This was a sad disappointment to me, for I anticipated no difficulty in demolishing Universalism with such weapons as the Scriptures furnished. I had, therefore, to content myself by inferring the doctrine of endless misery from parabolic language.

At this stage of my experience there were several things which occurred tending to loosen those chains which held me in bondage, for I am free to confess that I grasped with the tenacity of a death-grasp the tenets in which I had been educated. A somewhat critical examination of my Greek Testament very much weakened my confidence in certain words to which I had given a positive and absolute sense, but which they did not of necessity require, for I could not but discover that the very same words, in other passages, had an indefinite meaning. I refer especially to the original word rendered forever, everlasting, eternal, &c., in the common version of the Testament. Time and again did I go over these passages, hoping to fix the meaning of an absolute eternity to them; but it would not do. It was very evident to my mind that it was not the word but the subject to which the word was applied that must determine its duration.

There was a clergyman residing about fifty miles from me, who had not yet received Priest's orders, and consequently could not administer the communion, and he sent to me to discharge that office for him. I complied with his wish, and during my sojourn at his house, on looking over his library one morning, I observed a small book entitled, as nearly as I can remember, 'Prophecies fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem.' I took it down and as it was a short treatise, in two or three hours I had finished the perusal of it. I was much staggered at its contents. I saw plain enough that those tremendous threatenings, which I had been instructed to carry into another world, were of a peculiar character, applied to a peculiar people, applied under peculiar circumstances, and that they had their complete fulfilment, to the very letter, during that age. I pointed this out to my brother clergyman, and expressed to him my conviction of the impropriety of giving these passages a meaning which they did not actually warrant. He replied that he knew that they were not of themselves sufficient to establish the doctrine generally taught from them, but it was most prudent to let them pass unexplained, and be received in their current acceptation. I did not pursue the conversation any further, but I was pretty well confirmed in the belief, that I was not the only one of the party who doubted the supposed Orthodox doctrine of endless misery.

I had by this time got pretty far into the subject of Universalism. I had reasoned upon it; I had tested it by Scripture, and at every fresh aspect in which I placed it, it commended itself more and more to my judgment as well as to my better feelings. As yet I had said nothing to my brother clergymen, for I began to feel what would come upon me, if I were only suspected of heresy. I had, however, arrived at that point when it was impossible for me to repress my thoughts; I felt as if there were an inward flame that would consume me, if I had not given it vent; 'So the fire kindled and at last I spake with my tongue.' I took occasion one day, while in the house of a clergyman much my senior in years, to make known to him the difficulties which for so long a time had perplexed my mind. He was quite alarmed at the annuciation, but I found the subject was by no means new to him. He had once grappled with a Universalist, and had been so much worsted in the encounter, that he ever afterwards carefully avoided all controversy with those of that faith. I found in proposing my difficulties to this gentleman, that he could not 'answer one in a thousand.' But if he could not enlighten me, he could exhort me and advise me, which he did in good earnest, making very clear to my mind the certain ruin that must overtake myself and family, and the injury the Church would sustain in that section of the country, if I should openly espouse such a sentiment. As it was not advice but information that I wanted, I gained nothing by this interview, except an hostility on his part, which he afterwards exhibited in no unequivocal manner. My application to my other brethren in the ministry was equally unsuccessful, though it was not followed by the same enmity.

And here I cannot but remark, that very many in the Church expressed no surprize at my believing this doctrine, but only indignation because I had the hardihood to preach it. I might have continued in the Church to this day, and have been known as cherishing this hope, if I would only have consented to have kept it to myself. How many there are in all congregations who secretly believe in the final recovery of the whole family of man from sin and misery, is known only to the Searcher of hearts, but if my congregation was a fair sample of others, the number cannot be very small.

A circumstance took place about this time, which entirely settled the business in my mind. It was quite an opportune occurrence. A gentleman residing in New York city, now a much esteemed friend of mine, though at that time entirely unknown to me, had a brother residing in my parish. He was a Methodist, and much wedded to his opinions. His brother in New York sent him 'Balfour's Second Inquiry.' It came by mail and the postage if I remember rightly, was one dollar and a quarter. At all events, on account of the expense, for money was very scarce in that new country, this individual declined taking it out of the office, thinking perhaps that the perusal would scarcely repay him. One day I observed this book lying among the letters, and inquired of the Postmaster to whom it belonged. He gave me the desired information, and at the same time stated the reason of its lying in the office. I next looked into the book itself, and the latter part contained, what I had so long wished to see, viz, a treatise on those passages of Scripture in which the terms eternal, everlasting, forever, &c. occur. The next time I saw the owner of the book, which was not long, for I lost no time in finding him, I made the following bargain with him—that I should pay the postage and read the book, that he should also read it himself, and if he wished, then to come into possession of it, he could do so. I had now obtained such help as was not only satisfactory, but rendered me much more than a match for those who contested the question with me. I showed this book to a clergyman who lived in the next parish to my own.—He read it and returned it to me saying 'that it was the most dangerous work he had ever read.' I asked him if he could controvert the statements. He confessed his inability to do so, but added, that he had gone on his knees and prayed to God that he might never believe them. This brother became a very bitter opposer of mine and said many hard things against me. The clergyman who succeeded me in my living called on me in New York, some years since, and among other news, informed me that my old antagonist had himself left the Church, and was then at the head of a congregation of Irvingites in King-ton, U. C. He said that he had expressed his remorse at the unjust persecution he had manifested towards me.

Being by this time pretty well grounded in the faith, I made no scruple in preaching the 'common salvation.' It made no small stir in that quiet village and in 'the regions round about,' but the church was better filled than before, and, I believe better than it has ever been since. I was not long suffered no difficulty in demolishing Universalism with such weapons as the Scriptures furnished. I had, therefore, to content myself by inferring the doctrine of endless misery from parabolic language.

At this stage of my experience there were several things which occurred tending to loosen those chains which held me in bondage, for I am free to confess that I grasped with the tenacity of a death-grasp the tenets in which I had been educated. As yet I had said nothing to my brother clergymen, for I began to feel what would come upon me, if I were only suspected of heresy. I had, however, arrived at that point when it was impossible for me to repress my thoughts; I felt as if there were an inward flame that would consume me, if I had not given it vent; 'So the fire kindled and at last I spake with my tongue.' I took occasion one day, while in the house of a clergyman much my senior in years, to make known to him the difficulties which for so long a time had perplexed my mind. He was quite alarmed at the annuciation, but I found the subject was by no means new to him. He had once grappled with a Universalist, and had been so much worsted in the encounter, that he ever afterwards carefully avoided all controversy with those of that faith. I found in proposing my difficulties to this gentleman, that he could not 'answer one in a thousand.' But if he could not enlighten me, he could exhort me and advise me, which he did in good earnest, making very clear to my mind the certain ruin that must overtake myself and family, and the injury the Church would sustain in that section of the country, if I should openly espouse such a sentiment. As it was not advice but information that I wanted, I gained nothing by this interview, except an hostility on his part, which he afterwards exhibited in no unequivocal manner. My application to my other brethren in the ministry was equally unsuccessful, though it was not followed by the same enmity.

And here I cannot but remark, that very many in the Church expressed no surprize at my believing this doctrine, but only indignation because I had the hardihood to preach it. I might have continued in the Church to this day, and have been known as cherishing this hope, if I would only have consented to have kept it to myself. How many there are in all congregations who secretly believe in the final recovery of the whole family of man from sin and misery, is known only to the Searcher of hearts, but if my congregation was a fair sample of others, the number cannot be very small.

A circumstance took place about this time, which entirely settled the business in my mind. It was quite an opportune occurrence. A gentleman residing in New York city, now a much esteemed friend of mine, though at that time entirely unknown to me, had a brother residing in my parish. He was a Methodist, and much wedded to his opinions. His brother in New York sent him 'Balfour's Second Inquiry.' It came by mail and the postage if I remember rightly, was one dollar and a quarter. At all events, on account of the expense, for money was very scarce in that new country, this individual declined taking it out of the office, thinking perhaps that the perusal would scarcely repay him. One day I observed this book lying among the letters, and inquired of the Postmaster to whom it belonged. He gave me the desired information, and at the same time stated the reason of its lying in the office. I next looked into the book itself, and the latter part contained, what I had so long wished to see, viz, a treatise on those passages of Scripture in which the terms eternal, everlasting, forever, &c. occur. The next time I saw the owner of the book, which was not long, for I lost no time in finding him, I made the following bargain with him—that I should pay the postage and read the book, that he should also read it himself, and if he wished, then to come into possession of it, he could do so. I had now obtained such help as was not only satisfactory, but rendered me much more than a match for those who contested the question with me. I showed this book to a clergyman who lived in the next parish to my own.—He read it and returned it to me saying 'that it was the most dangerous work he had ever read.' I asked him if he could controvert the statements. He confessed his inability to do so, but added, that he had gone on his knees and prayed to God that he might never believe them. This brother became a very bitter opposer of mine and said many hard things against me. The clergyman who succeeded me in my living called on me in New York, some years since, and among other news, informed me that my old antagonist had himself left the Church, and was then at the head of a congregation of Irvingites in King-ton, U. C. He said that he had expressed his remorse at the unjust persecution he had manifested towards me.

Being by this time pretty well grounded in the faith, I made no scruple in preaching the 'common salvation.' It made no small stir in that quiet village and in 'the regions round about,' but the church was better filled than before, and, I believe better than it has ever been since. I was not long suffered to remain in the humble capacity of a 'travelling missionary' in the woods of Canada. He never married, but devoted all his funds to the upbuilding of the church in the Provinces.

There were certain facts connected with my renunciation which may not be uninteresting to the reader, and which at once relieved me from the apprehension that those who embraced this doctrine were less respectable than others in the christian community. In the first place, then, I found that there were those in the church, holding the first place in the ministry, who in heart believed the sentiment if they did not make a public profession of it in the pulpit. But I had no sooner plainly divulged my sentiments to my congregation, that I discovered a very large proportion of the same way of thinking. And what were the characters and standing of these persons? Were they the refuse of the congregation?—No, they were the most influential of the citizens—the men most respected in the community and even in the church itself. I found them among my vestry and wardens. On the score then of respectability, I was perfectly satisfied.

I had now every needed evidence that I could require to decide that a christian and virtuous life was quite compatible with a belief in Universalism. Indeed those of my own society who confessed that sentiments, were not only the most exemplary but the most active in the church itself. Before leaving the Province, I was permitted to see that it was as comforting in death as it was salutary in life. There came one day to my house a very venerable old man verging on to ninety years. He was originally from one of the eastern states, and had been among the first hearers of Murray. He had heard of my conversion to the faith in which he trusted, and he had come to talk with me. He said that he had nearly finished his pilgrimage on earth and was waiting for the summons that should call him home. He left me strengthened in the faith, and not a little zealous to communicate to others the consolations of the same blessed hope. In a very few days I was called upon to see this aged man expire.—Calm and peaceful was his end, full of faith, hope and charity, and I said in my heart, if this is the way in which the Universalist dies, 'let me die that death and my latter end be like his.' From that hour to the present moment, I have never had the 'shade of shadow' of a doubt as to the truth of the doctrine. I have never in the reading of the various controversies which I have met with on the subject since leaving the Provinces, found stronger objections against this blessed truth than those which I propounded to myself and answered to my conscience before I renounced my former belief. I have seen, it is true many witicisms and quibbles and sophisms, but nothing that could move a serious and reflecting mind. Nor do I expect ever to receive in my heart the belief of endless misery for any of my brethren in the flesh, unless my mind should by some unhappy and unavoidable influence become so perverted that it will 'call evil good, and bitter sweet.'

Capital Punishment.

We have thought for some time past, of preparing a few short articles on the subject of capital punishment. It is scarcely necessary to say which side of the question we shall take. If we are guided by the spirit of our faith or Christianity, there is but one side we can take; and that is the side opposed to all retaliating, unmerciful and useless punishment, to all suffering that has not good in view, and a reasonable probability of reaching that good.

The subject of taking life by law is beginning to attract attention, and to move the public mind in all parts of our land. The philanthropic and humane, the true Christian and true man, are begining every where to question whether this dark frowning Moloch of the barbarous age of our race, shall be allowed any longer to lift its huge and awful form into the calm bright heavens. It is beginning to be seriously questioned whether, in its present advanced and Christianized state, society shall suffer the blood baptized altar of this savage god, to stand any longer in its midst; and whether the ferocious priest of the Past, with his face hypocritically turned heavenward, and his soul quick with the spirit of hell, shall be permitted any longer to minister there unmolested, and daily, with dripping knife, to do his accursed work of human sacrifice. Every where we say, this has got to be a matter of serious thought and inquiry; and we would not be idle; but would do what we may to further the good work of purging our statute book of this foul stain of cruelty and barbarism.

In touching the subject, we shall first consider some of the arguments used by the advocates of this punishment, for its justice and necessity.

1. The first argument for the infliction of capital punishment is drawn from what is supposed to be the sanction of the Bible. It is well known that great account is made of the passage in Genesis ix. 6, 'Whoso shedeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.'

In the very first outset, we might question the interpretation put upon this language, and demand the proof that this is a command.—Can it not be shown that this sort of speech is prophetical, so to speak, rather than imperative? The expression 'shall' or 'shall be' is abundantly employed as simply setting forth what will come to pass, as declarative of events that will happen, without the slighest intimation of a command, or of the excercise of authority. In John viii. Jesus says, 'When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am He,' &c. This is not a command, but a statement of what would come to pass. So in Matt. xxiii., Christ says, 'nation shall rise against nation;' 'they shall deliver you up and shall kill you.' So also in chapter xxv., he says to his disciples, 'ye shall be offended because of me this night;' and to Peter, 'before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me.' It would be absurd to contend that in these expressions there is a command, and yet why not as well as in the words of the review, 'Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.' There is not a particle of proof in the words themselves, that it is a command; but they seem to be only a declaration of what would be likely to occur, under the circumstances of the world; a statement of the fact, that, if a man destoyed the life of his fellow, he would have his own destroyed in like manner. This has been verified in the past, as our present discussion shows.

But allowing the common view of the passage to be correct; allowing also that the law of Moses recognizes the doctrine of capital punishment, as it certainly does—what then? The law of Moses is not our law. The old dispensation enjoins many things that we are under no obligation to observe. And this is practically admitted by those who contend for the punishment of death. Hence this argument from the Bible, or the law of Moses proves too much.

If we are to make the mosaic laws and institutions our guide; or if they are binding upon us, why then, we must observe them all for we have no power to select such as we choose to obey, and reject the rest. The code of Moses is either in force, or it is not. If it be, and the argument for punishment by death be good, then we must follow it out, and not only give life for life, but an eye for an eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, and foot for foot. These have all the same sanction with that of life.

But worse than this, if we are to be governed by these passages so as to feel justified in the infliction of capital punishment for murder, why not inflict it in every case provided by the same law? If there be any obligation to observe this because it is commanded in the law of Moses, then there is equal obligation to observe all the other examples of punishment by death. There were not less than 13 offences punishable with death under the Jewish law—Murder; Crime against nature; Kidnapping; Smiting father or mother; cursing them; Witchcraft; kindling of fire on the Sabbath; gathering of sticks, or performing any kind of work on that day; &c. Now if the argument is good in one case, it is in all, and there is the same power, obligation and justice in putting the man to death who gathers sticks on the sabbath, that there is for putting the murderer to death; so far as the Bible is concerned.

Is it not absurd then, to attempt to justify the barbarous custom of legalized murder, by an appeal to institutions which by the same rule sanction what those who make the appeal shrink from with horror? Let it therefore be borne in mind by the advocates of capital punishment, that the argument drawn from the Bible proves altogether too much, and that in adopting it they must, to be consistent, insist upon its infliction in every case provided for in the Mosaic code—for kidnapping, for adultery, for filial disobedience, kindling a fire on the sabbath, gathering sticks, &c.

Again; suppose we admit that in the time of Moses it might have been possibly necessary to inflict the punishment of death among a people so rude and savage; yet this admission will by no means justify its infliction now or prove its necessity. Every thing is changed; the whole face of society, and its internal organization are revolutionized, and have become more cultivated, softened, and merciful. Of course with this change in the feelings, habits, and manners of mankind, there must come a corresponding change in their laws and institutions. What might have been a necessary statute thousands of years ago, may have become exceedingly prejudicial in this age, and in the present improved state of society and civil government. Other and better ways may be devised for affecting the desired object, and should therefore be adopted—so that if we allow the necessity of capital punishment to have existed ages since, it is no argument to prove the necessity now.

The correctness of this position is confirmed by the character of the Christian religion itself. No one who is acquainted with the records of the law and the gospel, can fail to perceive that the Christian dispensation thro' out relaxes, and removes the sternness, retaliation, and sanguinary severity of the former. 'The principles of morality inculcated by Moses, continue to be inforced with even greater strictness, but the terrible severity provided for the infraction of these moral rules is no where sanctioned by the religion of Jesus Christ.' There is plain proof that Christianity is designed to abolish and take the place of the law dispensation, which was designed only as a temporary institution fitted to the rude and animal state of society existing at the time of its creation; while the gospel is expressly designed to elevate and purify mankind, to raise them from this state of degradation; and it is therefore addressed to the higher powers of their nature, and makes its appeals to the moral and intellectual faculties.

The spirit of retaliation and revenge acknowledged by the law of Moses, is emphatically denounced by Christ, and rejected from his religion. Ye have heard that it hath been said an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, but I say unto you resist not evil.' Here the very spirit and essence of this portion of the Mosaic law is denied outright by the founder of the Christian religion! How strange, how injudicious, then, for his professed followers to attempt to renew it, to justify the punishment of death by appealing to that law which he has so openly denounced. If they will turn Jews at once, the argument would have some propriety at least, if not force; but in the mouth of Christians it is surely out of place. Thus much for the Bible argument of capital punishment, and we trust it will be seen that it can not be urged with any reason or weight in the question; and that those who employ it are entitled to all the absurdities and horors which it involves.—Star and Palladium. T. B. T.

EVERY THREATENING EXPLAINED. Universalists all know the importance of a right understanding of those parts of Scripture, commonly designated by the term THREATENINGS. Although such passages are relied on by many to disprove the doctrine of Universalism, it is well known, that, when understood according to their original intent, they furnish not the slightest evidence against that doctrine, but rather the contrary. All that is necessary to do, to convince men of this, is to persuade them to examine, without prejudice, the arguments which have been advanced on these subjects. There are two works which are particularly designed to throw light on this class of passages.

THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM, after having given a very brief history of Universalism, —and stated the opinions entertained by Universalists, and the Scriptural arguments adduced by them to support those opinions, takes up and explains the passages which have been used to sustain the doctrine of endless misery.—In the course of the examination of these texts, the following subjects are explained:

Lowest hell.	Worm dieth not.
Perish forever.	Damned.
Day of wrath.	All likewise perish.
Wicked turned into hell.	Rich Man and Lazarus.
Fire and brimstone.	Cannot see God.
Everlasting burnings.	Shall not see life.
Everlasting contempt.	Wrath of God.
Burned, root and branch.	Resurrection of damnation.
Wrath to come.	Die in your sins.
Unquenchable fire.	Pray not for the world.
Hell fire.	Son of perdition.
Strait and narrow way.	What must I do to be saved?
Outer darkness.	Judgment to come.
Day of judgment.	Anathema Maranatha.
Destroy soul and body.	Judgment seat of Christ.
Sin against Holy Ghost.	Everlasting destruction.
End of the world.	After this the judgment.
Furnace of fire.	Fearful judgment.
Lose his own soul.	Better resurrection.
Shall not enter heaven.	God is a consuming fire.
Without wed. garment.	Sin unto death.
Damnation of hell.	Judgment of the great day.
Ten virgins.	Vengeance of eternal fire.
Sheep and Goats.	Second death.
Everlasting punishment.	Lake of fire and brimstone.
Judas.	Smoke ascendeth forever.
Eternal damnation.	Unjust be unjust still.
Fire never quenched.

PAIGE'S SELECTIONS, takes up all these subjects from the New Testament, and explains them in the language of the Orthodox Commentators themselves.—That work consists of 'selections' from the most learned of the Orthodox Commentators, which show that they in their wisdom and honesty, in former times, explained the most of these subjects, almost precisely as Universalists now do.

In this view, the 'Plain Guide' and 'Paige's Selections, are companions to each other; they furnish a large amount of valuable criticism on the subjects above named.

PRACTICAL AND EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the following new and excellent work—'Practical and Experimental Religion; or the Teachings and Tendencies of Universalism. Designed as a Companion to the 'Christian Comforter.' By HENRY BACON.' Read this book and learn the moral power of Universalism. 'It is good to live by, and it is good to die by.' Price 50 cents.

THAYER'S BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT. THIRD EDITION. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT, OR SCRIPTURAL GUIDE FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, being sketches of the Antiquities, Customs and Manners of the Jews, in illustration of Scripture, designed for the use of Teachers, Bible Classes and the Higher Classes in Sunday Schools.' By Rev. THOMAS B. THAYER, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Lowell, Mass. This book is on a new plan, suggested to its author by his experience in conducting Sunday Schools and Bible Classes. It is not a book of questions merely; but each chapter consists of two parts,—1st. The history to which the questions refer is succinctly given, which is to be faithfully studied, and 2d. The Questions. We have examined this work, and commend it; but any formal commendation is rendered quite unnecessary by the well known reputation of its author.

Price 25 cents single, $2,50 per dozen.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LIBRARY BOOKS. An assortment of SUNDAY SCHOOL LIBRARY BOOKS, is kept constantly for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill. All the CLASS BOOKS used in our Schools, are also kept for the accommodation of customers. These Books will be sold at the lowest cash prices. MILLER'S THEORY REFUTED. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'END OF THE WORLD,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

BOOK OF PROMISES. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. BULFINCH EMMONS. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

Price of the work 25 cents. 125 pages.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE PARABLES. TENTH EDITION. For sale at this Office, the work entitled 'NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PARABLES OF THE NEW-TESTAMENT, arranged according to the time in which they were spoken. By THOMAS WHITTEMORE.' 352 pages large 12mo at the low price of 75 cents per copy. Twenty per cent discount by the dozen. All the parables of the New Testament are explained at length in this work, and illustrated by appeals to the sacred Scriptures. Particular attention has been paid to those parables which have been used to prove the doctrine of future endless misery; and extracts are given from Orthodox Commentators, of great respectability, to show that they have explained them as Universalists now do.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

SERMON III.

BY REV. EDWIN H. CHAPIN, OF CHARLESTOWN.

Capital Punishment opposed by Christian Philosophy.

'For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them.'—Luke ix. 56.

I deduce from these words of our Saviour, this fact—that Christianity is not a destructive, nor peculiarly a retributive system; but that it is an up-building, a conservative, a restorative system. In this light I propose to examine the institution of Capital Punishment, in this my last discourse upon the subject.—Thus far we have examined the strongest grounds of the defenders of this penalty.—We have taken the negative, in endeavoring to refute their arguments adduced to prove the necessity and expediency of Capital Punishment' by showing that it is unnecessary and inexpedient. We shall, upon the present occasion, carry our opposition to Capital Punishment, so to speak, into the camp of its advocates; by showing that it is opposed by Christian Philosophy.

It is hardly necessary for us to premise that we do not dogmatically assume our notions of Christian Philosophy to be correct. But this we do assume, and facts authorize us to take for granted, that our views of Christian Philosophy are the views practically taken by the best philanthropists, in the best movements of the age. This Philosophy supplies the premises of the Peace-advocate and the Temperance-man, and the Prison-discipline Reformer. This Philosophy is what all Christians claim as belonging in a peculiar manner to Christianity. This Philosophy is that which says that revenge is an unholy passion, and that to save life is better than to kill, and that to raise up and restore is better than to crush and denounce—that love is a mightier agent than terror—that every man has a soul which is more precious than wealth or bodily circumstances, that all men are equal, that they are children of One Great Father, and that mercy is better than sacrifice. This Philosophy, I say, is practically admitted by all philanthropists of our day—it is the Philosophy that has given an impulse to the most successful and widely prevalent reforms—and it is seen and admitted by all sects, except when some theological dispute intervenes, or some peculiar institution is attacked. With this Philosophy as a test, then, I proceed to examine the institution of Capital Punishment.

I. I remark that Capital Punishment is opposed by Christian Philosophy, because Capital Punishment includes the sentiment of revenge. We have already examined the arguments that are brought to its support upon the grounds of its alleged necessity, or expediency. Many, doubtless, uphold it—some, because they verily believe it to be a command of God—some, because they think that the protection of individuals and of society demands it—some, because they believe it is a salutary and effectual preventive of increase of crime. Many uphold it, no doubt, from one, or from all these considerations. And I would not say that they wish a criminal to be hung, from the dictate of mere revenge.—This would be judging the motives of men who are in most things benevolent and merciful. But this I do say—that the sentiment of revenge will be found in this penalty, and that men, unconsciously perhaps, often give heed to it. We all know how hard it is to avoid returning blow for blow. When the cheek aches with pain, and tingles with shame, there rushes up in us an almost irresistible impulse to give back the stroke.—That is the feeling that sways us in the moment of excitement. If we pause awhile, and coolly reflect, it is quite likely that we shall not return the blow. But why is this?—With what new consideration has reason supplied us, that we smite not back? With this consideration—that a return of the blow will not make our pain any the less—that it will not benefit us—that it will not benefit the offender; and that, by reciprocating the foul act we place ourselves upon a par with him. But mankind at large do not reason so, any more than the man who strikes back in the moment of anger—from the simple cause that men scarcely reason upon the point at all. Nine men out of ten will say, if the man first struck should strike back, that he did right. It is a sentiment as old as human nature, and as prevalent as the race. Peter thought just so when he cut off the right ear of Malchus, and James and John acted under its influence when they wished to call down fire from heaven. The best men in the world feel it, and can hardly get rid of it. If they do not strike back, they would be gratified to see their foe pitch headlong. The old grudge lies in the heart like lead, and they cannot repress a feeling of satisfaction, if they hear that the man who has injured them has come to some hurt. Deep and fiery is this sentiment, running all through society, woven into the very fibres of our nature, burning in our bones, even when we light up the smile of forgiveness, and stretch out the open hand of reconciliation.

And this very sentiment, I say, lies at the foundation of the penalty of hanging, and, unconsciously perhaps, stirs in the bosom of him who wishes to have a man hung. Let us see if it is not so. After you are convinced that Capital Punishment is unnecessary and inexpedient, does there not remain in your heart a feeling something similar to that with which you regard the act of him who has returned blow for blow? That is, a feeling that as the murderer has killed a man it is right that he should be killed in return.—Vague this feeling may be—weakened perhaps—but still do you not find it there, spontaneously intruding itself, spontaneously urging the propriety of paying the aggressor in kind? I think this feeling will be found in many bosoms. But, when you coolly reason upon this feeling, you will perceive that it only urges the law of retaliation—blow for blow, wound for wound, stripe for stripe.—This is revenge—an unholy feeling—it is condemned by Christ. This sentiment is often excited by eloquent appeals—but it is the old feeling still. We are pointed to the slain man, taken away, perhaps, in his very usefulness and prime of life—a man of probity and benevolence, of industry and piety; and then we are referred to the murderer, a coarse and brutal man, dangerous and blood-thirsty; we are referred to the bereaved and destitute wife of the slain—to his little, unprotected children; and it is asked—ought not a man who has done as that murderer has, who has removed from society one of its most valuable members, and deprived a wife of her companion and children of their guide, ought not he to be hung—ought not the severest penalty to be inflicted upon him? Here you see, is still the old principle of retaliation—blow for blow—a severe evil ought to be inflicted, in return for a severe evil committed. No higher consideration is brought into view, than this one—how shall that evil be avenged? But the moment we come to reason upon the subject, we ask ourselves—Can the death of the murderer bring back the slain to life? can it give to that broken-hearted wife her husband? to those unprotected children their father? No: it can do none of these things.—Of what use is it then? Capital Punishment is unnecessary, it is inexpedient, it cannot restore the lost; of what possible use is it then? I answer—it gratifies the sentiment of revenge.

Now, my friends, when we find that this sentiment affects even those who admit that Capital Punishment is unnecessary and inexpedient; must we not suppose that it exerts its proportion of influence upon those who believe that this penalty is necessary, is expedient? And may it not be one strong motive that urges them to cling with such tenacity to Capital Punishment—imagining that all their zeal springs from high moral considerations, from a tenderness for the welfare of society, and an elevated, abstract love of justice? I verily believe, if they were to analyze their feelings, they would find that revenge has a deeper hold upon their decision in this matter, than they will admit, or than they are aware of. And we, who believe it to be unnecessary and inexpedient, condemn Capital Punishment because it excites and gratifies this feeling of revenge; because it is borne up on the current of the same old feeling that gives blow for blow.

But now let us look at this penalty as a legal appointment—as a manifestation of the legislative wisdom that ordains it. We place the execution of penalties in the hand of a feigned personality that we call the Law—or of a personified attribute that we term Justice. Society does not allow each man to decide upon the amount of his individual wrongs—to inflict the fine, the imprisonment and the death, by his own hands. The passions of men, considered individually, cannot be trusted. There must be an executive personality, that shall rise above partialities and interests, and appoint the penalty and wield the punishment, with a cool brain, and a steady, impassionate hand. This executive personality is the creation of society—it is made by the voices of men in a collective capacity, apart from individual interests, in moments of reason, of obedience to duty, of as clear perception as circumstances will admit, of the eternal distinction between right and wrong. It is the only way, undoubtedly, that anything like justice can be administered, or the individual interests of man as a member of the great whole of society, and with due consideration for the welfare of that great whole, can be secured. It often does effectually what the single hand could not do, and generally awards such a sentence as not only the injured, not only the unoffending, but as the reason and conscience of the criminal himself must approve. Far be it from me to say that Government is, of itself, a wrong; or that the hand of the law, which, while it swiftly punishes the offender, in the very act sustains the welfare of the whole, far be it from me to say that that is a tyrant's hand—that the right thus to act is an usurped right! But this I do say—that Governments are fallible, and that human laws do not proceed directly from Infinite wisdom but from finite wisdom, and as such bear the imperfections and the errors of the finite. Those who uphold Justice in society, as an immaculate thing, that cannot err, that sits serene and impassionate upon her tribunal, and metes out her penalties as the dictates of the eternally Good and Right and True; forget that justice is not an actual personality, but a fictitious representative of the best wisdom of the human minds of the age, or the country. But everything having its origin in humanity, is liable to partake of the imperfections of humanity. The justice of any age, although it may be more impartial and calm than individuals are likely to be, is still but an expression of the opinions and ideas of that age.—The penalty that executes for treason, is a representation of the opinions of men concerning the magnitude of the crime of treason. The penalty that hung witches was an exhibition of Puritan opinion. The penalty that burnt Latimer was a manifestation of the opinions of his age concerning heresy. And the penalty in our day that hangs for murder is a declaration of the opinions of men in our day concerning murder. What follows, then? That the same idea may lie at the foundation of a law that lies at the foundation of the decisions which men make as individuals—the same idea as that which is the sentiment of those who commend him who gives blow for blow. The sentiment of revenge, so prevalent in individual bosoms, is very likely to be found in the penalties created by society, which is composed of individuals. Therefore, as this idea of taking life for life is so prevalent with individuals, it is natural that should influence them when they come to affix the penalty to the crime of murder. It behooves us, then, to ask if the principle of revenge is not in that penalty. Is it solely a high, moral decision? No; it sanctifies the very passion that leads to one half the murders in the land. It gives blow for blow, wound for wound, stripe for stripe. It is not necessary to take life in order to protect society, imprisonment will do as well—but in the law is comprehended the idea, that, because life has been taken by a murderer the life of the murderer must be taken also. It is not expedient to hang the criminal, but life has been taken and life alone can pay the forfeit. Is not this, I ask, the very principle of offsetting one evil against another? Is it not a manifestation of that spirit, somewhat purified yet still existing, that sends a stroke in anger back for the stroke that has been given?

I find Capital Punishment not only unnecessary and inexpedient, then, but I find in it the principle of revenge. And this principle is notoriously condemned by Christian Philosophy. Christ forbade retaliation. He did not forbid punishment, but he forbade the infliction of an evil merely as an offset for an evil, without any other end, or for that end at all. You may secure and punish the man who has struck you, but you are not to strike him just because he struck you! You may endeavor to recover your property of a man who has feloniously taken it, but you are not to injure him just because he has injured you! You may inflict punishment on the man who has committed murder, but you are not to take his life just because he has taken another man's life. Revenge is an unholy sentiment, whether it burns in the individual bosom, or flames out in the sword of the magistrate—whether it clenches the hand, or rears the gibbet—whether it urges the wild Indian to hunt his victim's track like a sloth-hound, or excites the stormy multitude to clamor for the murderer's death. I do not doubt that the penalty has been devised by wise men, and by good men. I do not doubt that it is thought necessary and expedient.—But I have examined the arguments for necessity and for expediency. And when I have weighed them, and rejected them, I find remaining another argument for the penalty of death, not uttered with the lips perhaps, not distinctly avowed, but lying deep in the passions of the human heart and transfered to the law. And this sentiment of revenge, I say, is worse in the law than it is in the individual bosom. In the law we expect to find a more elevated sentiment, a more rational measure of right and wrong, a more dispassionate judgment, than in the heart of the man who is tried by every-day temptations, and balanced between conflicting interests, and moving constantly in excitement. Therefore, I lift up my voice against this sentiment as found in the law, even more strongly than when I find it among individuals. It is a bad passion—prevalent to an awful extent in the world. By it the injured man drives his hot dagger into the heart of his oppressor. By it Lynch-law hideously apes Justice, and acts the magistrate with the fury of a fiend. By it the crimsoned duellist sets up his code, and sprinkles with the blood of his victim the sacred principle of honor.' By it wars are kept in existence. War—what is this, but 'a great national Capital Punishment?' An insult has been given—it must be paid back. The Nation's honor is at stake—let it speak for itself in iron-death-shot, and rapine, and flame.—Let it press on with its awful retribution, grinding the bones of its victims, treading out the fires of beautiful homes, and offering its dripping holocausts to Moloch and to Satan. Must not an evil given be paid by evil in return?

Thus, then, I am anxious that this penalty of life for life should be abolished, because it maintains and sanctifies a bad principle. I know not when that principle shall be eradicated from the human heart. But this I know—that so long as it exists in the highest moral expression of society—in its laws—it must be expected to live in individual bosoms, and to produce its legitimate fruits in the world. Remember, law-makers, that Christ's religion gives not blow for blow.—Remember, that while it approves of restraining sin, it does not approve of inflicting evil for evil's sake. Remember that the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them.

II. Capital Punishment is opposed by Christian Philosophy, because this penalty defeats the true end of punishment. I can but touch here upon a topic that, of itself, might well employ a discourse, or a series of discourses. In the matter of punishment, it would seem, two parties come in—society, and the offender against its peace. All will agree, that to each of these punishment has its application; for society it is a protector, for the criminal it is a minister of justice. But when it has discharged its duty to society, society can claim no more of it. If it protects society that is all that society has a right to demand.—We have already shown that society can be as well, yea, and better protected by other penalties than by that of death. The punishment of death, then, is not required for the protection of society. What then? Shall it exist merely as a retaliatory measure? In this light, we have already shown at some length, it sanctifies the principle of revenge—a principle emphatically condemned by Christianity. Why should it exist then? Merely to inflict evil upon the criminal? What good is gained thereby? Verily, none at all. It is the most worthless thing in the world, merely to inflict punishment as punishment; merely to inflict pain as an end. It does no one any good. It benefits nothing. Every one will see, then, that Capital Punishment is utterly useless for any of the offices of punishment. It is no peculiar protection to society. It is wrong so far as it is a mere principle of revenge; and if its infliction of pain is all that distinguishes it, the infliction of mere pain as pain, is a useless and wanton cruelty, producing no good result, and having no end beyond it. I say, then, that in so far as we all agree concerning the objects of punishment, Capital Punishment has nothing to distinguish it as being better, or as being as good as other penalties. It cannot protect society any better; it has no more salutary effect in its function as a minister of justice.

But I wish to go further than this, and consider punishment as to its true definition.—What are the true ends of punishment?—'The intent of punishment,' says Beccaria, 'is not to torment a sensible being, nor to undo a crime already committed. . . . . The end of punishment is no other than to prevent the criminal from doing further injury to society, and to prevent others from committing the like offence.' 'The essence of crime,' says Roscoe,* 'is that it introduces a certain degree of pain, or evil into the world. The immediate effect of punishment is to introduce another degree of pain, or evil, often much greater than the first. Simply to punish, is therefore to add to the miseries of the human race. If no beneficial alteration be effected, either in the disposition of the person punished, or on society at large, the punishment is a mere act of retribution, or revenge. Punishment, strictly speaking, is therefore only allowable as a medium of reformation to reclaim the offender, and secure society from further injury; and the degree of it must depend, not altogether on the nature of the offence, but on the necessity of employing such a medium. . . . . Instead, therefore, of connecting the ideas of crime and punishment, we ought rather to place together the ideas of crime and reformation; considering punishment as only one of the modes for effecting reformation, the extent of which must always be proportioned to the necessity of the case.'

*In his Penal Jurisprudence.

Punishment, then, is not a mere executor of evil—is not a mere protector of society; it is also, as is said in the passage just quoted, a mean of reformation. This, I may say, is its chief end. I do not say that it is its only end, for, I repeat, it is to be a protector of society. Nor do I say that true punishment will not have any evil in it. It must be of such a nature as that it shall be felt to be the consequence of transgression—a bitter consequence—a consequence which must ever attach to a like transgression. But the greatest end is reached if it make a man feel the intrinsic wrong of his crime, and the degradation he has brought upon himself. 'Violent punishments,' says Burgh,* 'become familiar and are despised—a people are to be led like rational creatures, not to be driven like brutes. The severest punishment under a mild administration, would be to convince the offender that he has committed a foul crime.'—Nay, we may say, my friends, that the accumulation of goad upon the head of an offender, if it convince him of the baseness of his offences and make him sick of them, that accumulation of good would, in such a case, be a punishment. It is not the severity of a punishment that secures its efficacy, it is the power which it has to bring a man to a sense of the intrinsic evil of his wrong-doing. This is the great end and the real efficacy of punishment—to make a man detest and renounce his iniquity. And all the while there should be kept in sight another principle—reformation. As Mr. Roscoe says, 'Instead of connecting the ideas of crime and punishment, we should place together the ideas of crime and reformation.' Crime is the actual state of the offender—reformation is the desired state. Society being protected, the great work of legislation should be to bring about reformation in the criminal. It is plain, that punishment that is employed as an end—as an infliction of evil, and nothing else—never can prevent crime. You must go deeper. You must alter the disposition of the criminal—you must bring moral motives to bear upon him—you must learn him the intrinsic evil of his crimes—you must set before him the intrinsic good of virtue, and induce him to accept it. Then your end is reached. He will commit no more crimes. You have not only deprived him of the power to commit crimes, you have taken from him the disposition—a far safer guarantee. Now, you may put men in the stocks, and tie them to the whipping-post, and burn their foreheads, and crop their ears—and it is all useless, and worse than useless. It is cruelty wasted upon man—a creature of reason and of moral capabilities—treated like a dog, or a horse. You have not taught him any intrinsic difference between right and wrong—you have not excited in him any disposition for virtue—you have whipped him, or branded him, and turned him loose upon society, with no feeling concerning his guilt save that it may bring pain upon him, and no reverence for the law—but instead, spite and revenge. And if he can only get rid of being caught, and whipped or burned again, he will pursue his evil ways with as much relish as ever. We take criminals and put them in prison. Our aim does not seem to be the apportionment of such a penalty as shall suit the disposition and circumstances of the criminal, and tend to wean him from his propensity. No: we assign so heavy a penalty for so heavy a crime, and when the criminal has worked out his term of years, whether reformed or not, turn him loose again; not realizing the fact that a good disposition is a better security from crime than locks and prison-labor, and that if we have aimed at nothing but inflicting retribution, the time and the expence have been worse than half lost.

*As quoted by Roscoe.

Here, then, is the great end to which punishment should lead—reformation. It should be of such a nature as to associate in the criminal's mind, degradation with vice and crime, and as to incite to the love and the embracing of virtue. This will remove crime—the mere infliction of pain only hurts criminals. The true idea of punishment, makes not so much account of the severity of punishment, as it does of its efficacy to heal the malady of guilt. It presumes that a prisoner may be well-fed, comfortably-clothed, and decently lodged, and the true ends of punishment secured thereby, much better than they are secured by whipping, and chains, and tortures.

This, then, I say, seems to be the true end of criminal punishment. It is the end contemplated by Christian Philosophy. This aims not merely to inflict pain—not to give evil for evil; but to reform, to develope, to restore. Its very end is to heal the sick—the morally diseased. It aims to seek and to save the lost. It is plain, then, that any system that thwarts this end is opposed by Christian Philosophy. And I maintain that Capital Punishment thwarts this end. This rests upon the old idea of inflicting pain as an end, of employing punishment as mere punishment. It has, virtually, no end in view. It is an end itself. It aims not to work the reformation, but to secure the death of the guilty. It does not remove crime, it only removes the criminal.

I know what will be said, in reply to this. It will be said that 'the expectation of such a terrible doom is calculated to work a most salutary reformation. The criminal under sentence of death, is led to repentance and to the renunciation of sin.' But, if so, for what end? If that reformation to which he has been led under sentence of death, be a radical and sincere one, why then deprive him of life? He is just fitted to act in life, for some of life's noblest ends. You say that he is sincerely and radically reformed. In the spirit of mercy, then, I ask, why deprive him of his life? Plainly, because you regard his punishment as an end, and not as a mean. But, you say, 'we are fallible, and cannot tell whether he has reformed in the depths of his soul, or not, because we cannot pierce to the motives.' True, my friends, we cannot tell! But reason is as much against the probability of a true reformation, as for it. The man is surrounded with unnatural circumstances—terror, remorse, grief, agitate and rend him. The aspect of that black and fearful death is ever before him. The hope of pardon, if he is penitent, excites him. Friends plead with him. Good men urge him. He hears the whispers of the jailors—he sees the staring eyes of curious people—he catches the sound of the hammers at work upon his gibbet—he confesses, he kneels, he prays—strange thoughts rush over him, he is not himself; at least he is not in the ordinary circumstance of mortals. His hour comes—and, amid the very echoes of his last prayer, he dies by his own hands, his self-inflicted wound reproving with its bloody lips the expression of his tongue. Such a case has happened before now. And whatever may be the end, I ask, are not the agitation and extraordinary nature of the last scenes of the felon's life unfavorable to the reformation of which we have been speaking—the deep-seated, vigorous reformation that christian principle builds up in the ruined and unclean soul. I do not say that Capital Punishment never excites to penitence—I believe it may have done so. But I also believe that many of its supposed reformations are spurious—and I know that from the nature of things, it can not produce the reformation that Christianity aims at even in the hearts of the most abandoned. To say the most for it—so far as the reformation was produced under a mere fear of death, it is very doubtful—and it if was produced by the labor and assiduity of Religious Teachers, it was not the penalty that acted efficiently in the case, but the teachings, which may be given under other and more favorable circumstances. And if it be the object of Capital Punishment to reform men, why not place all criminals under its doom, if it is thus efficient? But it is not its chief object to reform men—if they are reformed, this end comes in only incidentally—the chief end of Capital Punishment is to inflict retribution. It is not used as a mean, but as an end. And what shall we say for all the scoffers, the blasphemers, the men who have cursed on the very gibbet, and died with oaths strangling in their mouths. Was it the object of Capital Punishment to reform these? Why enforce it if it did not accomplish its end? But, I repeat, reformation is not the chief object of Capital Punishment. It is not used as a mean, but as an end, and thus thwarts the true design of punishment, and therefore is opposed by Christian Philosophy.

III. Capital Punishment is opposed by Christian Philosophy, because of the position which that Philosophy occupies in regard to the best movements, and the truest reforms of the age. I wish under this head to vindicate myself, and those with whom I take my stand in this matter of Capital Punishment, from misconstruction and misrepresentation. In the van of all our philanthropic endeavors is Christianity. That seems to have risen upon men of this age with new life and power—or rather, in men a new life and power have been kindled, by that which has ever been life-giving and powerful. The ideas of men in our time are beginning to be enlarged by universality and depth. We see them discarding narrow and selfish notions, and looking abroad for the good of the race. We see them piercing below the wrong act to the wrong motive, and, still deeper, to the cause. The great doctrine of human brotherhood is circulating through the souls of men, and quickening into being strong endeavors for human meliorntion. The efficacy of love over fear, of willing obedience over constrained service, of kindness over severity, of good over evil, has been tested. Men see something in man worth preserving, worth living for, capable of being raised from ruin, disease and sin, and made virtuous and happy. I say, these ideas and these principles are beginning to be common in our day, and are producing vast and beneficial results. Our's is not merely an age of triumph in physical machinery—it is an age of intense moral effort, of genuine and wide-spread philanthropy. We must say this, admitting as we do much evil, and folly, and fanaticism. And who doubts, as he examines, that all these broad ideas and all these mighty principles, have their home in the bosom of Christianity? Who does not see their beautiful accordance with the teachings that Jesus breathed nineteen hundred years ago, amid the sneers of Jewish bigotry and the clash of Roman war? Who does not see that Christ's Religion is not a destructive but a saving religion—that it is not a severe and partial and formal system, but one whose great element is love, whose labor is for the suffering and oppressed and the castaway? I say, who does not feel this in the very depths of his soul, whatever his creed or his party? We know, we must know, that Christianity is the prime-agent of all these good and beautiful and triumphant efforts of philanthropy and brotherly zeal. This, then, I say, is the position which Christianity occupies, and in that position it condemns Capital Punishment. That penalty has no accordance with the best spirit of the age. It is a bloody relic of those times when men were persecuted for opinion's sake, and burnt for heresy, and drawn and quartered for treason. It is a relic of those times when the maniac was whipped and starved, and the harder the prisoner's bed, and the worse his food, the better punishment was it. It is a relic of those days when men labored not to restore, but to punish, not to raise up but to trample under foot, not to remove crime, but to hurt the criminal. And those who uphold it now, (I speak with all respect) are of the same class as those who upheld burning for heresy, and flogging for insanity. Had they lived back in those ages, that would have been their stand. They are in advance of those views, not because they have moved upon the earth, but because the earth has moved and carried them with it. I speak thus, my friends, for this reason. These men often indulge in hard names, and impute wrong motives of action. Let an effort be made for reform, and they cry out—'disorganization and ruin.' They do so in regard to those who labor for the abolition of Capital Punishment. They call them enemies of law and order—men who sink justice in mercy—men who would unhinge society—men who pity the criminal more than the injured—men who attack the very buttresses and foundations of Religion—men who are moved by morbid feeling, and not by genuine philanthropy. Now it has perhaps always been the case, in every age, that hard names and false motives have been imputed to men who labored for reform. But all this is not argument, and cannot resist fact. Therefore, every true Reform has gone on, and these men have been forced along with it. 'Infidel' and 'Heretic' are mere names, and threadbare at that. But it is the veriest jargon in the world, this volley of epithets that is let loose by some upon those who do not interpret Scripture, or who do not reason as they do. Men are called Infidel, or lax in their reverence for the Bible, because they do not construe the text—'Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed,' to mean that all murderers shall be executed, or because they say that the mandate, if it be one, has no binding authority for this age and dispensation. But the conclusion does not follow, any more than it follows that men are Infidels because they say that the text—'This is my body,' is not to be taken literally. What Protestant heeds being called an Infidel for that? I object, then, to this liberal circulation of the term Infidel.—I am assured that men who render the text alluded to, in a manner different from the advocates of Capital Punishment, have as much reverence for the word of God and for religion, as they. Nay, I am not sure but their love for Christianity and for pure religion is even more intense, and that it is for this reason that they labor with the text. They look upon Christianity, especially since it has shone forth as it does upon the present age, and see its great principles, its true motives, its broad and merciful ideas; and they cannot think that it was meant that the gibbet should stand through all time, and that as an arbitrary penalty, in utter contradiction to the spirit of love, in utter discordance with facts, Capital Punishment is to be executed everywhere, and upon all murderers. For this they may be called Infidels, but they cannot falsify their convictions.

But the friends of the abolition of Capital Punishment are called disorganizers, men lax about justice, and order, and law. But why is this? What proof is exhibited? Because men wish to purify the law, does it prove that they are enemies to all law? Because they wish to make punishment more effectual, is it an evidence of their desire to abolish all punishment? The truth is, men are too easily alarmed. They fancy if the ground whereon they stand is taken from beneath their feet, they shall find no other place in the universe to rest upon, and that the universe itself will soon be dissolved. Let them not be afraid. The universe will stand, and God's truth will stand, and all that is true and right will stand. But all that is false, will be shaken, and must fall. In every age it has been so. For the most abominable evils there have been advocates, and when these evils were attacked, they cried out, 'the whole frame-work of society is falling—we are running into anarchy and licentiousness!' It is a common saying that 'we have fallen upon evil times.' But this has always been said, whenever and wherever men have thought and acted for themselves. There is always enough evil in the world to be attacked, when men do thus think and act. And frequently, the agitation that to these alarmists looks like anarchy and licentiousness, is the very agitation of healthful, vigorous life. It has its abuses, like all things, but also its great and beneficial uses. It is not the result of this new dogma, or that new notion. It is not the effect of transcendentalism, or infidelity, or heresy. It is the legitimate result of republicanism and of protestantism. Those who will go away back, and stand upon the premises of the divine right of kings, and the supremacy of the Roman Catholic Church, may say that all is running loose from them, and say so with some reason; but those who have gone part way, and complain that all who have taken their departure from the spot where they prefer to stand, have run wild and anarchical—for them, I say, to cry out so, is very inconsistent and very futile. Government, like natural science, is to be studied—new discoveries may be made in it every day, and alterations will be had upon it continually. Christianity is eternal and very deep, and as we go on increasing in knowledge of it, the more we shall find to be known. For us, then, to set down a stake that shall fasten Government to just such opinions, or to weave a chain that shall confine religion to just such limits, is like one deciding the amount of precious ore that lies in the granite bosom of the earth, or from his little planet endeavoring to sound the universe, that is infinitely deep and high. 'There are certain aphorisms,' says a writer, 'which men of weak minds or interested views are always ready to apply for want of solid reasons to support their objections.—When any scheme of improvement is offered, hundreds will tell you that innovations are dangerous, for one who is capable of pointing out where the apprehended danger lies.'—This remark is a true one. These alarmeries are trite, and come from vague ideas and obstinates prejudices, as much as from rational and christian views. The danger, after all, is not on the side of reform. Conservatism has the greatest hold upon the mass of men. You will find now that the multitude in any of our large cities is in favor of hanging, and not for any modification of the penalty. At least suffer me to repel the idea, that because we seek for an alteration of the criminal code, we therefore wish to disorganize society, or let the guilty go free, and to break down all law. It is not so. We wish to make the law respected, and punishment effectual. We wish not to excuse the criminal, but to make crime less frequent. I think that we have shown reasons to this effect.

But again: It is said that the friends of the abolition of Capital Punishment, are men of mistaken mercy, and morbid feeling. What proof is there of it? They do not ask for the free discharge of the criminal—they do not look lightly upon his crime. If they make a distinction between the criminal and the crime, it is such a distinction as shall reform the criminal, and destroy the crime. Morbid feeling! From whence does this cry come? What do the advocates of Capital Punishment mean by it? Morbid, diseased? It may be so—but even this is better than the stagnation of death, the apathy of custom, or the obstinacy of prejudice. Morbid feeling! I am not sure that it always belongs on the reforming side. It is as likely to be found with those who magnify the causes of fear—who cling to things because they are established, and who in the shaking of some rotten device, or venerable error, see the downfall of the bulwarks and buttresses of eternal truth. Morbid feeling! This has always been the cry. It was a morbid feeling in those who protested for the rights of individual conscience—it was a morbid feeling in our Puritan fathers that excited them to resist the tyranny of the Church. It was a morbid feeling that spoke in favor of Baptists and Quakers. It was a morbid feeling that induced the patriots of the Revolution to rebel. It was a morbid feeling that softened down the harsh penalties of cutting out the heart, of transfixing the head on a pole and of stretching on the rack, to hanging on a gibbet. It was a morbid feeling that changed the place of public execution from the public gaze to the jail-yard. And I expect that this morbid feeling will continue until the ermine of Justice shall be no longer stained with blood, until men learn to be merciful even while they punish, until they learn that the true policy of society is not severity but reformation. If all this—and it is all of a kind—is morbid feeling, let it work on. To me it looks like that energy tempered by reason and guided by Christianity that has led to all the beneficial and glorious reforms that have heretofore been accomplished.

And now, after what has been said, I claim one point. At least let the experiment be made of preserving the security of society and inflicting upon the criminal due punishment, without causing the death of any. Let the experiment be made—if it fails, the remedy is at hand. The old penalty, that, to say the least, has not worked very well, can be restored.

After all, no human legislation can reach the springs of evil. God's law, Christ's spirit alone can do this. Crime and sin shall die as men become good and holy. The true Reformer is the true Christian—the great element of human melioration, is the gospel of Jesus. Preach that, my friends, live that, extend that to all men, and you will not need Courts of Justice, nor prisons, nor gibbets.—Then it shall be seen that 'The Son of man came not to destroy men's lives but to save them'—to save soul and body, the last from the violence of passion and sin—the first from that which is worse than temporal death, from pollution, degradation and utter bondage.—Let this Reform go on, whatever becomes of others. Let it go on in your soul, hearer, and in mine. We shall need to strive after no other reforms. They will all come to us and issue from us, like the airs of heaven and the songs of angels.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1843.

Supposed difficult text Explained.

'Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able.' Luke xiii. 24.

A subscriber, J. G. K. has requested an explanation of the above passage, taken in connexion with verse 28. The whole passage extends from the 23d to the 30th verse inclusive. First of all, let the reader take his Bible, and read the passage very carefully, and then sit down, with the open Bible before him, to the examination of the subject.

We think that the principal mistake which has been made in regard to this subject, has consisted in applying it to the future immortal state. It is thought by some, that when the question was propounded to Jesus, 'Lord, are there few that be saved,' the reference was to salvation in the immortal existence. The exhortation has been supposed to mean, 'strive to be saved hereafter, in the future world; for many shall strive thus to be saved, and shall not be able.' But to our own opinion. We consider it certain that our Lord was not speaking of the immortal state; that state had not been the subject of the preceding context; and the language is not such as was applied to the immortal state by the holy men of God in the time of Jesus and his apostles, nor at any time previous. Can such events as are described in verses 25—27 take place in the immortal world? Will men stand at the door and knock at the door in the future world? Will beings come from the East and West, North and South in the future world? Are those points of the compass to be our guide there, as in this world? Again. Was not the kingdom of God mentioned verse 18, the spiritual kingdom of Christ which he came to establish among men? It was compared to the mustard seed for the smallness of its beginning, and for its triumph after it was set up in the earth. This was the same kingdom in which the Jews were to see the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; this was the kingdom of God, to which the people were to come from the East, West, North and South. Now, it is certain that Jesus came to establish his kingdom, which he compared to the grain of mustard seed, among men on the earth. The kingdom of heaven is at hand, it was said; behold the kingdom of heaven is within you; the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. What reason can there be then for supposing the passage under consideration, should be applied to the immortal state?

But let us proceed. 'Lord, are there few that be saved?' verse 21. Are there few? It is not, 'shall there be few saved hereafter; but 'are there few that be saved?' We suspect this inquirer wished to be on the popular side. If many embraced the religion of Christ, he wished to embrace it; if few, he wished to avoid it. Hence, the Saviour's answer to that man. Strive to enter in; for, although the yoke is easy, and the burthen light to the true believer, yet to such a man as the inquirer then was, it was difficult to become a christian. There were in him perhaps many prejudices to be conquered; fears to be overcome; a love of worldly praise and greatness to be expelled; relatives and friends to break away from. Therefore, said the Saviour, strive, strive; it is to such as you a 'strait gate,' a difficult passage. But strive; the opportunity is not to last always; soon the enemies of Christ, the Jews, will be destroyed; and when the destruction shall come, it will fall upon you; you cannot then enter the kingdom; the door will be shut; you (being Jews) will in effect plead that you have eaten in Christ's presence, and that he has taught in your streets (language exclusively Jewish) but he will in effect say, 'depart from me.' You will be filled with sorrow; you will see Abraham, Isaac and Jacob by faith in the kingdom of Christ (for Abraham rejoiced to see Christ's day, he saw it and was glad, John viii. 56); and you will see many, from all quarters of the world come and sit down in the same spiritual kingdom. And the Gentiles who were the last preached to, will be the first to embrace the truth; and the Jews, who were the first to hear the tidings, will be the last to be brought in. This very passage shows that all are to be brought in; for on a contrary supposition, we can see no sense in it.—'There are last which shall be first.' What does that mean? It means that the Gentiles, who were the last to hear the gospel, (for it was not preached to them until after Christ's resurrection) should be the first to embrace it; whereas the Jews, who were the first to hear it, should be the last to embrace it,—language which plainly shews that they will embrace it eventually, although for their neglect and wickedness the door was temporarily shut against them. There is no intimation that the door should never be opened again; but there is, in verse 30, an assurance, that even those who rejected the gospel at first, should at the last be brought in. The door therefore was not finally closed.

Let us look at this matter a little more closely. 'There are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last.' When Paul exhorted in the synagogue at Antioch, the Jews were filled with envy and rejected the gospel. 'Then Paul and Barnabus waxed bold and said, it was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles.' Acts xiii. 46.—Thus we see, the Jews had the first offer of the gospel; they rejected it; and then it was offered to the Gentiles. Did they reject it? No. 'When the Gentiles heard it, they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord.' Acts xiii. 48. When Paul preached at Rome, the Jews of that city also rejected the gospel; and Paul said to them, 'Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it.' Acts xxviii. 28. Is not this subject now perfectly plain? Does it not prove the salvation of the Jews, who, at the first, excluded themselves from the blessings of the gospel? The door was shut against them, and they were dreadfully punished. But are they not eventually to be brought in? Certainly, because the Bible puts them down as the last in the order of conversions to the gospel; but if they shall never be converted, why are they put down as the last in order? Paul is treating on the same subject in the 11th of Romans. He there says, 'I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, [not forever, but] until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so ALL ISRAEL SHALL BE SAVED.' Thus the Jews are to be brought in last, after the whole Gentile world is converted. It cannot be necessary to add any more on this point.

Now what profit may we derive from this subject?

1st. It is our duty to strive to enter into the kingdom of God. Reader, have you entered in? Are you in possession of that righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, which constitute the element of the kingdom? If not, strive. Encounter every obstacle, and overcome it. You must not be carried by the current of popular thought and feeling, if it be wrong; you must not follow the multitude to do evil. But strive for entrance into the kingdom.

The gospel requires you to be humble—Christ-like. Are you so? If you are, there will be but few obstacles in the way. Pride is our greatest difficulty. Are you willing to labor and suffer reproach? or are you yet so much in love with this world that you prize the approval of men, more than the approval of God? If so, strive for higher qualifications—strive for entrance. You, reader, are a Gentile. The door has never been shut against you. Called last, be among the first to come in.

The Bible requires you to love all men; to love even your enemies; to forgive injuries; to do unto others as you would they should do unto you. Have you attained this high point in the Christian's progress? If not, strive, yea, strive on. Strive to overcome every difficulty. 'Lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset you, and run with patience the race set before you.' Strive on. And to help you, look to Jesus, who endured the cross, despising the shame. Consider him that endured such contradictions of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.

Such are our views of the above passage, and such are the moral lessons which it impresses upon our heart.

Conference at Charlestown.

The Conference at Charlestown, on Tuesday of last week, was a happy and profitable meeting. It was not our privilege to be present in the forenoon; but we understood the services were truly interesting. The clergy of the vicinity were generally present. We regretted the absence of Father Ballou, who is always happy in meetings of this kind,—he was absent from home. The meeting in the afternoon was opened with prayer by Br. Bacon, of Providence, R. I. We cannot give the names of all the speakers, nor is it necessary. The brethren all seemed to have one object in view, namely, the promotion of the spiritual interests of men,—the increase of divine knowledge,—the quickening of zeal,—the importance of the purity of life and godly conversation, and the necessity of our sympathizing with all the distressed and sorrowing. Such were the general objects of the meeting, objects that were faithfully carried out.

The meeting in the evening was precisely of a similar character. We could not be present until about 8 o'clock; and when we went in, Br. H. Ballou, 2d, of Medford, was speaking. Br. Chapin addressed the meeting with great power subsequently, as did several others. The laymen took part in the exercises throughout the day.—The meeting was in truth a happy and profitable meeting, largely, but not overwhelmingly attended. All got seats in the evening without resorting to the aisles. The meeting was adjourned to Cambridgeport to be holden on Tuesday next. Come, brethren and sisters, come and enjoy an excellent spiritual feast. Let us have a profitable meeting. Don't forget—Tuesday next at 10 o'clock, A. M. meeting to be continued through the day and evening.

Conference at Cambridgeport.

There will be a Conference Meeting at the Universalist Chapel in Cambridgeport, on Tuesday next, commencing at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Those christians who love meetings of this description, whether they reside in Boston, Charlestown, Roxbury, Brookline, Brighton, West Cambridge, Medford, Malden, Somerville, or any other town, are respectfully invited to be present. It will be a meeting for the laity, as well as the clergy; and while we impress it upon the clerical brethren to be present, let the lay brethren and sisters who can, be present also. If the meeting be not a glorious one, it shall not be the fault of the friends in Cambridgeport.

It did not come.

It was confidently expected by the dupes of the Miller mania, that the world would come to an end on Wednesday the 15th ult. The Concord Congregational Journal says, that in some places in that vicinity, there was a confident expectation that the end of the world would come, and that white robes were prepared and worn by individuals, and the day observed religiously by others in social worship, in anticipation of the Lord's immediate advent.

The Greenfield Gazette of the 20th ult. says:—'We learn that some of Miller's disciples in Amherst, on Wednesday last, clothed themselves in their ascension robes and waited patiently till night, fully believing that this world was to be burned up on that day. Not finding their anticipations realized, they concluded to wait a while longer for the end of all things earthly.'

Death of Mr. Elmore Williams.

We regret to learn the death of that true friend of Universalism, Mr. Elmore Williams, of Cincinnati, Ohio. He died on the 10th ult. aged 68. He removed to that place in 1794, when it contained but two shingle-roof houses, and was little else than a wilderness. By his industry, good judgment and economy, he became possessor of an immense estate, which he was always ready to use for the cause of truth and the benefit of mankind. His gifts in various ways during his life, amounted to upwards of forty thousand dollars. He died in the strong belief of Universalism. He assured his clergyman, Rev. John A. Gurley, that his mind remained unchanged, and that he died in the faith of Universalism without doubts or fears. We remember him well. In 1827, while in Cincinnati, we were much with him, and found him an unassuming Christian, which is the highest honor that can be conferred on any man. He felt deeply for the woes of others; he wept with those that wept, and rejoiced with those that rejoiced.

Elder Himes' Safe.

Our article concerning Elder Himes' safe has made much stir. Some of his disciples denied the fact, and said the Trumpet was a lying paper. But IT IS A FACT, and there is no mistake; Elder Himes, the Millerite, has provided himself with a first rate Salamander Safe, and we challenge contradiction. Let the Elder deny it if he can. Now if the Elder believes, as he says he does, in the approaching end of the world, then he has doubts whether he is one of the righteous (very reasonable doubts, to be sure) and he means to be locked up in the safe, until the conflagration is passed. Is this the plan? If not, then he must have bought the safe for the security of money. Now it is well known that the Elder had no money before the Miller excitement arose; and this proves what we have before said, that he has engaged in his present enterprise because it is a money-making concern. He has made thousands of dollars by it; and wishing to keep this private, which he could hardly do, if he deposited money in a bank, he has obtained the safe, and keeps the cash in his own possession, and he is doubtless adding to the stock every day. But if the world is just coming to an end, why need the Elder be so greedy after property? Will not this affair lead the world's people to suspect, that there is some hypocrisy somewhere? As to Br. Miller, he is rich. He owns a fine farm in the state of New York; and he has proved himself to be a shrewd man in this world's matters, whatever he may be in regard to the other. But notwithstanding he says the end of the world is close at hand, he will not relinquish his grasp upon his property. He and Elder Himes mean to take care of themselves in this world at least. They love the cash notwithstanding they say the end is near; and they are employing the most approved means to keep it safe.

State Prison.

There is at present some little excitement concerning the State Prison; and we believe that there has been some movement before the Governor and Council. We believe it is suspected, that there is some sectarian management in the Prison. The Boston Recorder, of last Saturday, gives an account of a revival having taken place there. If by a revival is meant an improvement in the spirit and character of the prisoners, we rejoice at it, whoever may be the instrument of the success. But if the revival is a partialist revival, merely bringing them to believe in endless misery, and to suppose that they have experienced a change of nature, we do not approve of it; and however it may be in place in a vestry, it is altogether out of place in the prison. We do not profess to have any direct information upon the subject; but we have heard suspicions expressed.

Attleboro', Mass.

Some interest is pervading the minds of the people at Attleboro' Falls, at the present time. Within the two weeks past, we have held a series of meetings; some back-sliders have been reclaimed, and a few converted. Yet we want much done here. Error is found here in its most hideous forms. I preached sixteen times during the meeting, and if nothing more, have succeeded in getting people to look into their Bibles.—Universalists are making a mighty effort to support their theory; fearful probably that their craft is in danger. G. W. BREWSTER.

Mr. Brewster says, that 'error is found in Attleboro' in the most hideous forms.' Doubtless, it is. Mr. B. says he preached sixteen times during the meeting, and what further proof do we need? There is nothing more hideous than the doctrine of endless misery. He says he has succeeded in getting people to look into their Bibles. Yes, and that is the way good comes out of evil; and this looking into their Bibles, will make them Universalists. Mr. B. says, 'Universalists are making a mighty effort to support their theory; fearful probably that their craft is in danger.' Ah, brother, is not this a rash judgment? When Christ and his apostles made 'mighty effort' to support their doctrine, did they fear their craft was in danger? May not men make an effort to sustain what they believe to be truth, without being afraid that their craft is in danger? This is folly; if carried out, it would lay the axe at the root of all christian effort.

How reforms are Hindered.

It should never be forgotten, that the whole history of reforms proves, that they have been hindered more by their professed friends, than by their enemies. All true reforms must go onward, and must in the end prevail: but they are delayed and kept back always, by the indiscretion of those who claim to favor them. Whenever any new and good thing is broached, all the idle, visionary, ungoverned and ungovernable spirits fly towards it, and set up a great howl in its favor, and claiming to be its only true friends, they run into all extravagancies, engraft on to the real object of reform many things that have no connexion with it, and thus call up a thousand prejudices that would not otherwise have been heard of; and they denounce with the utmost bitterness all who do not agree with them in all things.—Such has been the fate of all reforms. Such were the evils that Luther had to contend with; and many of the Catholic authors chuckled and laughed at the disorders created by many of the indiscreet and professed friends of the Reformation. When Methodism arose in England, it met the same fate. Mr. Wesley the founder of the Methodist denomination, after speaking of the wonderful favor God had bestowed upon his enterprise, was obliged to confess;

'It brought forth error in ten thousand shapes, turning many of the simple out of the way. It brought forth enthusiasm, imaginary inspiration, ascribing to the all wise God all the wild, absurd self inconcistent dreams of an heated imagination. It brought forth pride, robbing the Giver of every gift of the honor due to his name. It brought forth prejudice, evil-surmising, censoriousness, judging and condemning one another; all totally subversive to that brotherly love which is the very badge of the Christian profession; without which whosoever liveth is counted dead before God. It brought forth anger, hatred, malice, revenge, and every evil word and work; all direful fruits, not of the Holy Spirit, but of the bottomless pit.' [Wesley's Sermons, Vol. VI., p. 66.] See also Bishop Mant's Bampton Lectures, p. 310, 311. Sixth edition.

It is precisely so in the present day. We know of no good cause which has been so much saved from the evil here mentioned as the cause of temperance, although we think there have been some mistakes in that. But look at the anti-Slavery movement. How much has that cause been injured, hindered and kept back, by the misdirected zeal and extravagancies of its professed friends.

Great Disappointment.

It is our duty to record the great disappointment which the disciples of Elders Miller and Himes have experienced lately. According to the reasoning of the inspired prophet, he who foretells the end of all things with remarkable precision, this great event was to have come off on the 15th of February last. Miller on Daniel xii. 11—13, makes out that in 45 years from the time Bonaparte dethroned the Pope, the first resurrection would come. This term expired on the 15th of February. The faithful expected the end of the world at that time, and set up until midnight in waiting, clothed in their white robes.—But the end would not come; and towards morning the disciples got sleepy, and gave it up for the time. Elder Russell, speaks of these eventful things, in the following manner:

FIFTEENTH OF FEBRUARY. According to Br. Miller's exposition of Dan. xii. 11—13, 45 years from the time the Pope was dethroned by Bonaparte and carried a prisoner into France, will bring us to the first resurrection. The 45 years expired on the 15th of February. Many confidently believed that our blessed Lord would come on that day, and in some instances Watch-meetings were held on the night of the 14th, hoping to see the Lord before morning. Altho' Jesus has not come thus far as some have anticipated, yet let all remember that he will come and fulfil all his precious promises. Perhaps we can give no better counsel than that which our Saviour himself gave on this subject:—'Watch ye therefore; for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning. And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.'

Tributes of Respect.

The following articles, from the respective Societies named, are tributes of respect to their pastors who have recently left them. We have a reluctance to encourage the publication of such testimonials, because it would not be well to carry the practice to a considerable extent. But in consequence of earnest persuasion, we have yielded in this case.

At a meeting of the 'First Universalist Society in Fall River,' held Feb. 19th 1843, the following Resolutions were passed by a unanimous vote:

Whereas, the connection of Rev. John B. Dods with this Society is now closed; and whereas, while with us he has maintained an excellent moral character:

Resolved, That we believe him to be a man of the first order of mind, both intellectually and morally, and of a kind and most benevolent disposition.

Resolved, That it is by his own urgent request he has closed his labors with us; that we regret his departure from our midst; and that he has our warmest desires for his future prosperity and happiness.

Resolved, That a copy of these Resolutions be forwarded for publication in the 'Trumpet and Universalist Magazine.'

JOSEPH R. HATHAWAY, President.

At a meeting of the 'First Universalist Society in Claremont,' called for the purpose of acting on the letter of the Rev. John Nichols, asking a dismission from the pastoral charge of the Church and Society, at the close of the present year, it was, unanimously,

Resolved, That in view of the perfect peace and harmony, and unanimity of feeling which have existed in this Society during the period of Br. Nichols' stay with us, and the prosperity that has attended his ministerial labors, notwithstanding the many discouraging circumstances, under which, we have, from time to time, as a Society, labored, we can but regret that the relation which has so happily and profitably (as we trust) existed for the last four years and upwards, is so soon to be dissolved. But while we feel reluctant to part with one who has endeared himself to us by his amiable and christian-like deportment, we would remember that a wider field of usefulness is open before him, and that other parts of our spiritual Zion will reap the benefits of his labors of love. We therefore freely grant him his request to be released from the pastoral charge of this Church and Society at the close of the present year, trusting that an All-wise Providence will overrule the event for the best good of all concerned. And we would beg leave, as a Society, collectively and individually, to tender him our warmest sympathies in his severe affliction, and our most ardent prayers for his future prosperity and usefulness.

CHARLES WILLIAMS, Clerk.

THE PRIMARY SCHOOL READER. Part 1st. By William D. Swan, Principal of the Mayhew Grammar School, Boston. This is an excellent little manual for the purpose for which it is designed; and we cheerfully commend it to the attention of School Committees and the Teachers of Primary Schools in general.

Glorious Promises.

It was foretold by the prophet, and more fully declared by our Lord and his disciples, that God will abundantly bless his children The face of the covering over all people shall be removed; ignorance shall cease, and all shall know the Lord from the least unto the greatest. Death shall be swallowed up in victory; the dead shall be raised immortal and incorruptible, and thenceforth they shall not die any more; and they shall be equal unto the angels, the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. And the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces: there shall be no more sorrow nor sighing, neither shall there be any more pain, but the whole creation being delivered from this bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God,—being formed anew in the resurrection and clothed with the spiritual image of Christ Jesus,—shall enjoy perfect and unminglod happiness forever and ever.

Then may be realized the full import of the Revelator's language, when, having a prophetic view of future glory he exclaims, 'And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever.' Rev. v. 13. Thanks be to God for the glorious promises recorded in his word. Let the name of the Lord be praised, and his goodness be extolled, henceforth and forevermore.

Fruits of Millerism, Endless Misery, &c.

A few extracts from exchange papers will show the dreadful effects of this delusion. The following article is from the 'Gospel Messenger,' Providence, R. I.

MORE FRUITS OF MILLERISM.

The dead body of Mrs. Luther, of Somerset, Mass., was carried through this city, last week, for burial. Mrs. Luther was made a raving maniac by the preaching of Millerism, and was carried from Somerset about ten days ago to the insane hospital at Worcester, where she died in the most awful paroxysms. She has left a worthy husband and nine children to deplore her melancholy fate.

A friend in Reading, Vt., writes us, that the Miller mania is raging extensively in that region. He says those who believe it, partially or wholly, neglect their business—some of them are deranged, and some have committed suicide. 'O, superstition! what a curse to man thou art.'

Another paper gives the following account:

DEPLORABLE EFFECTS OF MILLERISM.

A curious case of insanity, brought on by this delusion, occurred, not long since, at North East, Pa. The subject was a young man by the name of Putnam; for some length of time he had been laboring under mental derangement, when he declared that it had been made known to him by revelation that he should die on the last day of the year. He gave up his business—occupied his time for nine days in hewing out a sepulchre in which to die, a grave six feet deep in rock! Having made all preparations, he proceeded to his tomb, accompanied by some 200 persons present by invite, and unflinchingly laid himself down to die. He remained there for the space of an hour and a half, the assembled multitude waiting with anxious suspense to see him give up the ghost.—But the miserable man crept out of his hole, and departed thence, strongly impressed that he should'nt die that day. And so the poor fellow had to live in spite of himself, and that will probably be the case with a majority of the credulous who expect to die next April.

The editor of the 'Gospel Banner,' speaking of the Insane Asylum in Maine, says,

Since this Hospital has been in operation 23 of the cases of insanity were caused by 'religious excitement,' and 12 by 'intemperance,' showing that the preaching of hell torments does twice as much mischief to the minds of men as intemperance. Yet we enact laws against the latter, whilst we protect the former, because it goes forth under the cloak of 'religion.'

During the past year, 13 of the 87 new patients admitted there were caused by 'revivals.' These are but a tithe of what have happened in the State. We are glad that Dr. RAY the accomplished and faithful Superintendent, has spoken out on the subject.

We find the following premonition in the 'Olive Branch' of last week. Until we saw this article, we had not heard of the proposed law; nor do we get any clear ideas of it, from the article itself. If there is any attempt, however, by the Episcopal Methodists, or any other party to violate, either directly or indirectly, our excellent Bill of Rights, we trust the Legislature will frown upon it. Let the members of both branches be on their guard; and if any such bill appears, let it be very carefully examined, that it may be quashed, should it contain any provisions hostile to the liberties of the people.

To Members of the Massachusetts Legislature.

Gentlemen we perceive by the caption in the notices of Legislative proceedings that the Episcopal Methodists, have by some means gotten into your body the form of a Law Legalizing their Church Discipline, or what involves such a fact, that acts done by officers existing by its forms should be legalized. Gentlemen, we assure you that the discipline of that Church contains provisions violating the Bill of Rights contained in our Constitution, and we hope the gentlemen will carefully scan the proposed law before they give it their sanction. In Pennsylvania, New York and several other States, the Episcopal Methodists have made most powerful efforts to obtain a law giving their Discipline legal sanction, but shrewd statesmen perceived the consequences to our Republican Institutions and the whole matter was justly repudiated.

That Discipline disfranchises every man subject to its provisions, and wrests from every E. Methodist congregation and church the sacred right of electing and employing its own religious teacher, a right so sacredly guarded in the Bill of Rights. We have not been able to obtain the draft of this proposed law so obnoxious to every friend of human rights.

Confidence in God.

There is something so beautiful and instructing in the following paragraph, that we publish it again. We believe it has appeared before in our columns.

CONFIDENCE. There is something very winning and endearing in confidence. Who could take away the life of a bird that fled to his bosom from the pounce of the hawk?—Or, who would take advantage of having him in his hand, to deprive the little trembler even of his liberty?—Nothing is ever lost by trusting in the ingenuous and noble minded; they always feel a responsibility to repay the confidence reposed in them.—What, then, may we not expect from the God of all comfort?—William Jay.

No remark is necessary. We only say, mourner, take courage.

The Report of the East Cambridge Union Temperance Society, from the pen of Rev. E. G. Brooks, is a sterling document. We wish it might be read by the members of every Temperance Society in the State.

Br. Drew versus Br. Dods.

We gave an article a week or two ago, in which we spoke with a conscious sense of justice, and at some length, in regard to the conduct of Br. Drew towards Br. Dods. We did not write for improper effect, but for truth and righteousness, and, as we believed, for insulted and abused and long-suffering innocence. We did not attempt to make any false issue; but to speak to the main point, and to tell the truth in an honest and fearless manner.

Br. Drew has requested us to republish, in our columns, a portion of his article. We will do so. But why did Br. Drew ask this? Did he republish any part of ours? O no. He has not done for us what he has asked us to do for him; and if we followed his example, we should publish nothing from his pen on this matter. But we shall not follow his example; we will do to him, not as he does unto us, but as he desires us to do to him. The suspicion has sprung up in our mind, that Br. Drew neither expected, nor desired us to publish his article, although he requested it, but he rather sought a refusal on our part, under the cover of which he could escape from the unenviable position into which he has thrown himself. It has occurred to our mind, if he had really desired us to republish his article, he would have avoided certain very offensive and unbrotherly terms and accusations which it contains, and which furnish a sufficient justification of a refusal on our part, to comply with his request. If such was his plan (we do not affirm it) he shall be disappointed; we will republish all he asks us to do. And first what he says of Br. Cobb:

If from any cause we have ever done injustice to or misstated any fact in relation to Br. W. we have always been ready like an honorable brother, to do him justice and 'stand corrected.' He knows that what we say in this is true. We have not to go beyond even his last paper for evidence of this in our favor. We have now one act of christian honesty to ask of him, in turn. Will he grant it? We appeal to him as a man and a Universalist.

Our request is, that he correct the following errors—for errors they certainly are—or insert our positive and unqualified denial of them, in the next 'Trumpet,' in order that his readers may be permitted to see at least a few words from us.—The Trumpet says:

'We know that Br. Cobb of this city, and other good brethren, who then lived in Maine, has told us, that there was no blame to be attached to Br. Dods in the matters to which Br. Drew has referred, but not named'—that is, the Union matters. We have before heard that Br. Cobb's name has been used as authority for the opinion that what this Convention found, is not true, because he lived in Maine all the time and knew all about it. We cannot think that Br. Cobb himself ever authorized such a use to be made of his connection with the Universalists of Maine. It is not true that Br. Cobb was present when Mr. Dods was tried; it is not true, that he knew any thing about it from personal observation; it is not true even that he lived in Maine at that time! He left this State in April, 1828, and Mr. Dods was not tried till Oct. 1830—two years and a half after Br. Cobb ceased to be an inhabitant of the State! So that this grave and long pretended authority for setting aside the opinion of this Convention, must go for nothing—absolutely nothing. Br. Cobb is an excellent man, and what he knows is entitled to respect; but the authority of his presence and opinions in this matter is improperly and unwarrantably plead. But this is only of a piece with the whole chapter of Br. W.'s facts. This, however, is of no great consequence; we mention it chiefly as a first example of misrepresentation. We feel more particularly misused by the following.

As to what Br. Drew says about Br. Cobb, it is not necessary that we make any reply. Br. Cobb was himself led, by the impulse of his own conscience, to publish an article in reference to the persecution of Br. Dods, whom he believes to have been a greatly injured man. The following extract from Br. Cobb's article will be a sufficient reply, to all Br. Drew has stated in the section above quoted:

I had an earlier acquaintance with Mr. Dods than any other preacher of our denomination.—In June, 1823, about twenty years ago, at the time the Eastern Association was holding a session at Waterville, Me., where I then resided, he was in that village on secular business. He attended some of the meetings of that Association, and obtained some new light He remained in that place about two weeks, and called at my house nearly every day, earnestly seeking conversation to help his devout and soul-stirring inquiries after truth. His dilligent and grasping mind made rapid advances in a knowledge of the Scriptures. That fortnight's familliar intercourse gave me the impression that I had obtained acquaintance with a pure and noble mind; and I have never changed that opinion.

The next year, if I mistake not, the Eastern Association (now the Maine Convention) met at Union. Mr. Dods then made application for the fellowship of the Association as a preacher. I was a member of the Committee on Fellowship. I had by that time heard some reports touching wrong things committed when he was an orthodox theological student, and when the other two members of the committee had decided for granting him fellowship, I declined giving my consent until those reports should be investigated. We went into an inquiry, and were soon perfectly satisfied that we were on a mere chase after base less gossip.

One of the stories which we then had to overhaul, and the one on which most stress was laid, was, that Mr. D. had stolen a pair of pantaloons from a boarding house at Andover,—and I believe it was said there was some money in the pocket. And what was the proof? Why, that the pants were missed after he went from that house, and from that place, to the theological school at Bangor. No other proof. No mortal eye saw him do the act, or found any stolen article upon him. And this is the story which, since Mr. D. has been winning popular favor in this city, has had new wings given it. Mr. Dods a thief!! I know not how to express the emotions excited in my bosom at the thought of such an allegation. Every person of common sense who knows the characteristic traits of the man, must hear such a charge with indignation and contempt. We know at least, that if he was such twenty-five or thirty years ago, when an orthodox student, not only his religion, but the entire make of the man, must have been utterly different from what it is at the present; and from what it has been for the twenty years of our acquaintance with him.

For these twenty years, since the commencement of our intercourse before mentioned, the acquaintance between me and Mr. Dods, has been very intimate. He has been often at my house. And in all our most familiar and unguarded conversation, I have never detected in him an impure thought. His former wife's brother, Rev. Frederick A. Hodsdon, who resided one season in my family, and whom all our New England brethren know to be one of the most honorable and high minded of men and christians, has repeatedly told me that he had lived in the family with Mr. Dods, and knew him, as he thought, root and branch, and that he had never seen the least sign of any looseness of moral principle, and regarded him as one of the most pure-minded men in the world,—and that his sister, a lady of refinement and intelligence, who would have been painfully sensitive to the least ground of suspecting wrong in her husband, had undoubting confidence in him, and the most devoted respect for him. All this expression of confidence and respect was subsequent to the affair at Union, which Br. Drew of the Gospel Banner has got his nervous system charged with, so that it explodes at every touch. That affair also I have inquired into. I was present at the Maine Convention, when it was first brought forward, and have since conversed with old acquaintances from Union and Hope, persons of the first standing, who were as well acquainted as any with the whole affair,—and I am satisfied, that there is no evidence which can weigh with a candid unbiased mind against Br. Dods.

We recommend to Br. Drew, to think most deeply of Br. Cobb's testimony. Br. Cobb does know something about this business, notwithstanding Br. Drew would represent him as ignorant. Br. Cobb, from his acquaintance with the matter, affirms Br. Dods' entire innocence. Why does Br. Drew endeavor to show that Br. Cobb has no knowledge of this matter? In a subsequent part of his article, Br. Drew declares that he knows nothing against Br. Dods' present character, nor has he 'ever said that he was guilty in these OLD MATTERS.' Why then, when Br. Cobb affirms Br. Dods' innocence in these old matters, does Br. Drew attempt to show that Br. Cobb knows nothing about it? If Br. Drew never affirmed that Br. Dods was guilty in those old matters, why is he so zealous to prove that Br. Cobb is not well informed in the matter, when he (Br. C.) affirms Br. Dods' innocence? But we pass to the remaining part of so much of Br. D.'s article as he has requested us to quote.

He says that when Mr. D. was tried here, 'Br. Drew was concerned as a kind of ecclesiastical prosecutor.' This is a gross and total mistake. We wish Br. W. knew more of what he writes about on this business. We were not the prosecutor, and had nothing, in any shape, name or nature, to do with the prosecution. The late lamented and most excellent JAMES W. HOSKINS —(Oh! that we had more such faithful and honest friends of Universalism in our midst—men who are willing to take a virtuous responsibility for the cause, however they may suffer for doing so.) was the gentleman, who, for the sake of ascertaining the facts, (not for the sake of injuring Mr. D. but for the good of our cause,) made the complaint, on which he was tried; but he did it without our aid or assistance.

Akin to this untruth, is the additional statement of Br. W., that 'it hurts Br. D.'s feelings to see the world so lenient to one, whom he once attempted to put down.' Here is another statement which is far from being correct. We did not 'once attempt to put him down.' As we said before—we had no hand in, or concern with, the trial by which he was 'put down'—no more than Rev. Thomas Whittemore of Cambridgeport had. So much for another one of his facts. We care not how 'lenient' the world is to Mr. D. Leniency is one thing,—that we admire; but falsehood and injustice are another thing,—so see the world deceived by which, at any man's hands, is not, we confess, as an honest editor, so very pleasant to our 'feelings.' All the feeling we have is on this point.

Thus carrying the idea to the public, that we were an original 'prosecutor' of Mr. Dods, and that we tried hard to 'put him down,' Br. W. is pleased to set off, from such false facts—a platform of his own manufacture—to make his readers believe that we have been governed by 'old feelings,' and disposed to renew those 'old affairs' (which ought, on the authority of Ez. xviii. 21, to be forgotten, though he claims the right to remember them and speak of them so late as 1843,—thirteen years after the fact,) to injure his present standing, regardless of his amended character. This is not only utterly untrue, but it is personally abusive,—we wish we could think it is not intentional. Br. W. is not a simpleton, and therefore, we must say he knows better. He knows perfectly well,—and every time that he has written upon the subject, he has known all the while,—that we have never uttered one word against Mr. Dods' present character; he cannot put his finger upon it—we challenge him to it,—he knows that the point between him and us has never been the guilt or innocence of Mr. D.—though, as often as he has spoken of us, he has purposely kept this false issue before his readers; we have not ever even said that he was guilty in these old matters, and of course, therefore, we could not have brought the sins of his past life to bear unfavorably upon his present character. We never have had such a design—we have never said a word to justify a suspicion of it—on the contrary, we have over and over again, as often as we have written upon the subject, protested against it; he has seen and known all this, and yet Br. W. writes a long article, in reply to our complaints of his misconduct, craftily turning the point in controversy, so as to create a public prejudice against us, as if we were all the time alledging Mr. D.'s old guilt! as if we had no mercy in our bowels or could not receive a repentant sinner—but would make him suffer forever for sins he had forsaken! Is this fair? We ask this question before the Public. Is IT FAIR? Is it what is due from one Editor to another? Is it what is due from one brother to another? Judge ye.

In reply to the above we say, that Br. Drew has for years been understood to have been in reality, though not in form, an associate with Mr. Hoskins in the persecution of Br. Dods. Hoskins was Br. Drew's bosom friend. Br. Dods at the time was in Virginia, where he received a letter from that excellent Br. in the ministry, F. A. Hodsdon, enclosing one from another ministering Br., in which he was informed that Brs. Drew and Hoskins were scouring the country and making arrangements to arraign him in his absence. We have heard these statements again and again; and Br. Drew's subsequent course has in no way tended to lessen our faith in them.—Br. Dods had been before tried on THE SAME CHARGES; and he was acquitted. Br. Drew published the acquittal, and gave a powerful vindication of Br. Dods' character, which was copied a few months since into the 'Trumpet' by Br. H. Jewell. After this we are assured Brs. Drew and Hoskins took it upon themselves to crush Br. Dods; and brought forward the SAME OLD CHARGES, on which Br. Drew had acknowledged Br. Dods to have been acquitted; and because Br. Dods would not be tried twice on the same charges, he withdrew, as advised by Br. Reese, from the Association. Ever since this, Br. Drew has pursued him with a very unfriendly spirit.

Br. Drew now says, that he never uttered a word against Br. Dods' present character. He says (what every body knows is incorrect) that he has never represented him to have been guilty in the old transactions! Does Br. Drew merely mean that he has never said this in direct terms? or does he mean that he has never conveyed such an impression? Some men will insinuate what they dare not assert in plain terms. It is notorious that Br. Drew has been inimical to Br. Dods; and if we had been in the habit of preserving the files of the 'Intelligencer' and 'Banner,' we could put our finger on many proofs of it.

Did Br. Drew write a letter to Br. Dods' enemies in Taunton, Mass. in 1831, calculated to injure him? and did he direct them to Mr. Hoskins (the known enemy of Br. Dods) for further information? Rev. P. R Russell, now a Christian clergyman, has stated, that his prejudices against Mr. Dods were first caused by representations which Br. Drew made to Br. Bisbee in his presence. Was all this done with an intention to befriend or injure Br. Dods? Why have you, Br. Drew, every opportunity that offered, thrust at Br. Dods? Why do you endeavor to impress the public mind that the attempted trial in 1830 was for different charges from those on which he was tried and acquitted in 1829? Br. Reese was present at the last arraignment, and was one of the Committee before whom the case was to have been tried. Did not he condemn the course of conduct pursued against Br. Dods? Was he not from that moment to his dying day the firm friend and advocate of Br. Dods? We are assured that he among others advised Br. Dods not to submit to be tried a second time on the same charges, and that he drew up the form of the withdrawal and advised Br. Dods to take a copy of it. Who was the man that mutilated it, and in that state published it in the 'Christian Intelligencer'?

Has not Br. Drew long been in the habit of endeavoring to raise prejudices against Br. Dods in the minds of our preachers? We might name several who have assured us that such was his course. He will not, he dare not deny it. Did he not endeavor to rob Br. Dods of the tenderest friendships by representations made to a family in Gardiner? Who has forgotten his slur on Br. Dods, who happened to be present at the United States General Convention in Providence? In stating that Br. Dods magnetized a subject in that city, he added the significant words, 'a female of course,' casting a slur on the excellent lady as well as Br. Dods. Who has forgotten the uneasiness manifested by Br. Drew in the 'Banner,' when Br. Dods was appointed a delegate to the United States Convention a few years since? Incidents of this nature have been too numerous to mention now; and yet Br. Drew would persuade us, that he has never uttered one word against Br. Dods' present character, nor ever even said, that he was guilty in those old matters!! Wonderful, wonderful! What possible construction shall we put upon his conduct?

As to what Br. Drew has said about us personally, it gives us little concern. He may try to make as many issues with us as he please. All those things move us not. We surely have always desired to treat him with respect; but there are certain things we cannot respect. We do not respect his magisterial manner as an editor; we do not respect his habit of fault-finding with his editorial brethren, a habit which leads him to be always seeking some little flaw in an argument, or inaccuracy of language or taste, to raise a breeze about; we think Br. Grosh has given him a just rebuke in regard to that matter; and least of all do we respect his conduct towards Br. Dods.—We heard a respected father in the ministry say, a few days since, that in all the charges brought against Br. Dods by his enemies, he had never seen any thing mentioned, so much to be condemned as Br. Drew's conduct towards him.—We have had many opportunities of knowing Br. Dods; and so far as we can judge, he is a man of preeminently good qualities. We fully agree with Br. Cobb, that Br. Dods has 'the respect of the rich, and the warmest gratitude of the poor.' And we further agree with Br. Cobb, that 'if some who have hunted Br. Dods with poisoned darts these dozen years, had half the excellence which makes the Christian which he possesses, it would be better for them and for society.'

We have received a request from 'W. J.' to offer some remarks on 1 Thess. iv and v. There are many subjects pressing upon our attention, and consuming our time. As soon as we can attend to his request, we will; and we hope to give him perfect satisfaction.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Duxbury, Mass.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—It seems that the believers in the glorious doctrine of God's impartial grace and salvation are fast becoming interested in the holding of Conference Meetings; and I have observed of late several articles upon this subject in the 'Trumpet,' calculated to arouse the feelings of Universalists. This is as it should be. We should never faint in a good cause; and among all the blessed privileges which we enjoy, none are so glorious, and none are calculated to be of more service to the real christian than the weekly Conference Meetings. To add still more to the interest of such meetings the laymen should take a more active part. This would not only benefit the hearers on such occasions, but it wou'd cause a feeling of satisfaction to the soul of the speaker himself. This is evident to me, not only from actual experience, but from information gathered from others.

I had the privilege of attending a Conference Meeting, last week, in the town of Duxbury, connected with the Universalist Society in that place, under the pastoral charge of Br. J. F. Dyar; and a glorious gathering of the people it was. Although small in numbers, it was rich with grace and brotherly love. The meeting commenced with singing and then a prayer by the Pastor, after which an exposition of a chapter was given and then exhortations from the brethren and sisters, mingled with singing from the Conference Hymns. Nine of the brethren and one sister gave in their testimony to the truth of the gospel as preached by Jesus Christ; and never did I attend a meeting where so much love and zeal were displayed as at that time in the great cause of universal love and benevolence. But time having come to close the meeting, thanks were returned by a brother, and we retired to our lodgings with a heart full of gratitude to God in thus permitting us to visit that beautiful portion of our spiritual Zion.

Long may they continue to prosper in the way of well doing which they have so gloriously begun; and may that spirit of unanimity and brotherly love which was so fully exemplified during my short visit, between the people and their Pastor continue. May his labors be wonderfully blessed in this place, and every soul be brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus; and then in the language of the scripture, they can say, 'Ye shall hear the truth, and the truth shall make you free. E. A. VOSE.

Mesmerism---Inquiries.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—I suppose that among the numerous readers of the 'Trumpet,' a considerable number of them are interested in the subject of Mesmerism, and a few have had some practice in this novel science. I wish, therefore, through your columns to inquire of those who are experimenters, Br. J. B. Dods or any one else who can answer—Whether a person born blind, or effectually made so by accident, can perceive and distinguish objects around them, when under the mesmeric influence, in the same manner that those can who possess natural organs of vision unimpaired? And, if it should be found that they can, I would inquire farther, whether they cannot be told and made to remember what they see or perceive? And if so, I would suggest whether this science may not be made thus to contribute very much to the happiness of that unfortunate class of our fellow beings.

It will be truly wonderful if the blind can thus be made to see, and if I rightly understand the principles of the science, I do not see why they cannot discern, and soon learn to distinguish, objects when mesmerised, as well as those who are blessed with good eyes can while under that influence. Some will, doubtless, think me visionary even to conjecture, that the blind should ever be able to learn so as to read a common book understandingly when in the mesmeric sleep, but I have thought it to be not absolutely impossible.

Any one, who is able fairly to make the experiments necessary, will gratify the curiosity of one, at least, if he will answer the above questions through the columns of the 'Trumpet.'

Fraternally yours, S. LAWS.

Temple, N. H. Feb. 1843.

General Intelligence.

The body of Mr. Felix Sharkey, who has been missing from his home in Roxbury, about a week, was found drowned, near the City wharf, last week. While the Coroner's inquest was sitting upon the body, some audacious scoundrel stole a wallet containing $273 from the pocket of the brother of the deceased, Mr. Patrick M. Sharkey, who was called to the spot by the melancholy fate of his relative.

A Whale. Capt. Seth Baker, of the schooner William Henry, who arrived in New Bedford last week, in a passage of seven days from Norfolk, informs the editor of the Mercury, that on Monday morning, off Cape May, 25 miles from the land, he saw, alongside, the carcass of a large sperm whale, which, at a distance, he mistook for the hull of a vessel, capsized. The carcass had a harpoon, with a line attached, fixed in one side, and appeared to have been recently killed, as fresh blood was still flowing from the wound.

Death of Sir Charles Bagot. This functionary, says the Rochester Daily Advertiser of Tuesday, after a brief reign as Governor General of the Canadas, is no more—having expired at his residence, in Kingston, on the 9th inst. His administration has been remarkably liberal in its policy; and his demise cannot fail to be sensibly deplored by a large proportion of the Canadian population.

The Revolution in St Domingo Capt. Higgins, of the brig Joseph Atkins, at Holmes' Hole from Aux Cayes, 29th ult., reports that he was obliged to put to sea in consequence of a revolution which broke out three days previous to his leaving. The merchants and wealthy men were moving their specie and more valuable goods on board the shipping, and every vessel in port got ready for sea, except the schr. James of Marblehead, which could not leave, in consequence of not having ballast.

Earthquake at Sea. Capt. Bell, a passenger in the Mohawk from Para, informs the editor of the Advertiser, that on the 8th ult., Barbuda bearing W. S. W., 80 miles, an earthquake was felt about 11 A. M., in pleasant weather. There was a violent tremulous motion, similar to that felt in a train of steam cars. The ship's company at first thought the vessel had struck the ground, and the deep sea lead was thrown over, but no bottom found at the depth of 30 fathoms.

Counterfeit or altered Bills. Two men, at Taunton, have been successful in passing off a considerable amount of bad money recently.—The old bills of the Stillwater Canal Bank, Orono, Maine, are altered to Blackstone Canal Bank Providence, R. I. Their mode of operation was to go from store to store, purchasing small articles, giving a $5 bill, and receiving change in good money. The men can be recognized, and the officers of Taunton and New Bedford are in pursuit of them. The Colonel says the bills can be easily identified by the letter 'b' in Providence, instead of a 'd.'—Transcript.

One of the Rogues Caught. We learn from Col. Hatch, that Deputy Sheriff Morse, of Taunton, yesterday arrested a man in New Bedford, who called his name Green, and that counterfeit bills, of the same denomination mentioned in our paper yesterday, were found upon him. Green, who is now in Taunton jail, says he will inform where his coadjutor may be found.—Transcript.

Wretchedness. The Health Wardens in the city of New York are now engaged in ascertaining the number of wretched beings living in the cellars and alleys in the city. In one cellar in the very heart of the city, there were found twenty-eight human beings living together.

Frozen to Death. A single woman whose name was Lucy Talbot, was found frozen on Saturday morning last, near the entrance to her own residence, in Milton. A coroner's inquest was held, which resulted in a verdict of—death from intemperance and exposure. On the evening previous, it is said, that John Bowman, formerly of this town, a dissipated man, invited her to ride with him. They proceeded in a sleigh to a distillery, in Roxbury, and at a late hour started to return. Bowman on recovering from a state of intoxication in which he had lain during the passage home, found the woman frozen still, and immediately called assistance, but too late.—Quincy Aurora.

The Dangers of Dissecting. Doctor Samuel Mullikin, of Dorchester, a highly esteemed physician in extensive practice, died on Sunday morning last, from a disease contracted while dissecting a corpse. This is the third instance of death from the same cause, that has occurred among the physicians in the neighborhood of Boston within a few months past; one having died in Lynn, and one in Weston from diseases contracted in this way.—Quincy Aurora.

The Schr. Danin, Isaac B. Shepherd, of Salem master, arrived at Para, Dec. 28, making the passage in 25 days. The Danin, it will be remembered was formerly a Chelsea ferry boat, and went out rigged as a three masted schooner.—She was purchased by the Brazilian government, and on the 24th ult., was ready, with steam, to leave for the river Amazon, where she was to ply.

Fire in Roxbury. A fire broke out on Friday morning, about 3 o'clock, in the extensive Box Factory of Horn, Sinclair & Co., on the Roxbury branch of the Mill Dam, and before the firemen could subdue it, the two upper stories were nearly consumed. The second story of the building was occupied by Messrs. Lord & Sinclair, two young carpenters. Their loss is severe, as they had in the building tools amounting to $150, and finished stock for a new house, amounting to four or five hundred dollars—and no insurance. By the indefatigable exertions of the firemen, the steam engine of H. S. & Co. was saved, and also the Rope Factory of Moses Day, Esq. H. S. & Co. were fully covered by insurance. Nos. 8 and 12 from the city were on hand promptly, and rendered good service.

Dr. Henry H. Childs, of Pittsfield, Lieut. Governor of Massachusetts, has been appointed, by the Executive Council, one of the board of Trustees of the Lunatic Hospital at Worcester.

Large Fire in Cambridgeport. About 12 o'clock on Thursday morning, a fire broke out in the large new Sash and Blind Factory and Carpenter's Shop of Messrs. Hovey and Markham, in Cambridgeport, near the bridge, which in a short time was entirely consumed. In the cellar of the same building, was the valuable Factory of Mr. Joseph Welch, which was also consumed.

The fire then communicated to the adjoining office of Mr. Stephen D. Brown, wood wharfinger which was consumed in a very short time, thence it communicated to the house opposite, occupied by Mr. Hooker, and owned by Mr. Bliss. This also was mostly consumed.

It is impossible at this time to estimate with any precision the amount of loss.

The light of this fire illuminated the whole city; and probably caused many persons who are wide awake for great events, to suppose that the end of the world had come.—Mail.

Accident on the Norwich Railroad. We regret to learn from Mr. Fuller, of Harden's Express, that a collision took place on Thursday evening on the Norwich Railroad accompanied by serious injury. About six o'clock in the evening the accommodation passenger train from Norwich met a train from Worcester, and before the engines could be stopped the two struck with considerable force. One of the engineers, Mr. Holt, had both his arms broken, one at the wrist and the other above the elbow. It was found necessary to amputate in the latter case. One of the brakemen, Mr. Cheney, had both his legs broken. —Advertiser.

A fellow calling himself James Young, was arrested at New Haven, on Wednesday, for stealing a gold pencil case. On examining his person there were found in his possession, twenty-two sovereigns and five half eagles, besides small change and a printed Card to the benevolent! under which he is practising his impositions on the public.

The Bangor. The steamer Bangor, Capt. Dunn which left here last August for Constantinople, was by the last accounts, at Trebizonde, in the Black Sea, at which place she had arrived from Constantinople, with 700 passengers. She was to return to Constantinople with about the same number. Trebizonde is about 6642 miles to the eastward of Boston, and 500 miles above Constantinople. The Captain was sailing the Bangor under the Turkish flag, for the purpose of saving port charges, &c. At the time she was about sailing from here, it was difficult to get men to go in her, as it was thought by many that she would never reach her place of destination; but she has arrived out safely. When the Bangor run from this place to Portland, who thought that she would ever traverse the Black Sea.—Bay State Democrat.

Despatch. Ship Kentucky, Somers, (of Fairfield, Lincoln & Co's. line) at New Orleans, 11th inst., made the passage from that port to Boston, discharged and returned, in one month and nine days.

Another Land Slide. The Albany Evening Journal announces that a third slide of land took place in Troy on Wednesday evening, a short distance south of the others. No damage to persons or property, although the quantity of earth which fell, was about half as great as the first.

Lumber. The Eastern papers say that the amount of lumber which will be got into the market the coming season, will not be so great by nearly one half as the amount of last year.

Juvenile Obesity. At the Boston Museum, there is now on exhibition a very singular specimen of humanity. A boy, 11 years old, born at Middleboro', Mass., June 14, 1832, has attained the height of 5 feet 2 inches, and weighs 265 lbs! He has a fine, healthy countenance, a generous expression, and seems to enjoy life in a rational manner. His mind is active and having constructiveness prominently developed, many ingenious pieces of mechanism are devised by him. This lad is the youngest of five children. The oldest, a sister, about 30 years of age, weighs 180—but the father and mother, who are people of ordinary size and figure, are not at all inclined to fatness, nor are either of the three intermediate children. Perhaps a more remarkable example of excessive fatness in youth was never seen.—Should he live many years, and there is no apparent reason why he should not, he may vet rival the renowned Daniel Lambert in ponderosity.—Mel. and Surgical Journal.

Transcendentalism. A correspondent of the Philadelphia North American, signing himself 'A Quaker,' gives the following definition of this modern term for a revived ancient philosophy:—'Transcendentalism is an attempt at metaphisical disquisition on the organic laws of spirituality and their operation upon the material Universe in general and in particular; an attempt to analyze that which has neither weight or measure, being an impalpable substance, indivisible in its own nature, and incomprehensible to all finite intelligence; in other words, transcendentalism is the imagination run riot on a sea of speculation, without helm and without compass.'

A live Frog in a billet of wood. The N. York Plebeian says: 'A subscriber has shown us a wonderful affair indeed. It was no less than a stick of oak, about sixteen inches in diameter, apparently about ten years' growth, which he had split in twain in the morning. Out of the centre of the stick there fell a live toad, alive and kicking; and the print of its body, as it was imbedded in the oak, was full and apparent.—How the animal contrived to contain itself is a question which we may leave to the profoundly scientific.'

Death of Judge Thacher. Hon. P. O. Thacher, Judge of the Boston Municipal Court, departed this life on Wednesday morning, 22d ult., about 9 o'clock, at his residence in Boston.—Judge Thacher has been afflicted with acute rheumatism in the right lower limb for some weeks, and was obliged to be lifted up stairs into his Court room on Saturday, when he pronounced sentence on several criminals. On Sunday night he suffered something like paralysis of the right side, and his vital strength gradually diminished from that time.

A pair of fine Durham short horned oxen were sold at auction on Saturday forenoon, in State street, for $150. We understand that they belonged to H. Meriam of Tewksbury.—Atlas.

Fire at Fall River. Sunday morning, about 3 o'clock, a fire broke out in the dry goods and grocery store of Mr. James Albro, at Fall River. The building was saved, but the goods were mostly destroyed. Loss from $3,000 to $5,000. Said to be insured in Taunton.

The generous donation of $1000, which was made rather more than a year ago by Dr. J. C. Warren, to the Mass. General Hospital, with the design of having the annual interest of this sum applied to the purchase of books for the use and benefit of the patients at the Hospital, has been safely invested, and a committee has been appointed to select and procure such books as will be likely to carry out the benevolent intention of the donor.

'A Mysterious Shower' occurred in Saline Co., Missouri, on the 4th ult. According to a letter in the St. Louis Republican, a severe northern wind had been blowing during the day, thermometer being down to zero, which abated about sunset, when a very dark cloud came over, from which was precipitated a fine dust, resembling ashes, of a black or dark brown color, covering nearly the whole country. It seems to have fallen in a moist state, or, most probably, to have contained some salt which caused the snow to deliquesce—for a considerable crust covered the whole surface of the snow—though there had been no thaw during the night. A portion of the substance was scraped up and thawed in a porcelain dish, and a great portion was evaporated over a slow fire in a tin vessel. The liquid precipitated a dark mass and retains a slightly caustic taste, like an alkali. The writer suggests that it may be ashes from some distant burning prairie.

Sabbath School Conference.

The next meeting of the Quarterly Sabbath School Conference will be holden in East Cambridge, next Wednesday afternoon and evening, March 8th. Services to commence at 2 o'clock, P. M. and half past 6 in the evening. The sermon in the evening will be delivered by Br. A. P. Cleverly. Let there be a full attendance. E. G. BROOKS, Committee.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach in West-Haverhill, Mass. next Sunday. And Lecture on Temperance same evening.

Br. E. H. LAKE will preach in East Abington next Sunday.

Br. E. THOMPSON will preach in Weare, N. H. the 1st, 2d and 3d Sundays in February.

DIED:

In this city, Mr. John Gay, 45. Mr. Joseph Keene, 33. Mr. Thomas C. Bell, 39. Mr. Aaron Rand, 48. Mrs. Nancy Lovell, wife of Rev. Stephen Lovell.

In North Bridgewater, Feb. 9th, Ebenezer Murray, son of Ebenezer and Deborah Colwell, aged 6 months.

In Marlboro', Mr. Solomon Brigham, aged 36.

In Saugus, Feb. 25th, very suddenly, Mrs. ABIGAIL E. NEWHALL, aged 25, wife of Mr. Wm. M. Newhall, and eldest daughter of Mr. Daniel Pinkham, formerly of Portsmouth, N. H. This dispensation of Providence is peculiarly afflictive to the husband who has very unexpectedly been called to mourn the loss of an affectionate companion, and has thus the care of two infant children devolving on him; also to the mother of the deceased who had recently followed to the grave an affectionate husband. A brother and sisters with numerous relatives and friends have thus suddenly been called to mourn.—COM.

In Marlboro', Feb. 2, STEPHEN P. child of Mr. Philo A. and Mrs. Seba Randall, aged 5 years. The death of this lovely and promising little boy, was occasioned by his clothes accidentally taken fire, by which he was so shockingly burned that he survived but a few days. And what is very singular in one so young, it is believed that during all his sufferings, when dressing his wounds, so painful was the scene as to draw tears from the eye of strong manhood, unaccustomed to weep, no tear was shed, nor murmur of complaint was uttered by the little sufferer. But while the young parental hearts bleed in bereavement, oh, how grateful should they be for that blessed faith, which teaches that they yet shall meet their loved one in that resurrection life, where pain is never felt and tears never flow. May God in mercy pour abundantly into their bosoms that balm which healeth every sorrow, and thus bow their stricken spirits meekly to His will. T.J.G.

In New Ipswich, N. H. Jan. 17, Mr. JOHN PRICHARD, aged 76. He was sustained in his sickness by that christian hope, which ever proves an anchor to the soul, and which gave him resignation and peace in view of that incorruptible inheritance which he believed would soon succeed the trials of his mortal career.—May the bereaved widow and children, and numerous friends, find the impartial grace of God, as revealed through his Son, sufficient for their comfort and resignation. Funeral services by the writer. S. L.

In Dover, N. H. Feb. 21st, NATHANIEL W. ELA, Esq. aged 77. Mr. Ela for the last forty-three years has kept the house on Dover Landing, well known through this whole region of country, as 'Ela's Tavern.' He came to this town about fifty years ago as an enterprising mechanic—and may truly be said to have been one of the fathers of the town, which he for several years represented in the Legislature. He was a member of the Universalist Society in this town, and has always been one of its chief supporters. A good citizen—a kind parent—an honest man—firm and steadfast in his religious belief—his loss will long be felt by this community.—Dover Gazette.

In Westport, Essex County, N. Y. Jan. 27, Mr. BAXTER SKINNER, father of Revs. O. A. and S. P. Skinner, aged 72. The sickness of Mr. S. was short. He was taken ill on the morning of the 25th; but he so far recovered as to pursue his employment on the succeeding day. His complaint returned again in the evening, and though a physician was immediately called, it was found that nothing could be done, and he died the following day about 1 o'clock, P. M. His oft expressed desire was gratified. He always said, he had no wish to live a single day, after he should have become unable to attend to business. He had been during his whole life an exceedingly active man, and never seemed more happy than when usefully employed.—During the latter part of his life, he appeared to take great pleasure in speaking upon death. It had no terror to him. He felt that it would introduce him to a world free from change, care and sorrow. His faith in God's illimitable mercy was unwavering, and that mercy was to him a source of unmingled satisfaction.—Though death came suddenly, it did not find him unprepared. A short time before his departure, he was asked if he was willing to die. Perfectly willing, said he, with a smile. He has left a wife and seven children.

BELLS, CLOCKS, ORGANS. GEORGE H. HOLBROOK, East Medway, Mass. manufactures CHURCH BELLS, CHURCH CLOCKS and CHURCH ORGANS.

Holbrook's BELLS are well known. It is the general testimony of those who are judges, and who have had opportunities of forming an opinion, that his Bells are the best which are manufactured in the United States, both for strength and brilliancy of tone. The best Bells in Boston, New York, and other great cities, are from Holbrook's Foundry.

Mr. Holbrook's CLOCKS are well known. There are probably a greater number of tower Clocks in Massachusetts manufactured by him, than any other man. He has facilities for manufacture, which enable him not only to make good Clocks, but to undersell all other manufacturers. These are the causes of the great number he has sold.

His ORGANS may be judged of by the Organ at the Marlboro' Chapel, which is from his manufacture.

The public are assured that it will be for their interest to call, if they wish to purchase either Bells, Clocks or Organs.

EIGHT DOLLARS PER DOZEN!

The cheapest Book of Psalmody sold in Boston.

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, THIRD EDITION. Just published, and for sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, Boston—the GOSPEL HARMONIST, a new book of CHURCH MUSIC, prepared by THOMAS WHITTEMORE, assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston. This Book consists of upwards of 360 tunes of all metres, over 150 of which were never before published, and which have been composed, by various authors, specially for this work. Care has been taken to provide tunes for every variety of metre that is found in Streeter's and H. Ballou, 2d's Collections of Hymns. There are metres in these Hymn Books, for which no tunes can be found in many of the Books of Psalmody now extant.

In addition to this large collection of Psalm Tunes, there is also a great variety of SHORT ANTHEMS, easy of execution, for the various occasions in which Sacred Music is needed, such as Voluntaries for the beginning and close of service on the Lord's day, Benedictions, Sentences, Ascriptions, Dedications, Ordinations, Thanksgivings, Christmas, Temperance meetings, New Year, Funerals, &c.

The work contains 352 pages—Price $8 per dozen.

This book has had one year's trial, and it has given general satisfaction.

The pastor of the Universaljst Society in Winchester, N. H. states to us,—'Our choir like the 'Gospel Harmonist' better than any singing book they have ever used.'

Rev. L. S. Everett, of Salem, Mass. said:

'I have had it on my mind for some time, that, in justice to you, I ought to inform you how well pleased we are with your new book of Psalmody, 'The Gospel Harmonist.' We have now a large and promising class, composed of young and old, which is under the instruction of Mr. Lang, a popular teacher of music in this city; and, on his recommendation, the members of the class have been supplied with the 'Gospel Harmonist.' So far as I have heard, there is but one opinion concerning the merits of the work—all agree in saying that it is second to no work of the kind, in any respect; while, as regards the LESSONS or RUDIMENTS, they are considered far superior to those contained in any other singing book extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Jotham S. French, the excellent chorister of the 2d Universalist Choir in Lowell, and a gentleman who has been extensively engaged in teaching music. Some of his schools have numbered two hundred and upwards. He remarked a few days since, that 'Lincoln,' on the 44th page of the 'Harmonist,' is one of the best tunes he ever heard.

DEAR SIR,—I received your book entitled the 'Gospel Harmonist,' some four or five weeks since, for which the author will please accept my sincere thanks. I have given the book a thorough perusal, and I do not hesitate in saying, that it is the best book for a school or Choir which I have ever used. There are in it very many tunes and anthems which I do admire, and which give life and interest to the Sabbath day services, that cannot be found in any other book I have ever used.

I sent last week by Messrs. Powers & Bagley, for a supply of them for my school in Chelmsford; the scholars are highly pleased with them. I shall shortly introduce them into my Choir, and should have used them in my school in Lowell had they been out in season,—shall use them there the coming season by leave of Providence. Respectfully, yours, &c.

JOTHAM S. FRENCH.

We copy the following from the 'Palladium and Amulet.' It is from the pen of Rev. T. J. Tenney, of Norway, Me.:

''GOSPEL HARMONIST.'—The 'Gospel Harmonist' is a new book of Sacred Music, by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. We have lately introduced it into our own choir, believing it to be one of the best collections extant.'

The following is an extract of a letter from Rev. J. M. Austin, of Danvers:

'In justice to your book, I feel constrained to give it a favorable notice. Our Choir have now had the 'Harmonist' for some time. They are well pleased with it. And I must confess the high pleasure I have experienced in listening to the music they have given us, since they have had it in possession. I have been especially pleased with the short Anthems which they have performed as Voluntaries. There are some exquisite pieces of this description. I have no doubt that the 'Gospel Harmonist,' as its merits become known, will obtain a very extensive circulation.'

Poetry.

'In the morning sow thy seed.'

'In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand; for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they shall be alike good.'—Eccle. xi. 6.

In the morning sow thy seed,
Nor at eve withhold thy hand;
Who can tell which may succeed,
Or if both alike shall stand,
And a glorious harvest bear,
To reward the sower's care.

In the morning sow thy seed—
In the morning of thy youth;
Prompt to every generous deed,
Scatter wide the seeds of truth;
He whose sun may set at noon
Never can begin too soon!

Nor withhold thy willing hand
In the eventide of age,
E'en to life's last lingering sand,
In thy closing pilgrimage,
Seed may yet be sown by thee—
Sown for immortality!

'By all waters,' be it sown—
Every where enrich the ground,
Till the soil with thorns o'ergrown,
Shall with fruits and flowers abound;
Pregnant with a sweet perfume,
Decked in Eden's loveliest bloom!

Sow it in the youthful mind;
Can you have a fairer field?
Be it but in faith consigned,
Harvest, doubtless it shall yield,
Fruits of early piety,
All that God delights to see.

Sow it on the waters wide,
Where the seaman plows the deep;
Then, with every flowing tide,
You the blessed fruit shall reap.
And the thoughtless sailor prove
Trophy to the cause you love.

Sow it in the crowded street—
Lanes and alleys, dark and foul,
Where the teeming masses meet—
Each with an immortal soul,
Sunk in deepest moral gloom,
Reckless of the coming doom.

Sow it in the haunts of vice—
Scenes of infamy and crime;
Suddenly, may Paradise
As in the northen clime
Spring, with all its verdant race,
Starts from Winter's cold embrace.

Sow it with unsparing hand,
'Tis the kingdom's precious seed;
'Tis the Master's great command;
And His grace shall crown the deed;
He hath said, the precious grain
Never shall be sown in vain!

Long, indeed, beneath the clod,
It may lie forgot, unseen—
Noxious weeds may clothe the sod,
Changing seasons intervene,
Summer's heat and Winter's frost—
Yet that seed shall ne'er be lost.

But at length it shall appear,
Rising o'er all the plain—
'First the blade and then the ear,'
Then the ripe, the golden grain;
Joyous reapers gladly come,
Angels shout the harvest home.

An Objection Considered.

'Is there not as much reason to believe in a state of future endless misery, as there is to believe in a state of future endless happiness? If I did not believe in the former, I should not in the latter?'

The above objection, Br. Whittemore, is often advanced by our opponents, against the doctrine of the final 'restitution of all things.' But it seems to me that those who advance it, in their zeal to support a falling system, forget the nature and character of God, and loose sight of all correct logical inferences to be drawn from it. It is perfectly natural, we believe, for like to beget like. It is natural for a vicious and corrupt mind, to seek a mind of similar qualities with which to associate. A bad man would not think of enjoying the society of a chaste, virtuous and upright moralist, nor would he seek to extend good principles to improve the morals of those around him, unless it were for his own safety; but he would choose associates of the same stamp with himself, and would labor to propagate his own vicious and corrupt principles in the world. He would seek to extinguish all truly holy, virtuous, and good principles and to make others as bad as himself, that he might the better enjoy himself and have none to molest or make him afraid in his wicked course. This, good policy would dictate him to do, as well as his habitual inclination and disposition.

On the other hand a man of refined taste and correct habits, would seek for an associate a man of like caste with himself. He could not enjoy himself in the society of the vile and dissolute; hence he would seek to suppress vice, encourage virtue? If he possessed the power, he would be more likely to perpetuate holiness and happiness than he would be to perpetuate sin and misery; because the former would be in conformity with his own nature and feelings, whilst the latter would be diametrically opposed to them.—Now, as like begets like, and as it prefers like, it most assuredly would choose the former, and would perpetuate it.

Again, you are a father and possess all the feelings and sympathies incident to that relation. You have a number of children sustaining quite a diversity of character; some of them are virtuous and others are vicious; but notwithstanding their faults, they are your children, and you feel bound to them by the ties of affection and consanguinity.—Now, you are to leave all your offspring an inheritance—a legacy of some kind. And you can entail on them happiness or misery, just which you prefer. Which, think you, would a father's heart prompt you to leave your children? Would you not be more likely to leave happiness to them all, notwithstanding the wickedness of a part?

Well, now, God is a Father, and he is not only a Father, and the 'Father of the spirits of all flesh,' but he, in his nature, is perfectly holy and happy. When he created man he knew that he would possess a diversity of character, because 'known unto him are all his works from the beginning of the world.' He also destined man at the beginning for an inheritance of some kind. And, of course, prepared that inheritance for him. We ask then, as he is a Being of infinite benevolence, perfectly holy and happy, and a Father to every intelligent creature; what kind of an inheritance it is most likely he would prepare for his children? If a good man, of holy aspirations and feelings, whether a father or not, would prefer to make others like himself—to make all men good, holy and happy, in conformity with his own nature and feelings; is not God as good as man? 'Shall mortal man be more just than God?' and will he not do the same, even with his own children? Surely you will not contend he has not the power. Is it not then more reasonable to believe in a future state of endless holiness and happiness than it is to believe in a future state of endless sin and misery?

There would, indeed, be rather more plausibility to the objection if endless happiness was promised us as a reward for our good deeds while on earth. And endless misery as a reward for our evil deeds. But who will have the arogance to claim an entrance into heaven's sacred portals on account of, or as a reward of his virtues? Few we think if any will have the presumption to claim a seat in heaven as a compensation for the good works of this life. When the children of Israel were journeying to the promised land, God said unto them, 'Not for thy righteousness, or the uprightness of thy heart doest thou go to possess this land.' But how much more presumptuous would it be for man to claim an eternal inheritance on accouut of his righteousness? Indeed I believe in the abstract no one pretends to claim the bliss of heaven as a reward. Their arguments however go to favor this idea. But the apostle has set this subject at rest, when he says, 'For by grace are ye saved through faith;—and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast.' Eph. ii. 8, 9.

View the subject, then, in whatever light we may, there is not the same reason to believe in a state of future endless misery that there is to believe in a state of future endless happiness. There cannot be, unless it would be as reasonable for a Being perfectly holy, and happy and infinitely good and benevolent to delight as much in seeing his children the opposite of himself, sinful and miserable, as an end, as it would be to see them like himself, holy and happy. And no one upon a candid consideration of the subject, we think, will pretend this will comport with the feelings of a just, wise and benevolent parent, and much less with the feelings of a gracious God infinite and perfect in all his attributes.

Saco and Biddeford.

Br. Whittemore,—Dear Sir—As I have a good opportunity of droping you a line I must improve it, if it is only to acquaint you of the good success which has attended our labors for the promotion of Gospel Truth in the thriving towns of Saco and Biddeford. These two towns lie on the Saco river, fifteen miles from Portland, directly on the railroad route from that city to Boston, and are connected by a fine bridge. Saco contains about 5000 inhabitants and Biddoford, perhaps, half that number. Here there are four or five large brick cotton factories—several of which are in operation. Two practical papers are printed in Saco; and, to use but a few words, the place is a busy, thriving, pretty place as you will find in almost any part of any State of New England.

The Universalist Society here, was organized last summer. At first it was difficult to get together a dozen. Now, on the Sabbath, we fill a church nearly as large as yours in Cambridgeport; and sometimes in the evening to overflowing. Our people have purchased a site in the very heart of the village for a church, and have commenced erecting a house 73 by 43 of 80 pews, with a hall underneath for the use of the town, and for a Lecture room. I should have mentioned that the house we now occupy, we rent. It is an old house and is owned by the Methodists who have erected a new church in another part of the place. Of late they have passed a vote depriving us of the use of it. But I am in hopes that they will repent of their uncharitable deed previous to their next meeting, (which is soon to take place,) and reverse the 'order of things.' We have many brethren and sisters here, 'good and true' and you may rest assured that our course will be 'onward and upward' notwithstanding the present state of 'the times,' and the opposition of enemies. Probably, I shall soon remove to this place.

Professor Bush was here a few weeks since and delivered his course of lectures. I had the pleasure of listening to but one of them. It is true that 'he is a professed scholar and biblical critic;' and it is also true, that 'his style of interpretation tends fearfully to Universalism.' The 'New York Evangelist' would find no difficulty in proving this latter point—the difficulty would lie in proving that his interpretation is not the true interpretation. Mr. Miller's theory was entirely dissipated by the ways of truth dispersed from the vigorous—the searching mind of the Lecturer.

In haste—but in gospel love, yours

G. W. Quimby.

Prayer.

"If God be all-good, does he need to be importuned by our prayers? If all-wise, can our prayers instruct him? If immutable, can our prayers change him?" Such are the questions which pass through many minds not indisposed to the performance of religious duty, and create no little embarrassment. Various answers have from time to time been given to these questions, but none which appear to be altogether satisfactory; and a large portion of those who have asked them in seriousness, have come to the conclusion, either that prayer is wholly improper and useless, or that its only use or justification is, in the æsthetic effect it has on the one who prays, and on those who hear him pray.

For our part, we have very little patience with this last view of prayer. There is something like mockery to our feelings in a man's assuming the attitude of prayer, and repeating a form of words, apparently addressed to a superior power, to his Father, his Sovereign, and his Judge, with the full consciousness that the prayer is addressed to nothing, and that no answer to it is to be looked for but the effect the act of praying may have on him who prays. How could a man, taking this view of prayer, ever pray at at all? How could a man keep countenance with himself even, with the consciousness that his praying is all a mere artifice to affect his own heart? No man can really pray unless he prays in faith. "He that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him."

The other view, which pronounces prayer wholly improper and useless, no Christian, no really devout man can entertain even for a moment. Prayer is the natural language of the devout soul; it is its breath, without which it can no more live, than the body without respiring. And as for the answer to prayer, we must think lightly of his religious experience who needs arguments to convince him that God does hear and answer it. But how can he hear and answer prayer if he be unchangable? Does he not control all events by a fixed and uniform law? Doeth he not according to his will in the armies above and among the inhabitants of this lower world? Is he not of one mind, and none can turn him, or say unto him, what doest thou?

These questions, it strikes us, become troublesome only because we take a false view of prayer. Our prayers are not intended to change God. But, if we pray, and receive from God in answer to our prayer, a blessing which we should not otherwise have received, has not our prayer changed the will, or purpose of God? Not at all. Why not? Because it was always his will or his purpose to grant that blessing to him who asks it, and to none others. This answers all the difficulty. It is God who gives the harvest. Man may plant, may water, but it is God who gives the increase. When I cultivate the earth, put in the seed in due season, with the soil in due order, and obtain a rich harvest, do I not obtain what I should not had I neglected the cultivation of the earth? Most assuredly. But have not my labors, which have been the condition of obtaining the harvest, changed God, since without those labors he would not have given me what he has with them? Not at all. For the law of his providence, or the principle on which he governs the world, is that labor shall procure certain blessings that cannot be procured without it. Or in other words, he has appointed certain means as the condition of obtaining certain ends, and it is only by complying with the means that we can obtain the end. This is the settled order of providence in what we call the natural world.

Well, God is one and identical, and therefore the order he establishes in what we call the moral world, must be the same, as that which he establishes in the natural world. Regard prayer then as a divinely appointed means to an end, and every difficulty vanishes. As he bestows the harvest only on those who labor, so he bestows certain blessings only on those who ask for them, and only on the condition of their asking for them.

Is it asked, why has God made prayer the indispensable condition of certain blessings? Can any one answer this why in relation to any other department of Divine providence? Can we tell why he has made ploughing and sowing essential as means? Why he has ordained that man shall eat his bread in the sweat of his face? The only answer we can give, humbling as it may be to our pride as philosophers, is, Thus even so Father, for it has seemed good in thy sight. The why in relation to God's providences we can never answer. But what do we mean, when we call him good, wise, and powerful? Do we mean aught when we so call him? If we do, we must believe his order is the wisest and best, and that true wisdom as well as true piety in us, is to ascertain that order, conform to it, and trust it as the child trusts the parent it loves. It is enough for the devout soul to know that it is God's order, and that is always wise and good, whether we see its wisdom and goodness or not.

But, within a limited extent, and relatively we can see the sufficient reason of making prayer the condition of certain spiritual blessings. The man who will not ask, is not in the state to receive. Prayer is the evidence, and the expression of a state of mind and heart that can receive. Till we come into that frame of mind and heart that asks, and asks from the very depths of life, in perfect sincerity, the gifts, if bestowed, would not be blessings, but curses. The more good things you bestow on the sinner, the worse it is for him, unless they bring him to repentance and newness of life. The sinner can enjoy no good thing. It is only the good that can enjoy God's blessings, to whom they are blessings; and to them all events are blessings, and work together for good.

Prayer is the divinely appointed means of obtaining certain ends. It is the will or ordinance of God, that they who use the means, and they only, shall obtain the end. God is immutable, and therefore this always was and always will be his ordinance. The immutability of God, then, so far from being an objection to prayer, is the ground of that confidence without which we could not pray. We could pray with no confidence that our prayers would be heard and answered, if we had not full faith that God is the same yesterday, to-day and forever, and therefore that the same means will always secure the same end. The sovereignty of God, the fact that he doeth according to his will and none can turn him, also confirms this confidence, for he can hear and answer prayer, and none can hinder him.

The difficulty which men feel on this subject, after all, grows not out of the immutability of God, but out of what is supposed to be the immutability of the "laws of nature." The fact is, the community has to a very great extent, unconsciously, and unattentionally, come to deny the existence of God as God, and to believe in him only as Nature. These do not believe in God's freedom; they seem to fancy that he has bound himself, hedged himself in by certain laws of Nature, so that he is no longer free to do as he would. But that which binds is always superior to that which is bound, and if the laws of Nature may be supposed to constitute any restraint on the Divine providence or grace, then is Nature the greater and God the less. In fact men do in our days so believe. Say that such or such an event is providential, and they are shocked and immediately murmur at providence; say that it is a natural event, a natural result of natural causes, and they are perfectly satisfied. If Moses represents God as saying "I am a jealous God, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation," they exclaim in great indignation, and deny that Moses in uttering such a wicked doctrine, could possibly have spoken by Divine authority; but a Gall, a Spurzheim, or a George Combe, may assert that the sins of parents do descend by a natural law to the children even to third and fourth generations, and no one dreams of accusing Nature, or of berating her for her wickedness. Why is this? Because Nature is man's standard of right, and therefore whatever is natural must be right. But to make Nature the standard of right, what is it, but to make it God? And why, if Nature does precisely what the prophet says God does, is not Nature as wicked as her worshippers say God would be were he to do so? And after all, what is Nature? What are the laws of Nature but the Divine appointment? God makes Nature, which is but a form in which he utters his Divinity. The laws of Nature depend on the Divine will, and therefore do not, cannot restrain it. The uniformity, the immutableness of the laws of Nature are not inherent in Nature, but in the cause of Nature. Nature is permanent and unchangeable, because the will on which it depends is permanent and unchangeable. God is over all, the Sovereign, and is and can be bound, limited, restrained by nothing out or independent of himself. He is free always to act according to what he is; and this is unlimited freedom, that is to say, absolute sovereignty. Any supposed fixedness in the laws of Nature, then can be no objection to prayer, for he who heareth prayer, holds Nature in his hand, and doeth with it, maketh it, as he will.

"Ye ask and receive not," says an Apostle, "because ye ask amiss." We must pray in the name, that is, in the spirit of Jesus, for such things, and such only, as it is consistent with the wisdom and mercy of God as manifested through Jesus to bestow upon us. If we ask that we may bestow it upon our lusts, we shall not receive. If we ask to be blessed in our evil thoughts, passions, words or deeds, we shall not receive, because we cannot be so blessed. We must cease to do evil and learn to do well, before there is any blessing for us. We must ask aright; we must then pray with the understanding, for only what is in accordance with the Divine will concerning us, otherwise we shall not receive.

Ye ask and receive not because ye ask amiss. To this we may add, ye ask and receive not, because ye make no efforts to obtain that for which ye ask. If prayer be a means of obtaining certain ends, it is not the means for all ends, nor even the sole means to any end. When the children of Israel were hemmed in between the Red sea in front, and the Egyptian army in the rear, Moses commanded them to stand still, and see the salvation of God. He then betook himself to prayer; but the Lord God answered him from heaven in the language of rebuke, "Wherefore criest thou unto me? speak unto the people that they move forward." We must not only use one of the means, but all the appointed means in order to obtain the end, and it will often be found as necessary to speak to the people to move forward, as to command them to stand still and see the salvation of God.

The prayer to be effectual, must be more than a mere form of words, however fervently uttered. It must be a deed. The true prayer is not that which says, "O Lord feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, and clothe the naked," while we are seeking to obtain possession of what is needed for the necessities of others, to lavish it upon our own artificial wants, or while we remain inactive, and attempt to do nothing that the hungry may be fed or the naked clothed. The true prayer is that which asks, and that which gives, and, as far as man may with God's blessing, does the deed. Better by far is the prayer of deeds than the mere prayer of words. We can succeed never without the blessing of God, or if we do, success will turn out in the end to be worse than failure. We should always then, look up in humble trust to God, and devoutly implore his blessing. But we should remember always, that he never does our work for us. He works in us to will and to do, that is, gives the power to will and to do, but he will never in answer to prayer grant what we ask, unless we exert all our power to will and to do what he ordains.

Let us bear in mind also that God is not deceived. What we often say as our prayer, is not our prayer. We inwardly ask for other things than we do outwardly with our lips. The heart is exceedingly subtle, and deceitful above all things. We must keep it with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. We must pray in faith, in sincerity, with fervor. We pray not save when the whole soul is absorbed, when there is as it were nothing standing between the soul, and the awful Majesty of heaven and earth, and only when the soul shudders before the Infinite Unknown. Alas! how seldom it is, we stand face to face with the Invisible! Our prayer must always for the most part be, "I believe, help thou my unbelief"—nay, "Father, help me to pray," or simply, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"—Christian World.

End of the World.

'It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his power.'—Acts i. 7.

The belief in the end of the world as near at hand is so rife, and the excitement in regard to the apprehended catastrophe so extensive and so rapidly on the increase, that we all need, if not for our own sakes, at least as regards our influence over others, something more than a vague feeling for or against the theory, which has taken so strong hold on so many minds. It is easy indeed to dismiss the whole subject with a sneer. But it is too solemn a theme for sneers or ridicule,—it is too intimately connected with the religious belief of multitudes not to demand respectful and serious consideration,—it results upon too general faith and virtue, whether for good or evil, will evince that it is far from being a matter of indifference. I therefore ask your attention to some of the reasons for believing that the consummation of the present state of things is not near at hand, and that the time when this will take place is one of those seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power.

1. There is nothing in the physical structure of our planet or of the system to which it belongs, that indicates speedy dissolution; but much that would lead us to expect its duration for ages upon ages yet. The provision for man's wants laid up in the recesses of the earth it will take millions of years to exhaust. The mines of useful metals are inexhaustible, and may suffice for the use of uncounted and growing generations. The beds of coal already discovered in our own country, would suffice for the consumption of as large a population as the country could sustain, for more thousands of years than the world has lasted centuries. The supply of the useful earths and salts not in the process of continued formation is in the same proportion. Then too, in the movements and astronomical relations of the earth, there is no jar or disarrangement, nor is there any thing to indicate a speedy change of the system of the universe. The present motions of the different heavenly bodies may continue undisturbed for a period, which it is beyond the power of scientific calculation to designate. But there is one theory, which may be regarded as well established, which looks to an immensely distant period, when the present course of nature, if continued, must eventuate in its own dissolution. The theory is that the various bodies of the universe move not through an entire vacuum, but through an attenuated ether, the most subtle of all mediums which to a degree that it takes centuries to render perceptible, retards their motions, and makes their orbits spiral instead of circular or oval, so that all their orbits are gradually diminishing, and, let the process go on for as many centuries perhaps as the world has lasted hours, the centripetal will overcome the centrifugal force, and the present order of things give place to new displays of the Creator's power and love.

Then again, how much is there in the history and present state of the world to lead to the conviction that the order of things that now is, is still in its infancy. How far are the resources of the world as it now is from being fully developed! Immense tracts are still uninhabited, nay, unexplored, unknown. This western continent alone is adapted to support, without being over peopled, fifty times its present population. And then the powers of nature, the resources of art and science are just begining to be developed.—Of those inventions and discoveries, which promise most for the advancement of the race for the establishment of peace, for the diffusion of knowledge, for the extension to all classes of elevating and refining influences, that have hitherto been the privilege of but few, the world has hardly enjoyed the benefit of a single score of years. The wonder-working power of steam is but of yesterday: and galvanism which promises yet more wonderful results, is but just taking its place among the mechanical agents, which God has put at man's service. The fire-wings of modern navigation, destined as they are, to destroy the names of stranger and enemy among the nations, are just commencing their mission of universal peace and amity. In the ages that have past, men have hardly done more than the work of pioneers in the wilderness. They have just removed obstacles, and entered upon a clear field of labor and of progress. They have just begun to use the world, and to know its uses. Now is it in accordance with what we know of the consistency of the divine character, that he should destroy the world, or essentially change its face, when so little of it has been appropriated, and when its uses are just beginning to be ascertained and its conveniences beginning to be enjoyed?—Can we suppose that he, who gave the command, 'Replenish the earth and subdue it,' would put a period to its existence, while so much of it lies desolate, and so many of its agencies are still unsubdued? Does not this protracted infancy of the race, this mere preparing to live for these long ages, together with the vast range for progress which, it must be confessed on all hands, lies open for the race, rather portend a continuance of the existing order of things for centuries of centuries yet to come?

The spiritual history of our race would lead us to the same conclusion. Four thousand years passed under preliminary dispensations, under schoolmasters, to borrow the apostle's figure, in the training of the race for what was designed to be their religion. Shall the majority of the race occupy less than half the period of its tutelage? Shall man be free in Christ Jesus less than half the time, for which he was under bondage to begarly elements? And this religion designed and adapted for all men, by how small a portion of the race is it yet embraced! More than half the inhabitants of the world are polytheists. A full fourth of the remainder are followers of the Arab prophet; and from the remnant of those, who adhere to a revealed religion, from three to five millions of Jews are yet to be deducted. And when these deductions have been made, there remain little more than one fourth of the human race, who are nominally Christians; and of these a full half know less of what the New Testament actually teaches than the Mahometans do; for their Koran borrows largely from the New Testament.—The great commandment, 'Go ye out into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature,' is yet far from having been fulfilled. Many nations have not even heard the name of Jesus, and many more, with whom slight and partial efforts have been made, have not had the gospel preached to them in such a form or so distinctly, as to make the intelligent reception of it possible, or to have it said that they have rejected it without a palpable abuse of language. The vast empire of China, comprising with its dependencies, as some say, half the population of the globe, has not had Christianity presented to its inhabitants at large, except in those forms of wanton and wicked outrage, which will justify them in the sight of God for centuries to come in abhorring the very name of Christian. It is very doubtful whether, through either of the Jesuit missionaries of earlier times, or through the efforts now suspended in their very embryo of Protestant missionaries, a single native subject of that vast empire has ever received a sufficient acquaintance with the gospel as it is, to entitle him to the Christian name. The same is the case with many nations, with many Islands in Asia, Africa and the Pacific, and with some of the aboriginal tribes of our own continent. Shall these nations and tribes be swept from the earth without so much as the opportunity of knowing what Christ taught, and his gospel still stand promised as glad tidings of great joy, which shall be for all people? Can it be, that he, who loves all his children, has arranged a system of things, under which the vast, the overwhelming majority of his children shall have passed away, without having the opportunity of learning his being, his law, his worship, without having become partakers of his choicest favors? Should the present state of being be forthwith closed, would its history be that of a complete, finished dispensation, or not rather that of a dispensation of failure and misery, of unbelief and sin? But all along the kingdom of light and truth has been on the increase. Since the day when Peter convened the scattered household of faith in the large upper room, there never has been a moment, when the gospel has not been extending its sway either in periods of seeming decline diffusing a veiled and dimmed light over a wider surface, or at epochs of reform breaking forth with the lustre of primitive times. The institutions of our religion have evinced their power, not only to keep the Church, but to justify and enlarge it. Why then shall we not expect progress, growth in numbers, growth in grace, until all men every where shall bear the name of the Redeemer, and till from every land and nation there shall be those who approach the stature of the perfect in Christ Jesus? Does not the long preparation day for the coming of the Saviour, does not the slow ascent of the sun of righteousness towards the mid-heavens give promise of a day of gospel light, in which the misty dawn and cloudy morning, long as they are shall bear hardly an assignable proportion to the noontide splendor?—Christian Register.

Guide to Universalism. Fifth Edition. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'THE PLAIN GUIDE TO UNIVERSALISM—designed to lead inquirers to the belief of that doctrine, and believers to the practice of it.' By Thomas Whittemore. This work consists of 408 pages, handsomely bound; and will be sold at the low price of one dollar a copy.

I. It gives a brief history of the doctrine from the earliest ages, and notices of its most eminent defenders.

II. It clearly and particularly sets forth the sentiments of Universalists.

III. It gives the evidences of Universalism as contained in the sacred Scriptures, by which it is infallibly proved that said doctrine is the doctrine of the Bible.

IV & V. It explains all the principal passages, both in the Old and New Testaments, which have been used to disprove Universalism, amounting to upwards of one hundred and thirty, in which all the different subjects are discussed, whereon light is so much needed,—such as the words rendered 'hell,' the 'lake of fire,' the 'furnace of fire,' 'unquenchable fire,' 'everlasting fire,' 'everlasting destruction,' 'eternal judgment,' 'coming forth from the graves to condemnation,' the 'sin against the Holy Ghost,' 'day of judgment,' 'destruction of the soul,' 'kingdom of heaven,' &c. &c.

VI. It answers the common objections to Universalism.

VII. It points out the moral tendency of Universalism, and the duties of those who believe in that benign and heart-cheering sentiment.

VIII. It furnishes a Constitution for Universalist Societies, and advice in regard to the formation and management of the same; showing the only way in which they can enjoy prosperity. It also gives all the laws of the Commonwealth in regard to religious Societies.

IX. It gives directions in regard to the formation of Churches,—presents a plan of Church Government,—gives scriptural views of the Lord's Supper,—and a form of the administration of that service, for the benefit of young clergymen.

X. This chapter is on the evidences of revealed religion; and presents entire that masterly work, which never has been answered, and never can be refuted, Leslie's 'Short Method with the Deists.' Never but one Infidel attempted to answer it, and he gave up the task in despair.

This work is bound firm and strong, because we wish Universalists to lend it freely among their opponents.

Paige's Selections. 'Selections from Eminent Commentators who have believed in punishment after death; wherein they have agreed with Universalists in the interpretation of Scriptures relating to Punishment. By Rev. Lucius R. Paige. Second Edition, with revisions and additions. 358 pages.—Price $1.

This is a highly valuable work to all Universalists.—It proves by the most respectable orthodox authority, that the interpretations which Universalists have given of the passages of Scripture which relate to punishment, are correct. It is a refutation of endless misery by the testimony of the most learned writers who have believed that doctrine. The threatenings of punishment, occuring in the New Testament, which have been supposed to refer to endless misery, are explained in this work, in the very language of the Partialist Commentators. It is fatal to the doctrine of endless misery.

Fourth Edition of Conference Hymns. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'

Price $1,25 per dozen—12 1-2 cents single.

Practical and Experimental Religion. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the following new and excellent work—'Practical and Experimental Religion; or the Teachings and Tendencies of Universalism. Designed as a Companion to the 'Christian Comforter.' By Henry Bacon.' Read this book and learn the moral power of Universalism. 'It is good to live by, and it is good to die by.' Price 50 cents.

Illustration of the Parables. Tenth Edition. For sale at this Office, the work entitled 'NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PARABLES OF THE NEW-TESTAMENT, arranged according to the time in which they were spoken. By Thomas Whittemore.' 352 pages large 12mo at the low price of 75 cents per copy. Twenty per cent discount by the dozen. All the parables of the New Testament are explained at length in this work, and illustrated by appeals to the sacred Scriptures. Particular attention has been paid to those parables which have been used to prove the doctrine of future endless misery; and extracts are given from Orthodox Commentators, of great respectability, to show that they have explained them as Universalists now do.

Dods' Short Sermons. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, the new stereotype edition of 'DODS' SHORT SERMONS,' with addition of several important articles. These Sermons have been regarded by the Universalist public with great favor. The first edition was taken up with avidity.—At the request of many friends, the author was induced to revise the work, and add many important essays on deeply interesting subjects; in which the author has thrown much light on subjects that have been regarded as very difficult to be understood. 'Mr. Dods,' says a distinguished correspondent, 'has done much to throw light on the sacred volume. Many of his expositions have struck us with great force. He has given us great light. Difficult subjects are explained clearly by him.'

Price of the work 75 cents. Wholesale dealers will find it to their interest to call at 37 Cornhill.

Thayer's Bible Class Assistant. Third Edition. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BIBLE CLASS ASSISTANT, or Scriptural Guide for Sunday Schools, being sketches of the Antiquities, Customs and Manners of the Jews, in illustration of Scripture, designed for the use of Teachers, Bible Classes and the Higher Classes in Sunday Schools.' By Rev. Thomas B. Thayer, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Lowell, Mass. This book is on a new plan, suggested to its author by his experience in conducting Sunday Schools and Bible Classes. It is not a book of questions merely; but each chapter consists of two parts,—1st. The history to which the questions refer is succinctly given, which is to be faithfully studied, and 2d. The Questions. We have examined this work and commend it; but any formal commendation is rendered quite unnecessary by the well known reputation of its author.

Price 25 cents single, $2,50 per dozen.

Sunday School Library Books. An assortment of SUNDAY SCHOOL LIBRARY BOOKS, is kept constantly for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill. All the CLASS BOOKS used in our Schools, are also kept for the accommodation of customers. These Books will be sold at the lowest cash prices. Purchasers are invited to call.—Schools in the country, wishing for Books, can send to Mr. Whittemore, the age and number of scholars, and the amount of money to be expended, and he will select the Books, and forward them by the safest and earliest conveyance.

Miller's Theory Refuted. For sale at the 'Trumpet Office,' 37 Cornhill, a complete and thorough refutation of the Theory of William Miller, in regard to the End of the World in 1843.—The work is in three parts.

In Five Sermons by Rev. O. A. Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston, in which he treats at length of the Second Coming of Christ, showing what we are to understand by it—when it took place, and for what purpose he came. Mr. Skinner also considers at length Mr. Miller's calculations in regard to the prophecy of Daniel, and the book of Revelations, and shows them to be utterly erroneous and contradicted.

II. A Sermon on the scriptural sense of the phrase 'end of the world,' by Thomas Whittemore.—This subject is considered in connexion with the Furnace of fire. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

III. A learned Dissertation by Rev. John M. Austin, of Danvers, showing the falsity of Mr. Miller's Theory, and the absurdity and error of his calculations on Daniel and the book of Revelations.

We have here got a thorough, absolute annihilation of Mr. Miller's Theory. The whole is done in a candid, christian spirit. The book is not ridicule but argument; and is designed to meet the cases of those who honestly but erroneously suppose Mr. Miller to be right. The Bible is appealed to as the only guide.

Life of Rev. John Murray. For sale at this Office, the 'LIFE OF REV. JOHN MURRAY, preacher of Universal Salvation. With Notes and Appendix—by Thomas Whittemore.

This edition is from the original edition published by Mrs. Murray, and is much enlarged with copious Notes, found in no other edition, and an Appendix, containing certain historical documents, and large extracts from Mr. Murray's Letter's and Sketches illustrative of the relative sentiments of Murray and Winchester.

Book of Promises. For sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'THE BOOK OF PROMISES: or the Universalist's Daily Pocket Companion, being a collection of Scripture promises, arranged under their proper heads.' By S. Bulfinch Emmons. This is a very valuable little work. Chap. 1st. treats of salvation and redemption, and gives all the promises on the subjects, under eight heads. Chap. 2d. answers objections by Scripture promises, such as these—'all will not come to God'—'we must repent and be born again,'—'this is a probationary state. There is no change after death'—'the wicked will be exposed to the anger of God, world without end'—'God will not always be merciful as he now is,' &c. &c.

The promises of Universal Salvation are all introduced and classed, also promises to the sick and afflicted. The views of distinguished theologians, of various denominations, upon the fulfilment of the promises relating to the salvation of the world, are given;—whereby it will be seen that Niles, Baxter, Summerfield, Wesley, A. Clarke, Prof. Stuart, and others, have laid down principles from which Universalism must unavoidably flow.

Price of the work 25 cents. 125 pages.

Ancient History of Universalism. Second Edition. Just received and for sale at the Trumpet Office, 37 Cornhill, 'The Ancient History of Universalism, from the commencement of the Christian Era to the time of the Reformation.' By Hosea Ballou 2d., of Medford. Price $1 per copy. A suitable discount to those who buy to sell again. It is a highly valuable work.

Paige's Questions. Fifth Edition. For sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 37 Cornhill, 'Questions on Select Portions of the Gospels; designed for the use of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. By Lucius R. Paige, pastor of the First Universalist Society in Cambridge.' Price 25 cents single; $2,50 per dozen.

Terms of Publication.

Two dollars per annum payable in advance; which fifty cents will be added, if not paid within six months from the time of subscribing.

Agents who become responsible for six subscribers, shall, each year, receive a volume therefor, as long as they retain their responsibility, and the same proportion, for a less or greater number.

All papers will be forwarded, until an explicit order for a discontinuance is received; and whether taken up by the subscriber or not from the place where they are deposited, he will be held accountable for the pay until he orders a discontinuance, and pays up all that is due.

☞ All communications concerning the paper must be addressed to Thomas Whittemore, 'Trumpet Office,' Boston—and those forwarded by mail must be post paid.

Liabilities of those who take Periodicals.

The laws declare that any person to whom a periodical is sent is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office, or person with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a post office, store, tavern, or other place of deposite, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the postmaster, store or tavern keeper, &c. is responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or gives notice to the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

Post Office Regulations. Extract from the 'instructions to postmasters,' p. 50, sec. 118. 'In every instance in which papers that come to your office are not taken out by the person to whom they are sent, you will have immediate notice of it to the publishers, anning the reson, if known, why the papers are not taken out.

In all cases where Postmasters render themselves liable for the subscription money for a paper, by a neglect to notify the publisher that it remains dead in the Post Office, the Postmaster General reserves the right to admonish the Postmaster for his neglect, and require him to pay for the paper, or reform him out of office.

The Minister's Text.

I do not mean a text from the Bible, upon which the minister preached, but a text of his own composition; which he uttered from his own spirit and on his own authority. He said—we are not telling a dream but a matter of fact—standing in the pulpit, and lifting up his hands and his eyes to heaven, 'I thank God there is a hell for sinners.'

This, certainly, is a pithy text, and will bear a commentary; a preachment. We will attempt an exposition, and give it in particulars.

1. What description of place did the minister intend? Was it a penitentiary? A place of chastisement and correction? No; nothing like it. Such a hell does not answer his ideal. It is an endless hell, full of unmitigated torment. Its tortures are not disciplinary but vindictive. Its fires are the burnings of Almighty wrath. They express the sentiment of vengeance, and that only; not being designed to promote the safety and happiness of any being; not of God, for his felicity is absolute, independent, above all contingencies: nor for the benefit of the celestial hosts, for their happiness is complete without these means of securing it: nor for an example and warning to the wicked upon earth, for they never see it; it is hidden from them.—The minister's hell, therefore, possesses no salutary and useful character. It does no good to any one either on earth or under the earth; either in heaven or above the heavens. It does not even answer the purpose of being a place of confinement for the lawless and mischievous, and thus restrain them from going at large, for they are never put into it until they have finished their course on earth, and done all the evil they had a heart and the power to commit. As a means of restraint, correction, discipline or amendment, this hell has no purpose, tendency or connection. It is wholly and purely vindictive.

2. Who are the persons to be placed in this dreadful abode of unutterable and ever-enduring misery? Are they the disturbers and the pests of human society? Oppressors, traitors, murderers, thieves, liars, and such-like, and these only? By no means. The Cains, the Achans, the Ahabs and Jezebels, the Absalons and Judases, the Hildebrands and the Borgias, are not exclusively nor chiefly the occupants of 'this place of torment,' but by far the greater part of all who have ever been born into this world. The industrious, the useful, the generous, the kind-hearted, the amiable and the moral, as well as the injurious and immoral, are candidates destined for the fire never to be quenched. It is the doctrine of these ministers that the many are reprobated for hell, and the few elected to heaven: And that God would have been glorified—in other words, would have acted gloriously—if He had actually consigned every individual of mankind to the dire mansions of everlasting death.

3. By what kind of spirit must a man, minister, or layman, be inspired and actuated, who not merely has a faith in the reality of the things above described, but rejoices in them, and is devoutly thankful to God for them? He doubtless imagines that the 'same mind is in him that was in Christ Jesus;' that he is benevolent and philanthropic; that 'the charity which hopeth all things,' is 'rooted and grounded' in his soul. A man, however, often mistakes his own heart. The sons of Zebedee once deserved the reproof:—'Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of.'—And does it not behoove all to be careful how they construe the word and the works of God? If I say or believe that he has enacted a law which condemns to eternal misery the subject of every transgression, however inadvertant and small; and that little children, before they know right hand from left, are all under this condemnation, do I not dishonor Him? Is not such a sentiment a gross libel on the character and government of the adorable Jehovah?

We all believe in the consummate perfection of God: in the indefectible character of His wisdom, equity and goodness. We should, surely, beware of putting forth a sentiment which either directly or constructively alleges an impeachment against our Creator, the great Omnipotent. Let us not 'charge God foolishly.' The law, described above, is not an enactment of Him who inhabiteth eternity. It is a fabrication of human origin. The Bible contains it not. We can find it only in books of systematic theology. It grew out of the principle of fanciful contrast. 'If there be an ever-enduring life, there must also be an ever-enduring death. And there must be a law which denounces an infinite penalty. And this penalty must be attached to the smallest deviation whether it be in the mind or in action; in nature or in the life.'—And then passages of Scripture are forced out from their proper import and pressed into the support of the new doctrine. But the whole has been done inconsiderately. Man's moral nature; his natural sentiments of right and wrong; that faculty by which 'ye even of yourselves judge what is right,' would never have permitted him to fabricate such a law if he had duly considered it, and looked well at all its tremendous bearings. It is as foul an aspersion of God as it is a dire damnation of man. Nor is the terrible doctrine redeemed by the alleged fact that God graciously snatches some as brands from the burning.—We are not to glorify God's grace at the expence of His justice. It is an error, not to be justified or excused, to mar one Divine attribute for the sake of giving a meretricious splendor to another. 'Woe unto them who put darkness for light, and light for darkness.' Every pillar should be allowed to stand on its own true and proper foundation.

There is a practical and experimental injury resulting from these false views of our divine Creator. If we ascribe to Him what—in fact—is unjust and cruel, it will, more or less, be reflected back upon ourselves. It is right that we aspire to be the children, the imitators of God. If, in our conceptions, we make Him a tyrant, unjust, capricious and cruel, we are thus tempted to practice injustice, partiality, and unkindness toward our fellow-creatures. They who believe that God shows mercy only to a few, will not be likely to abound in merciful feelings or acts themselves. They who believe that God is severe, will easily cherish sentiments of severity and unmercifulness. Our good Puritan ancestors attached great severity to the character and government of God. The consequence was, that they had a category of crimes—something like ten in number—for which they inflicted capital punishment.

Another Soul Delivered.

Br. WHITTEMORE:—The enclosed letter was written without a thought of its publication; and as a copy of it is in the hands of the Church, the author did not feel at liberty to revise and correct it as she wished. It is sent to you for publication at the earnest solicitation of the writer's friends, not because of its containing anything new to Universalists, but to encourage the hearts of our friends, by the knowledge that another soul is freed from the bondage of error and brought into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. The author was a very prominent member in the Church to which she belonged, and is now one of the most active and zealous members of our little Church. Another reason for publishing it is the efforts of the Church to hush the matter up and conceal their loss.

Newburyport, Feb. 1843. D. F.

Newbury, July 18th, 1842.

To the First Congregational Church in Newbury:—You are probably aware, that since I united with your church, a change has taken place in my religious views; and the same desire to exert an influence in the cause of truth, which impelled me to join with you, is now my inducement to withdraw from you. I am not with you in sentiment, and I cannot henceforth exert my energies in behalf of the doctrines you inculcate, and probably believe. I am now a believer in the doctrine taught by the Apostle Paul, in these words—"We labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe;" 1 Tim. iv. 10. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God, our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, "who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time." 2 chap. 3, 4, 5, 6. For as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. Romans v, 18. I believe future endless punishment inconsistent with the character of God; for the scriptures say, "God is love," and love worketh no ill. The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works. O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, and his mercy endureth forever; that in him is no variableness nor shadow of turning; for the Lord will not cast off forever, and though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. He will not contend forever, neither will he be always wroth, for the spirit would fail before him, and the souls he has made. I believe the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world; he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world. The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands; and this is the Father's will, that hath sent him; that of all which he hath given him he should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. All that the Father hath given me shall come to me saith Jesus, and him that cometh I will in no wise cast out, "and I if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." I believe the promise made to Abraham, that in his seed (that is Christ,) all nations, families, and kindreds of the earth shall be bless'd. I believe that the great Jehovah has sworn by himself, because he could swear by no greater, the word has gone out of his mouth in righteousness, and shall not return unto him void: that unto him every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear, surely shall say in the Lord have I righteousness and strength. I believe as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive; that in the resurrection, they are as the angels of God in heaven. I believe in the restitution of all things: that he will gather together in one all things in Christ, and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself. I believe the righteous are recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and sinner; that the way of the transgressor is hard; that there is no peace to the wicked. I believe great peace have they which love the law of God; that, in keeping his commands there is great reward; that where sin abounded, grace will much more abound. The scriptures plainly show forth the doctrine of universal grace, and the wayfaring man though a fool, need not err therein. Jesus not only offered, but also gave himself for the life of the world. "Behold the lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." The doctrine of partial grace, is said to be sweet; but O how much sweeter is the doctrine of God's impartial grace. Universal grace, 'tis a charming sound, harmonious to the ear. Heaven with the echo shall resound, and all the earth shall hear what a glorious and beautiful truth, that God is the Father of all men. Jesus taught us to pray, (not my Father,) but our Father, who art in heaven. Mankind are one family: "Have we not all one father;" are we not all brethren, and ought we not to love him with all our heart, soul, minds, might and strength, and our neighbor as ourselves?

Where is the licentious influence of this doctrine? It honors God, exalts the Saviour, and fills the soul with joy unspeakable, and full of glory. I believe the gospel to be good news, and glad tidings, which shall be to all people, therefore the doctrine of endless misery cannot be true, as it is not good news, but bad news.

We may think to escape this misery ourselves, but pray tell me, is it good news to hear that all will not? It is in vain to suppose that Christians will be so changed after death, as not to feel compassion for the miseries of others, or that divine love will operate different in heaven from what it does on the earth: if we have not the spirit of Christ, we are none of his. With these sentiments, you will of course perceive the propriety of my withdrawal from your society and denomination, and I desire to be no longer regarded as a member of your Church; and now wishing that you also may be brought to the knowledge of these glorious truths in this world, I feel confident that we shall in some future time rejoice together over them.

I remain very respectfully yours,
MARY L. B. WOODMAN.

Claremont and No. Charlestown, N. H.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—A sense of duty compels me to express myself, with your permission, through the medium of your paper, in relation to the friends of truth in the above places. Upwards of four years, and until quite recently, I have resided with them as preacher; and, with regard to my connexion with these Societies, I can say,

> With both, my friendship has been sweet,
> And my communion dear.

But circumstances, some of which are of a very afflictive character, have induced me to seek another field of labor, and to request that the connexion so happily existing between pastor and people might be dissolved. This request has been granted in a manner evincing the Christian spirit and disposition—the spirit of that charity which covereth a multitude of imperfections.

Oft have deeds of kindness done myself and my departed companion, by these friends, caused emotions of deep and heartfelt gratitude, and they may be assured that all their friendly gifts and offerings, during our residence with them, have been timely, and that they have thereby been made the instruments, in the providence of God, of good to their fellow mortals.

May God in mercy incline the heart and direct the steps of some tried and faithful brother to this portion of our Master's vineyard, who shall break to the people the bread of life. A faithful preacher of the everlasting gospel, will, in process of time, reap there a harvest of souls as the reward of his labors; and surrounded with all that is beautiful in the scenery of Nature, and blessed with the friendship and the love of the faithful in the land, he will find a desirable location in Claremont, situated in the delightful valley of the Connecticut River. Falsehood Exposed.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—For several months past the Baptists in this town have been making great exertions to get up a religious excitement, and in a measure have succeeded. That is, they have succeeded in frightening a few women and little children to join their ranks. I attended one of their meetings, and it seemed to me that the main object of all their exertions, was to gain converts to their particular faith without regard to the means they used, for no means in their power whether good or bad have been left untried. In this respect their preacher, the Rev. Mr. Shepardson, has acted his part; he has resorted to means unbecoming in a minister of the gospel, and which would be despised by every honest and high-minded Christian.—But he, I suppose, like many of his sect, thinks that the end will justify the means; therefore he has seen fit to slander and abuse Universalists.

At the time I attended his meeting, (above alluded to,) he read the 13th chapter of Luke, and made some singular expositions of its contents; expositions which my feeble mind could not comprehend; therefore I will not endeavor to repeat them here. But what I am coming at is this: in the course of his remarks, to give more force to his arguments, (if arguments they could be called) he told of the conversion of a Universalist in the town of Royalston, Mass. to the belief of endless misery. After the services of the evening were over, I inquired of him the name of the Universalist thus converted, which he gave me; when after some inquiry into the matter and finding the story to be wholly without foundation, I wrote him the following letter:

Petersham, Mass. Jan. 11, 1843.

REV. SIR,—I humbly crave your pardon for my boldness in addressing you this epistle, especially as you are a person with whom I have had no personal acquaintance; but as its subject is one of much importance to the cause of truth, of which I trust I am a sincere though perhaps feeble promulgator; therefore I believe it to be my bounden duty to send you the following lines.

On Sunday evening, Dec. 11th, I attended your meeting in the westerly part of Petersham for the purpose of religious improvement, but in this I was disappointed. Of your singular explanations of several passages of Scripture, I have nothing to say, but shall confine myself to one particular item of your discourse. In the course of your remarks, you related a wonderful story of the conversion of a Universalist in the town of Royalston to the belief of endless misery.

You stated that he was a leading member of the Universalist Society in that town; that he was a leader of the singing; you stated that during his sickness his friends sent for the Universalist minister to come and pray with him, but he refused to hear his prayers because he desired the prayers of Christians. While you were relating this story, I was well persuaded that it was false—got up merely to create religious excitement and prejudice against the doctrine of God's universal grace and salvation; therefore to satisfy myself more fully, I inquired of you the gentleman's name, which you politely gave me, and I thank you for it.

Now, Sir, I have ascertained from good authority, that this story is false in all its leading particulars. It is true that Mr. K. attended the Universalist meeting and led the singing, but he never was a member of the Society; his name is not to be found on the records; furthermore, I was told by Mr. Loring Chase, the father-in-law of Mr. Kendall, and a man of undoubted veracity, that Mr. Kendall told him that he never believed Universalism and never could, and he attended that meeting merely because he had rather go there than to the Orthodox. I am also informed by the Rev. Mr. Coolidge, (the minister, I suppose, to whom you alluded,) that he was never sent for to visit or pray with Mr. Kendall by any one, either of his connexions or any one else. This is the sum and substance of your wonderful story about the conversion of a Universalist. It is an unfounded statement, without one shadow of truth as regards his being a Universalist.

You asserted that it was true, but it is not so; and now I ask it of you as a man and a Christian, to recall this assertion in as public a manner as you made it; and if you are honest, you will do it without hesitation; but if you will not, I will do it for you, and in a manner too that will leave your character for truth and veracity in no enviable light. Far be it from me to persecute any individual because he believes differently from myself, but Sir, I am the last man to look quietly on and see Universalists and Universalism slandered and abused. What your object could be in telling this story to your congregation I am unable to learn, unless it was because you were destitute of Scripture testimony to support your doctrine. Or was it because you thought it to be the most successful way of putting down the doctrine of Universalism which you cannot destroy by fair argument? If circulating such stories are the strong arguments of your defence, then truly I think your cause must be a weak one.

I trust, Sir, that you will not give me occasion again to allude to this unpleasant affair, for it is truly an unpleasant task for me, to be obliged to contradict a professed minister of Jesus Christ—one who professes to have his moral actions governed by that heavenly spirit of charity which 'rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth.' You seem to have great confidence in the doctrine which you preach, therefore, I challenge you to meet me in a public discussion of the following question:—Do the Holy Scriptures teach the doctrine of the endless misery of any portion of the human family? For if the doctrine of endless misery will not bear investigation let it fall; and I say the same of Universalism; and if either is true, discussion will only make that truth more easily to be understood.

I would further propose, that this discussion be holden at time and place mutually agreed on by the parties. Please answer me as soon as convenient.

Yours sincerely, I. WASHBURN.

Rev. John Shepardson.

For some reason the gentleman has not seen fit to return me an answer to the above, but has shielded himself behind his own self-importance, and thinks, I suppose, that he has a perfect right to abuse those of a more benevolent faith. Now he has got himself into this affair, I suppose he thinks that to maintain silence and treat my letter with 'sovereign contempt,' is the best thing he can do; for his pride will not suffer him to confess his fault, and the more he says to justify the course he has taken the worse he is off.

Since I wrote the gentleman, I have received the following certificate from Mr. K. which puts at rest all controversy respecting his religious opinions:

'Royalston, Jan. 28th, 1843.

'I hereby certify, that I NEVER was a Universalist; but went to that meeting out of choice. SYLVANUS KENDALL.'

I also learn that since I wrote Mr. Shepardson, his friends have been to Mr. Kendall to get a certificate to support him in his falsehood, but they could not succeed.

But I trust that the gentleman will learn wisdom from this, and hereafter proclaim nothing but the truth; and if he does, he will cease preaching endless misery.

Yours truly, I. WASHBURN.

Friendly Letter, &c.

Br. WHITTEMORE,—The following letter was handed me by a friend in this place, with the desire that I should prepare it for the press, and send it to the 'Trumpet' for publication. It was addressed by a gentleman in Vermont to his relatives in this place, and breathes a spirit of devotion and love for the cause he has espoused. I have no faith in visions, whether seen by Universalists or their opposers at the present day. I do not regard them as supernatural, or as revealing anything to man which he is bound to believe.—I have no doubt, however, but that the writer of the letter was sincere, and that he actually imagined he saw the vision which he describes. For the gratification of his friends here and elsewhere, I send it to you for publication. Yours, &c. A. FLETCHER.

Ware Village, Mass. Feb. 22, 1843.

Barnard, Vt. Jan. 18*th,* 1843.

Respected Brother and Sister:—It is with the greatest pleasure that I take my pen in hand to inform you that we are all in good health at this time, and I feel to bless the Lord for it, and for the many favors he has bestowed upon us. I feel my inability and my unworthiness to God, although I trust I have one of the most lively hopes that ever was in man, which no human being can ever take from my breast. I believe that Christ died for just such poor unworthy souls as mine. God has commended his love to sinners: 'If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead thou shalt be saved, for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.' I now believe in the salvation of the whole human family. The Scriptures confirm this fact, and I trust that I shall be the last man to give it up, until God shows me differently.

I will now relate a fact, and one which I have kept all but silent for about thirty years, and I feel guilty for it, and will conceal it no longer. The reason why I kept ti to myself was, that I was afraid people would not believe it, but now I feel it my duty to proclaim it. When I lay on a sick bed and thought I was dying, I shook hands with my friends, and bade them all farewell. My father sat at the foot of my bed and cried like a child; he could not feel reconciled to give me up.—While he was speaking a veil was removed from my eyes, and I saw the whole family of man before me on a level plain. (I was happy in God.) They all wore a beautiful smile upon their countenances that convinced me that our Saviour loved us all alike. I looked on them a few moments and they vanished. Then I saw in the heavens another family, just about as large as the first, composed of little children of one or two years old. They were all singing and praising the Lord! If ever there was a happy soul on earth, I was one! They looked as if they stood upon nothing, and all on a level. Now I believe we shall never be born again until we are clothed with a heavenly body, and go to a heavenly kingdom. This confirmed my belief in the salvation of the whole human family. It is not in the power of man to make me believe otherwise; for the Scriptures teach 'that every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, of things in earth, and of things under the earth, and that every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' I do not any more believe in an endless hell, than I do that God's anger will endure forever, for we read that he 'will not be always wroth.' Christ has showed his loveliness to me a poor sinner! I am willing the whole world should see this letter if they will excuse my penmanship and learning. I write fearless of what men may say. I do not fear when I speak the truth, for truth is mighty and will prevail.

A friend to all, R. G. C.

The Mormons.

The public have been informed, during several months past, by notices in the secular papers, and by placards at the corners of the streets, of the existence of a Church in Boston, which assumes the name of 'Latter Day Saints,' or 'Mormons.' They have engaged Boylston Hall, at the southerly part of the city, and have regular religious exercises every Sabbath, and occasional evening lectures during the week.

The Mormons allege that the aborigines of this country were descendants of Joseph and Ephraim; that they came to this land at the time of the Assyrian captivity; that they were once a mighty Nation, and inhabited some of those ruined cities which have lately been discovered on this continent; they allege that our Saviour, while on earth came to this country, and established his gospel here; and that the son of Mormon, the author of the 'Book of Mormon,' was the last of the prophets on this continent.

The 'Book of Mormon' professes to be a history of the descendants of Joseph and Ephraim. The original, the Mormons say, was written in the reformed Egyptian language, having the appearance of gold, and was hidden, with the Urim and Thummim (two transparent stones) in a stone box, and buried in the earth, at a place near Palmyra, more than a thousand years ago. The location of the box was revealed, by miraculous means to certain individuals now living, and was translated by 'Joseph Smith, jr.,' whom, the title page asserts, is 'author (!) and proprietor.' The Mormons consider this 'Book' to be of equal authority with the Bible, and that the Bible speaks of it, and predicts its appearance, (Isa. xxix. 11,) 'For the vision of all is become unto you as the words of a book that is sealed; [this book, the Mormons say, is the 'Book of Mormon,'] which men deliver unto one that is learned, [Professor Anthon, of New York,] saying, read this, I pray thee; and he saith, I cannot, for it is sealed, [the Professor was unable to read the words of their 'Book,'] and the book is delivered to him that is not learned, [Joseph Smith, jr.] saying, read this, I pray thee; and he saith, I am not learned.' But, the Mormons say, notwithstanding his want of learning, by the help of the Urim and Thummim, he did translate the 'Book.'

The Mormons insist that the gift of healing, the gift of prophecy, the gift of tongues, and the other gifts and blessings which were bestowed upon believers in the time of the apostles, are not yet done away, but continue to be bestowed upon those who embrace the truth as they understand it, and who receive the Holy Ghost from an 'authorized priesthood.' And this bold doctrine they put forth not as mere theory, but they undertake to reduce it to practice, at least in regard to the matter of healing.

One of their most prominent preachers is Elder G. J. Adams, of New York, formerly of the Methodist persuasion, the same individual who held the famous discussion on Mormonism with Dr. West, at the Marlboro' Chapel, last Summer. As a speaker he is by no means destitute of eloquence or power.—His performances, like those of other Mormon preachers, are all extemporaneous, and exhibit much tact and respectable reasoning powers.

On Sunday afternoon, Feb. 26, near the close of the usual services at Boylston Hall, Elder Adams gave notice that one of the brethren who had lately been baptized would be confirmed immediately after the close of the exercises. The ceremony consisted of laying on of hands by the minister and Elder, and an address to the individual confirmed.—Among other things the speaker informed him that 'not many months hence, he should lay his hands on the sick, and they should be healed; and that he should be enabled to speak in tongues which he had never learned.'

After the ceremony of confirmation was concluded, several females present, who were afflicted with diseases, requested the Elder to lay his hands on them and heal them. He consented; and probably we shall soon hear of several remarkable cures performed by him.

The Elder then made an address to the audience, in which he expatiated at length upon the necessity of faith, and made mention of the fact that when our Saviour was sojourning in a certain place he performed not many mighty works there because of their [the people's] unbelief. He stated that 'if any individual was afflicted with headache or any other complaint, and would send for him, even if it was in the middle of the night, he would come to them, and pray with them, and lay his hands upon them, and that according to their faith, so should it be done unto them.'

Should the afflicted individuals recover, in the Elder's case, (which perhaps they would have done without his aid,) it will probably be proclaimed as a mighty miracle, but should they fail to recover, the failure may be attributed to the want of faith. We do not mean to be so rude as to insinuate that the Elder ever thought of this mode of meeting a question which might arise in some minds about the genuineness of his miracles, but we think he cannot but perceive that in case of a failure it will answer his purpose completely.

But the Mormons are not without redeeming qualities. They expose Millerism, and the tricks of modern revivalists, with boldness and power. They teach that the honest in heart, in every sect and denomination, will receive the favor of heaven, and that there will be no end to the salvation of God. They have little to do with the disputed theological questions which divide the community, and among those who have a large developement of marvellousness they will undoubtedly gain many converts. O.

The advantage—A new kind of hope, &c.

Br. WHITTEMORE:—I wish to give you and the readers of the 'Trumpet' a few words in relation to a new kind of hope which some good people cherish in this part of the world.

The writer of this article delivered a lecture at Weathersfield Bow, Vt. from the text, 'The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God.' The Rev. Mr. Dudley, an Orthodox preacher, residing at the above named place, replied to the same, in a discourse delivered a short time since. After he had gone part way through with his sermon, and had given pretty much the same meaning of the original words sometimes translated hell in our common English version, he then told his hearers, that the Universalists had one advantage; which advantage was this, that they give the true meaning of the word hell.—Thanks to the Rev. gentleman for so deserving a compliment. Is not this an advantage worth having? an advantage of giving the true meaning of the Scriptures! If the gentleman should keep on in his reviews of Universalist expositions of Scripture, and be as honest in all, it will not be long before he will find that they have the advantage of giving the true meaning of all those texts, generally used by their opponents to prove an endless hell.

Suffer us to ask a question. What advantage do our Orthodox brethren have, when they give their people to understand, that the words translated hell, often refer to a place of endless torment? Do they sometimes have the advantage of fixing the minds of their hearers on erroneous creeds, by giving the wrong meaning of Scripture? We pity those who are using such advantages. But something more curious, yet melancholy, to relate! After the gentleman had gone through with his discourse, and having found nothing to prove the existence of an endless hell, he then told his Christian brethren, that they ought to 'cherish the hope of the existence of a hell in the future world; (endless, I suppose, as the gentleman believes in endless punishment.) I have heard much about 'obtaining a hope,' and the like; but I had no idea that it was ever a hope that some would go to an endless hell, or, that there is such a place where some will go. Now is not this a most gloomy hope? Do our Orthodox brethren rejoice in this hope? Is it a comforting hope to them? Does it fill their benevolent souls with heavenly love? Can it be that they cherish such a malignant desire? such a terrible hope?—When they cannot prove an endless hell, are they in duty bound to hope for it? We presume that this is their 'faith, the substance of things hoped for—the evidence of things not seen.' We pity those who cherish such a hope—or those who have such a desire, that there may be an endless hell.

God grant that ere long all such may have the glorious hope that all will be redeemed from sin and evil, and be made holy and happy. May they have more benevolent desires, and may the gospel of the Son of God shine into their understandings, and warm their hearts with a glow of Supreme love to God, and universal love to mankind. Such is the desire of R. S. SANBORN.

Perkinsville, Vt.

Do not Touch it.

Sin is like pitch; it will not only cling to you if you handle it, but it will defile you if you only touch it. Set your face against it in whatever form it may appear.

I remember hearing a tale on this subject:—A poor man who was employed in digging, every now and then left off his labor, and said aloud, as he leaned on his spade, 'O Adam, Adam!' It chanced that a rich man for whom he was working, passed by, and heard him. The rich man asked him why he so frequently called on Adam. 'O,' said the poor man, 'I cry out, O Adam, Adam! and much reason have I to do so, for had not Adam, the father of us all, been so foolish as to eat of the forbidden fruit, I should not now be thus obliged to get my bread by the sweat of the brow.—Had I been in his place I would have had nothing to do with the forbidden fruit. No! I would not have touched it.'

A short time after the rich man sent for the poor man, and taking him into a room where a sumptuous table was spread over with dainties, he told him to sit down and eat his fill. 'Every day,' said he, 'you may return and do the same, on condition that you will not eat of the dish that is covered over in the middle of the table;—but if you even touch that, you shall return here no more.'

The rich man went away, and the poor man left to himself began to eat of the dainties, thinking in his own mind, 'so long as I can have such fare as this, I do not care a fig about the dish in the middle of the table.'

When he had satisfied his hunger, and tasted of almost every dish, he looked at the cup in the middle, and felt that he should like to know very well what was under it. Not that he had any wish to eat of it, whatever it might be, for he had taken enough already, but he wanted sadly to look at it; if he could only know what it was he would be satisfied.

From the moment the desire entered his heart, it grew stronger and stronger. He remembered, however that he was forbidden to touch the dish, and so he sat looking at the cover in a very discontented spirit.

Whenever a person is about to commit a sin, and begins to reason upon it, instead of going directly away from the temptation, he is pretty sure to find out some way of committing sin, and justifying or excusing himself. The poor man looked towards the middle of the table until the thought struck him, that though he was forbidden to touch the dish, he had not been forbidden to touch the cover which was placed over it; there could be no harm in doing that; besides it was impossible that any one could ever know that he had touched it.

One single peep, then, he was determined to have; so he gently lifted up one side of the cover, when, to his dismay, out ran a mouse.

In vain he endeavored to catch the little creature, but it was too nimble for him, and hid itself first behind one dish and then another. He tried again and again to lay hold of the mouse, until in the confusion he knocked down a dish upon the floor. The noise of the broken dish brought in the rich man, who dismissed the poor man from his house forever. 'Go,' said he, and return again to your labor, and never more complain of Adam for eating the forbidden fruit. When you think of Adam, and of the tree in the middle of the garden, think also of the dish in the middle of the table.'

I believe that many of us, like the poor man, are apt to think more of the errors of others than of our own; but let us learn from him, not to venture a little way to disobedience, lest we go further than we intend, and meet our deserved reward. Never mind how trifling sin may appear, let it alone; do not touch it.

Family Religion.

'As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.'—Joshua xxiv. 15.

This passage of Scripture induces certain very profitable reflections. Joshua was the leader of the children of Israel, after the death of Moses. He led them over Jordan, into the promised land, into which Moses was not permitted to go. After he had seen them established, he had the most earnest desires for their future greatness and prosperity; and he assured them that they should be protected and blessed, if they would serve the Lord. In the performance of that duty lay all their security, all their happiness, all their prosperity. Being stricken in age, Joshua gathered all the elders of the tribes together, and recounted to them the past mercies of the Lord to their nation. From this he urged upon them their obligations to 'fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and truth; and to put away the gods which their fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt; and to serve the Lord.' He then put the two cases before them: 'If it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose ye this day whom ye will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served which were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell.' But he told them his mind was made up; his resolution was formed. 'As for me and my house, we WILL serve the Lord.'

This passage of Scripture suggests very profitable reflections. Joshua stood at the head of the Jewish nation; but he did not forget, in the weight of his public cares, the obligations he owed to his own household. He knew that the duty first began with himself. 'As for me,' he says, and 'for my house,' &c. He puts himself first. His first duty was to take care of his own heart, to purify himself. His first resolution concerned himself. Now let every head of a family take a lesson from this fact. Let every father know, and in the absence of the father, let the mother know, that a great responsibility rests upon the head of the family. Let every father ask, how is it with myself? Am I what I ought to be? Are my examples such as I should rejoice to see my children follow? Is my influence throughout my household what it should be?—This is the first care of a parent, his earliest responsibility.

2. The next obligation of a parent, or head of a family, is towards his household. How shall an irreligious father, make a religious house?—How can a godless father, make a godly house? All the responsibility then which we see in the second head of the subject, is reflected back upon the first. It is the duty of every father to look well to his household,—to set them examples of industry, frugality, prudence, charity, patience and piety. And if he looks well to himself, he will do so. One drop of poison at the fountain, will be sure to infect more or less the whole stream. Children usually inherit the predominant passions of their parents; and those passions which need the most restraint in the parent, will need the most restraint in the child.—If the parent, then, not taking heed to himself, should suffer his passions to gain the mastery, he will excite the same passions in his children, and his influence in that way instead of tending to their good, will tend directly to their injury. Let us remember, then, our responsibilities to our household. If we do not serve the Lord, they probably will not; we must, therefore, by our example, persuasion, and authority, do all we can to lead our household to the service of God.

3. But it will be asked, what is meant by serving God? We answer, to serve God is to worship and obey him. It is to put away all false gods, of whatever nature,—to give him our highest love, our highest reverence, our constant obedience. We do not serve God if we never think of him; if we never send up to him some token of our gratitude; if we never lift up the soul to him in prayer; if we never sing his praise. There ought to be in every family, a constant recognition of the goodness of God. We know that no man can serve God faithfully, unless he discharges the duties of industry, economy, patience, temperance and charity. Who would be said to serve God, who neglected these things?—But are these not other duties? Is it not necessary to have a constant recognition of the divine presence and goodness? of our dependence on Him? of our duty to trust in Him for time and for eternity? We ought to educate the religious, as well as the moral and intellectual natures of our children. Now, he that cometh to God, must believe that He is. We must impress upon our families, living ideas of the existence of God.—But will our children think we believe in God, if we never speak of him? Prayer is inseparable from a strong faith in God, as inseparable as light is from the sun. This brings us to consider family worship. Formal worship is the outward sign of inward love and reverence. Is it not a help to the cultivation of religious emotions? Family worship will have an influence on all who listen. We may not see its effects immediately. But > 'Though seed lie buried long in dust,

> It sha'nt deceive our hope,
> The precious grain cannot be lost,
> For grace ensures the crop.'

A father conducting family worship at proper times, exercises a wide influence on the hearts of his children. In this way we cultivate the religious affections. But let us remember, that this is not all that is intended by serving the Lord.

> 'Th' uplifted eye, and bended knee,
> Are but vain homage, Lord, to thee.'

That is, if they are not accompanied with sincerity of heart. And if they are accompanied with sincerity, the result will be seen in our conduct. If the heart is like the dead and sapless root of a tree, we may have the form of godliness, but cannot have the power, as there may be the form of a tree, where there is no life; but if the heart be filled with grace, like the living root, filled with sap, and nurtured by heavenly dew, then it will spread into every branch and twig of human conduct, and all will bear fruit. We must, then, avoid all hypocrisy; but we must cultivate the reign of grace in the soul.

Such is the way to serve God. And is not this the happiest life to live? The service of God is consistent with the highest degree of human happiness; those are most happy who truly serve God the most. Wisdom's ways are pleasant, all her paths are peace.

> 'O happy is the man who hears
> Instruction's faithful voice,
> And who celestial wisdom makes
> His early only choice.'

Perhaps we shall be told that God requires men to 'serve him with fear and rejoice with trembling.' Truly said, he does; and he also requires us to serve him 'with gladness, and to come before his presence with singing,' the sign of joy. The fear spoken of above, is not the fear that hath torment, for perfect love casteth out all such fear; but it is that fear or reverence, which is the beginning of true wisdom, and true wisdom is, as we have shown, the source of all happiness.

What incentives there are for every parent to say, in the language of Joshua, 'As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.' Begin, parent, with yourself. Bring yourself into subjection. O how often do we fail here; how often do our passions carry us unlawfully away. The more need is there then for a praying spirit.—Serve the Lord, yourself, father, mother. Do you see these sons and daughters growing up around you? Remember your duty to them.—Show them that you love a religious life; and then you will induce them to love it too. Parent think of it, think of it again and again, and say, 'As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.'

The 'Christian Watchman' right.

The 'Christian Watchman,' the Baptist journal of this city, has uttered a truth below in reference to the policy of Millerism. Here follows the paragraph:

'CAN THE END SANCTIFY THE MEANS?—'Well,' say the wavering adherents to Mr. Miller, 'if we are deceived, yet our meetings are doing good. Some souls are saved, whose attention might not have been arrested.' This is a great and prevalent error of the age; if there are some signs of a religious wakening, nothing must be said against men or measures, be they who or what they may.'

Thank you, Mr. Watchman. You are right, sir. The Miller preachers justify their errors, by saying, 'if we are deceived, yet our meetings are doing good.' They are doing hurt. But even if they were doing good, it would be no excuse for the deception. Deception is wrong; and the imaginary good consequences are no justification for it. But the 'Watchman' applies its remarks to all religious awakenings. He does not hold, that 'if there are some signs of a religious awakening, nothing must be said against men or measures, be they who or what they may.' This is the true ground. Corruptions are often justified on the principle,—we must say nothing now, lest we stop the revival. The 'Watchman' repudiates such a position. It is no proof of the excellence of any thing, because it produces excitement. Let us know whether the measure be right in itself. If so, we will approve it; if not, we will condemn. The ground the 'Watchman' takes in regard to Millerism, we take in regard to all excitements.

'Ladies' Repository.'

The 'Ladies' Repository' for March, was received several days since. This number sustains the well-earned reputation of the work. 'The Great Principle,' by the editor, is an excellent article. We give the table of contents of the present number:—'The Great Principle—Winter—Lights and Shadows—The Death Chamber—England—Past Immortality—Modern Samaritans—A Memorial of Happy Days—Veneration—The World Above—Beautiful Selections—Sabbath Hymn—Moral Revenge—'Boz' at Niagara—Hagar and her Son in the Wilderness—The excellent Loving Kindness of God—Reveries—Lady Rachel Russell—Weep not; weep not to leave the Home—Gossipings of Idle Hours—Genevieve—A few Hints on Millerism—Christ Crucified—Editor's Book Table.'

Practical effect of Millerism.

A minister in this neighborhood preached on the Second Coming of Christ, a Sabbath or two since, and gave his reasons for his belief that it would not take place in 1843. A Millerite was much offended—and yet this same man, although he expects, before the close of the year, to meet this minister at the judgment-seat of Christ, literally owes him, and has, for three years, for 8 bushels of potatoes. Reader, draw your inference.

Query.—Is it that man's duty to spend his time at Miller's Camp Meetings—or to work, and pay his debts? A LOVER OF HONESTY.

The above is from the notorious 'Puritan.'—We have heard of several cases of the believers in Millerism repudiating their debts. They say, the Lord is coming; money is nothing; property is nothing; it makes no difference who shall have the wealth when the Lord comes; and there is no need of paying debts therefore. One zealous Br. said, 'The Lord will pay all my debts next year.' We advise the Millerites to pay their debts, and not try to cheat honest people (who have no faith in their vagaries) out of their honest due.

Dover, N. H.

Br. Nye, in the 'Star' states, that our cause is prospering in Dover, N. H. under the labors of Br. E. Francis. The congregation is increasing, and a fine bell has just been put into the tower of their church. Br. F. has the cause much at heart.

Distressing Effects of Miller Excitements.

All over the country, there are awful evidences of the baneful tendency of the excitement produced by the vagary of William Miller, in regard to the end of the world. Many, many are the cases of insanity, and not a few of suicide, which are to be attributed to that delusion. Some persons are half inclined to believe, that the abettors of it are liable to indictment for the injury they are doing,—not for their faith, but for the insanity and suicides they occasion. The following, from the Newark Advertiser, gives an account of three deaths in one family, attributable to the same cause:

A DISTRESSING CASE OF POISONING.—One of the most distressing cases of this sort occurred in this city yesterday. The wife of Mr. Jonathan S. Leverich, a respectable mechanic, having been unwell some days, exhibited evident symptoms of mental alienation on Tuesday. Yesterday morning, after her husband had left for his work, she placed a portion of arsenic in a cup of coffee, telling a daughter about 12 years of age that it was magnesia, for the two younger children, and going with them into another room divided the fatal dose between the two little ones and herself. A neighbor coming in soon after, the daughter mentioned that the mother had administered medicine to the two children, and the dreadful fact was soon inferred, when medical aid was immediately procured. It came, however, too late, as the quantity taken rendered all interposition fruitless. The eldest child, a boy of 2 1-2 years, died in less than two hours, the infant, aged 8 months, in three, and the mother in nine hours, at about 6 o'clock last evening.—Having seen indications which excited his apprehensions, her physician earnestly advised some days previous that she should be constantly watched, and not be left alone. The distressing result proves the wisdom of the advice, and the importance of a strict regard to medical counsel in like cases.

A wholesome warning is also derived from the fact that the arsenic had been in the house some years, and that Mrs. L. had resisted the temptation to administer it during her infatuation up to the fatal hour, and yielded at last to a fearful apprehension that she could not recover her own health, and that her little ones must suffer in the world if she should be taken from them. It is said further that her mind had been troubled some time on the subject of Millerism, though we do not learn that she said much on that subject during her last moments. It is believed, however, by her friends that it had much influence on her mind, and had its effect in producing the fatal consequences here recorded. She expressed her feelings on the subject to a neighbor some time since.

We understand that Mrs. L. appeared to recover her senses as she became conscious of her dreadful situation, and deeply deplored the course into which she had been so fatally beguiled.

Partialists in favor of Capital Punishment.

We have before adverted to the fact, that the partialists are most zealously defending the continuance of Capital Punishment. This may not be true of every individual man of them; but of many of the leaders it is true. Those who believe and rejoice in the doctrine of endless damnation, we should not suppose would find much difficulty in contemplating capital executions.—The doctrine hardens their hearts, and renders them ripe for scenes of blood. In order to bring the effort to abolish the punishment of death into disfavor, the orthodox editors are endeavoring to persuade the community, that Universalists are the principal agents in that matter. We hope all Universalists will do their duty in this thing; but they are by no means the only advocates of the measure. It embraces many of the kind, amiable and benevolent of other denominations. The 'Puritan' recommends a general effort on the part of the partialists to sustain the present law, as will be seen by the following article:

The question as to the expediency and necessity of capital punishments, for the highest grade of offences, is now agitated in many parts of the country. We deem it a question of vital interest to the well being of society. So far as we are advised, the abolition of capital punishments is urged with the greatest vehemence by Universalists and others, who would abolish, were it possible, all laws human and divine, for the purpose more particularly of effacing from the conscience all fear of the eternal punishment of the wicked in the future world. We fear that unless the friends of God and man firmly maintain the true ground in relation to this subject, capital punishments will be abolished in several of the States, by the combined exertions of the political and religious heresiarchs of the times.

We would take the liberty respectfully to suggest to pastors of the Churches the expediency of bringing this subject prominently before their congregations, on the approaching Annual Fast, or at such other time as may better suit their convenience. The combined exertions of the enemies of social order to overthrow our time-honored and cherished institutions will, we hope, awaken its friends, both clerical and lay, to more determined efforts to preserve them.

Further consequences of Millerism.

Accounts have become quite common in the secular papers, of insanity and suicide produced by the Miller delusion, concerning the end of the world. When will the community awake to their danger from this species of fanaticism? We copy the following from the 'Star and Palladium.'

'Insanity and Millerism. A young gentleman from Providence passed through this city, on Saturday, on his way to the New Hampshire Asylum for the insane, a raving maniac, made so entirely by the Miller delusion.'

Harvard University.

The Rev. Hosea Ballou, 2nd, of Medford, was elected one of the overseers of Harvard University, on Thursday the 2nd inst. The Board consists of the Governor of the Commonwealth, the members of the Council, and of the Senate, and of such other persons as may be from time to time elected. Hitherto Harvard College has been exclusively under the control of Unitarians. The Corporation (who have the immediate government) have been altogether of that faith, we believe, as have also a large majority of the permanent overseers. The Legislative members of the Board believe, that the College is a State Institution; that it should not be under the exclusive jurisdiction of any particular sect; and that as the Board is constituted in part of the clergy, they should be selected from the different sects among us. The following is the account of the late meeting.

Agreeably to a vote of the Board, on the 16th ult. an adjourned meeting was holden on the 2nd inst., in the Senate Chamber, at 1 o'clock, P. M. His Excellency, Gov. Morton, in the Chair.—President Quincy communicated the fact that the Corporation had accepted the act of the Legislature adopted at the last meeting of the Board of Overseers. A ballot was then made for a permanent member of the Board, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the Rev. Dr. Channing.

The whole number of votes was 64; of which Hosea Ballou, 2nd, of Medford, had 38, Rev. G. Putnam, (Unitarian) 12, Rev. Jacob Ide, (Orthodox) 8, and there were 6 scattering. The Rev. HOSEA BALLOU, 2ND, of Medford, was accordingly declared elected, and the Board adjourned, sine die.

1 Thess. iv. 13—18.

'But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words.'

The object of the apostle, in the above passage (let it be remembered), was to impart COMFORT to the believing Thessalonians, in regard to their departed unconverted friends. They had had dearly loved friends, who had died in heathen ignorance, and they had much sorrow of heart, on their account. The object of the apostle was to dispel this sorrow, which he does by calling their attention very particularly to the doctrine of the gospel concerning the resurrection. The sorrow of the Thessalonians arose, not from christian knowledge, but from their ignorance; and Paul says, 'I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep.' Here observe, Paul knew that their anxiety proceeded from their ignorance. They had not a full knowledge of Christianity; they were not possessed, in all its vigor, of the christian hope. He desired to remove their ignorance, by giving them knowledge; he desired to remove their sorrow by giving them hope; he desired that they should not sorrow, as those who had no knowledge of the gospel, and of course had no hope. That the whole intent of the apostle was to give them comfort, is evident from the 18th verse, at which the particular subject is closed, viz. 'COMFORT one another with these words.'—As if he had said, think of these things; there is nothing here but COMFORT; talk about them one to another; give each other comfort; let every heart be filled with joy. Such was his closing exhortation, appertaining to this subject.

He refers them (verse 14) to the christian faith. Christians believe that Jesus died and rose again. That was the great fact, the rock on which the Church is built. Well, if we believe this, says Paul, let us remember that them also which sleep, God will by or through Jesus bring with him. Jesus is not to be raised alone; his resurrection is the pledge of the resurrection of mankind. God has judged all moral and intellectual beings to be worthy, in the scale of being in which he has placed them, of a resurrection from the dead. In that resurrection, they shall be 'as the angels of God in heaven,' Matt. xxii. 30; they shall 'die no more, but shall be equal unto the angels, and shall be the children of God, being the children of the resurrection,' Luke xx. 35, 36. Such are the words of our Lord himself; and no passage of Scripture must be so interpreted as to contradict what he has said. The dead are to be brought to life, in, by (dia) or through Jesus. ALL are thus to be brought to life, for 'As in Adam ALL die, even so in Christ shall ALL be made alive,' 1 Cor. xv. 22. All then are to be brought to life through Christ. Thus the Improved Version translates the 14th verse: 'For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again; so also that God, through Jesus, will bring with him those also that are fallen asleep,' i. e. that are dead. All the dead are here meant; for if it mean only those who had been converted to Christianity, would it have given comfort to the Thessalonians, who (thro' their ignorance) were in sorrow in regard to their departed heathen friends? We assert again, it must mean all the dead, for if the resurrection of all the dead is not taught in the 14th verse, we cannot prove from any part of the apostle's argument, that all the dead are to be raised. 'If we believe that Jesus died and rose, even them that sleep, will God through Jesus bring with him.' Thus we see the resurrection of all the dead is declared; and they are to remain 'ever with the Lord.' Well might Paul say, 'Comfort one another with these words,' which he could not have said, if he had inculcated in any manner the doctrine of endless misery; for in that doctrine is no comfort. It would be, if true, a source of the greatest anguish.

At the 15th verse, Paul proceeds to another matter. He had spoken of the state of all the dead; and now nothing remained to him, but to show what shall become of those who shall be alive when the resurrection shall take place.—For when that great event shall transpire, there will be a generation alive upon the earth; and what shall become of them? He spake only of two classes, the living and the dead. He had shown that the dead were to be raised into the resurrection state with Jesus; and having settled that point, he proceeded to show what shall become of those who may be alive, when the resurrection shall take place.

Verse 15: 'For this I say unto you, by the word (or authority) of the Lord, that we (or those) which are ALIVE and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep;' i. e. they shall be no hindrance to those who are dead. And why? Because the dead are to rise first, as the 16th verse teaches. 'For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God; and the dead, in Christ, shall rise first'—i. e. the dead shall rise first in Christ; the dead shall take priority of those who may be alive at that time; the dead shall rise first in Christ, for 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive;' and after the dead shall have been raised, 'then we which are alive, and remain, shall [not be cast down to hell, but] be caught up together with them (those raised from the dead) in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord.'

This then was the ground of christian comfort:—the dead shall be raised like Christ, before the living shall be changed from mortal to immortal beings; and then the living shall be caught up to meet them above, and all shall dwell forever with Jesus. We can in truth 'comfort one another with THESE words.' Such an exhortation is reasonable, taken in connexion with our view of the subject.

Let it be carefully observed, that there is not the slightest hint in the passage we are examining, of the resurrection of any portion of the human race to a state of misery. All who are raised are raised into the same condition, and that condition is expressed as follows:—'So shall we ever be with the Lord.' The apostle asserted the resurrection of all who sleep, or die; and not of a part. His express object was to encourage and comfort such as mourned in regard to their departed unconverted relatives; he intended to teach that and that only which would give them joy.

We offer the above to the consideration of those who have requested an exposition of the above passage. In the 5th chapter, we believe the apostle goes to another distinct subject, viz. the 'times and seasons,' a subject by itself, and having no connexion with the immortal resurrection of the dead. The same subject is mentioned Acts i. 7, and in certain other places. We will, if possible, next week show, that the 5th chapter treats of another subject, not at all connected with the great subject discussed in the concluding part of the 4th chapter. We must always be careful to observe, where one subject begins, and another ends.

Conference at Danvers.

It was not our happiness to be present at the late Conference in Danvers, holden on Wednesday, of last week. We felt the privation the more, because we have attended the greater part of the meetings of that character, which have been recently holden in the county of Essex; and we know how rich and excellent they have been. But circumstances on the morning of that day, prevented our going down.

We are happy to learn, that the meeting was truly good and profitable. The sleighing never was better, and large numbers of brethren and sisters were present from all the surrounding towns. We know not who all the speakers were; but we have heard that Brs. Everett, Austin, Livermore, Bulkley, Barden, J. H. Willis, Leonard, Atkinson and Damon were present of the clergy, who all took parts in the exercises. We shall not undertake to give the names of the laymen who spoke; we have not sufficient information to justify the attempt. All desired to do their duty.—The subjects chosen were more interesting and profitable than usual; and Br. Austin was led to express the opinion, that he thought this the best meeting of the kind he had ever attended.

The Universalist Meeting-House was filled to overflowing in the morning; the crowd increased to that degree in the afternoon, that it was found utterly impracticable to occupy the same place. Leave was obtained to use the Baptist Church, which is much larger; and this was filled in every part with the listening crowd. The Conference Hymns were used, and hundreds of voices joined in the chorus of praise.

In the evening it became necessary to divide the audience, the larger part being accommodated in the Universalist Meeting-House, and the rest in the Vestry. The above facts we have obtained from a brother who was present; but we have not received a sufficiently definite account of the services, to be able to speak with more particularity. It is probable the meeting was adjourned to some one of the neighboring towns; but we have not as yet heard to what place.

We have since learned that the meeting was adjourned to Salem, to be holden on Wednesday, the 15th inst. in the Mechanics' Hall.

Since the above was written, we have received the following cheering account from a correspondent:

Br. WHITTEMORE,—Not seeing you present at our last Conference, I suppose an account of the same would be interesting to you and many of your readers. The influence of such meetings is not limited to those who are so fortunate as to attend, but it extends far and wide, (as a good Br. remarked) as an account of the same extends. Being present at an early hour, I had an opportunity to notice all the movements. The weather was very pleasant, and the sleighing first rate; and at an early hour, our brethren and sisters came pouring into the place by sleigh loads containing from 4 to 50 each. The Universalist Meeting-House was thronged in the forenoon; and the committee of the Society believing that their house could not accommodate all in the afternoon and evening, waited upon the committee of the Baptist Society and requested permission to use their Church. We were truly gratified when we heard the announcement that they had generously consented that we might occupy their house in the afternoon, and also in the evening, if they could make arrangements to accommodate us (they having previously appointed a meeting there). For this act of brotherly love and kindness they received the heartfelt thanks of all present, and (what is far better) an inward satisfaction that they had done a neighbourly kindness.

The ministering brethren of the vicinity were all present, with Brs. Willis and Barden, of South Reading, and our good Br. Gardner, of Iowa, of the West, and Brs. Bulkley and Leonard, of the East.

We dispensed with the regular exercises of a sermon, &c. and commenced immediately with a conference, in which the laymen assisted, or I should rather say, in which a few of the clergymen took part. Suffice it to say that the forenoon exercises were directly calculated to prepare our minds for a true gospel feast, such as we have not had before.

In the afternoon, it seemed that all our brethren round about had caught the spirit, for they came in multitudes, which brought forth the remark from some of our good Baptists, 'that they had no idea their were so many Universalists in the world.'

At half past 1 o'clock, half an hour before the time appointed, the Baptist house was completely thronged in every part; pulpit, aisles, galleries and all—and what a meeting! I cannot describe it! You ought to have been present to have witnessed and felt it—those walls echoed and re-echoed the praises of our Father in heaven, and were made to resound in the glorious truths which we as Universalists prize above all things.

I thought it would be impossible to have a more glorious season than you described at Lynn; but those who were present at that meeting, said they must give up and acknowledge that this was the best yet. Br. Austin said it was the happiest day of his life, and I suppose all hearts would respond, Amen. The meeting continued three hours with one unbroken interest, and when it was announced that the afternoon was spent, it seemed to surprise us all; we thought we had not been there more than one hour. But thus it was and we must part. The thought came into my mind, what will the small Society in this place do with all the friends from abroad? I thought it would be impossible for them all to be accommodated; but I was disappointed, for their houses and their hearts were open to receive them; and all were made welcome, and all were well provided for. But what, was asked, shall we do in the evening? Our Baptist friends could not conveniently grant us their house. We cannot all get into the Universalist house if we tarry; so many said and returned home.

I went to the house at an early hour. The streets were all alive with believers, wending their way to another glorious feast, and when I arrived it was with great difficulty that I made my way through the aisle, the house was so thronged. I have seen a full house (so called) before; but never did I see any house so completely crammed as this was. The pews which ordinarily seat only six, contained some of them 15, and some of them 17—so that it was calculated that the pews would at the least average twelve apiece, and as for the pulpit, aisles, galleries, entry, &c. they were one mass of solid heads. After the house was thus crammed, the small vestry near the house was filled; and I am told that they had a glorious meeting there—many came who were obliged to go away. And now some of your readers may ask, what has waked up the believers in the great salvation in this vicinity? You need no answer to this question; but for the benefit of such as make the inquiry, I will say that we are beginning to feel the influences of our faith, and I trust this influence will not only be manifested in meetings like these, but will be carried into all the walks of life. Br. Whittemore, it is beginning to operate there. I see it every day. And may it be our prayer to live more and more according to its glorious requirements.

Our next meeting is at Salem, on the 15th inst. and we are expecting the largest meeting ever known of our order. M.

Adam Clarke confutes Miller.

Adam Clarke, the Methodist commentator, wields a strong argument against the Miller theory, although that theory had not been broached in his day. We find an article in a late number of the 'Palladium,' from the pen of Br. Geo. W. Quinby, touching this matter. Dr. Clarke spent about forty years in studying the Old Testament: yet he speaks doubtfully of the meaning of those prophetic years in Daniel with which Mr. Miller is so familiar, that he can predict the end of the world, to a year and to a month. But hear Dr. Clarke.

'But we are left totally in the dark,' says Dr. Clarke, 'relative to the time from which these 1335 years are to be reckoned. If, however, we reckon from the above epoch, A. D. 612, when Mohammedanism arose, they lead us to A. D. 1947, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in; and thus a final closure of vision and prophecy be made, as when all the great events relative to the salvation of men shall have taken place. Wars and contentions will probably then cease over the whole world; Jews and Gentiles become one fold, under one Shepherd and Bishop of souls; and the triune God be properly worshipped and glorified, from generation to generation, over the face of the whole earth. But all these conjectures may be founded in darkness—WE HAVE NO CHRONOLOGICAL DATA; and the 'times and seasons' God has reserved in his own power.'

It will be seen from the above, that where men of much research are doubtful, the ignorant will be very positive; and there will never be wanting people sufficiently credulous, to believe any enormous theory that an ignoramus may devise.

Another Death from Fanaticism.

The awful excitements which sometimes take place at Methodist meetings in the Western contry, are becoming subjects of serious alarm among the kind and philosophic portion of the community. We suspect the excitements in that part of the country are carried far beyond any thing we see among us. A circumstance has recently occurred at Georgetown, Brown county, Ohio, which is truly appalling. The circumstances are stated as follows in the 'Star in the West.'

My informant is the Hon. Thomas L. Hamer, a near neighbor to the man whose life paid the forfeit of an intemperate indulgence in religious excitement and fanaticism. Mr. H. stated that he has known the man for many years; he was one of the most honest and best men he was ever acquainted with—had been a Methodist for twenty years. His brethren persuaded him that he ought to strain for sanctification, and he accordingly set about the work in earnest, by fasting, prayer, &c.; and at their late protracted (or rather distracted) meeting, in the midst of one of their intemperate glees, he was taken with a paralysis, and when he recovered from it, he was a raving maniac; he was taken from the church to a neighboring house, his own dwelling being just out of town. They hardly gave him rest day or night, but continued their singing, shouts, and groans, contrary to the advice of physicians, and the entreaty of friends. They would not even consent he should be removed to his own house; said there was no danger, the Lord would take care of Br. Smith—he would come out bright by and bye, and then he would testify what great things the Lord had done for his soul. I cannot say how long he continued in this state, but I think some 8 or 10 days; when the Lord saw fit to deliver him from his tormentors, and he is now I trust, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest. He has left a wife and family to mourn over the direful effects of Methodism.

The editor of the 'Star in the West,' speaks of the above horrid transaction, in the following heart-felt strain.

It is astonishing that the people will continue to countenance those Methodist excitements that sometimes spread over the country, blasting all that is fair and good. We have insanity on the right hand and the left, produced by the preaching of the God-dishonoring, heaven-daring scheme of endless damnation. New cases of insanity are coming to our knowledge daily.

Universalists! awake! awake!! Contend for your religion, with apostolic zeal. Leave no lawful means untried to extend that faith which alone can stay the ravages of the MONSTER of death and ruin.

The Utica 'Baptist Register' is much disturbed because some of the Baptist churches in this city have been painted in fresco. An attempt has been made to deceive the eye, by representing a deep recess behind the pulpit. The 'Register' says,—'It is all a contrivance of the adversary to divert the attention from the solemn instructions of the speaker to the elegant performances of the artist round about them. It has a direct tendency to open the door to the approval of external pomp and ceremony, and help the devil to catch away the seed as soon as it is sown.'

We think the faith of the Baptists must be amazingly weak, if it can be destroyed by a little fresco painting.

Have we, or have we not paid the tribute that is due to the 'Nazarene' at Philadelphia? If not, we desire to say, that in our judgment it is one of the most neatly printed papers in our denomination. It is edited with much ability and general good taste by Brs. A. Moore and J. H. Gihon.—It is undoubtedly doing much good.

Portsmouth, N. H.

The Universalist Society in this town is in a truly prosperous condition. The Conference Meetings have increased to that degree, that the vestry has been abandoned, and the body of the meeting-house is used. The following article from the 'Palladium and Amulet' is from the pen of Br. Moses Ballou, the pastor.

A REVIVAL.

There seems to be something of an awakening among our friends in this town, in regard to the subject of religion; and though not very noted for noise in such matters, there is really some stir among them. We have had a great deal of Millerism and Knappism in our community, and consequently much excitement. This probably has turned to our advantage, and created among the Universalists a new interest in the cause of truth. Our Conference meetings have become so fully attended this winter, that we have been obliged to leave the vestry and open the body of the church to accommodate the audience. Our laymen are beginning to do their duty in taking an active part in the services; and we hope that the zeal they have awakened may become more permanent than that usually created by revival efforts.

New-Bedford, Mass.

Prosperity of the cause—Conference Meetings—conversion of a Baptist—neighborhood of the 'head of the river'—proposal to build a Church—Millerism, &c. &c.

We have received the following letter from our excellent friend, Br. T. G. Farnsworth, of New-Bedford, Mass. It shows him to be a true shepherd of the flock over which he is placed. It is manifest that the institution of the Conference Meeting has done great good in that place; and from what we know of that place, as well as many others, we commend to all our Societies the necessity of the weekly Conference meeting. We have seen the beneficial results of it in so many instances, that we have no doubts. Such meetings improve the character of men, create religious interests, and win over the good of other sects to the knowledge of the truth which we profess.

New-Bedford, Feb. 25, 1843.

Br. Whittemore,—It affords me pleasure to say that there are evident indications of an outpouring of the divine spirit in this place and vicinity. Since my removal to this town, I have never seen my people manifest so much attention to the preached word as at present; nor have I ever witnessed so deep an interest in our Social Meetings as now pervades a large portion of the flock. Our Vestry meetings—thank Heaven—possess powerful attractions to many, very many hearts, and are fully attended, and exceedingly spiritual. That place has of late been the spiritual birth-place of many a soul. O, it would do your soul good, Br. W., to hear the old, the middle aged, and the young, both male and female, declare what the truth has done for their souls—that they have resolved to follow the Saviour, in his precepts and examples; and beg for the prayers of all that they may continue faithful.—They perceive that they have 'held the truth' too long 'in unrighteousness,' and are fast awaking to an experimental acquaintance with its heavenly spirit and power. On Wednesday evening last three brethren whom I had never before heard speak in meeting, arose and bore testimony to the preciousness of their faith, and to their increased interest in the subject of experimental and practical godliness. One good brother, who was a member, in good standing, of the Baptist Church in this place, has publicly renounced the heart-chilling and God-dishonoring sentiment of endless woe, and embraced the gospel of the grace of God which bringeth salvation to all men. Inasmuch as they had nought to say against his moral or religious character, he requested of the Church a peaceable dismission.—But this it seems was more than their religion (?) would allow them to grant: for, although upon the subject of true religious experience and practice his mind remained unchanged, still, he entertained more extended and liberal views of the character of God—of the great Redeemer, and of the ultimate destiny of the human family than he had formerly cherished, and for this he must not be allowed to depart in peace and friendship; but must be wounded and injured, as far as they had the power to wound and injure—by an indignant ejection. Through the Post Office he received the following letter:

'At a meeting of the Willow Street Baptist Church, held Tuesday afternoon, Jan 24, 1843, it was voted, unanimously, to withdraw the hand of fellowship from Peter Brotherson, for his having embraced the doctrine of Universal Salvation.

'Per order and in behalf of the Church,
'Isaac M. Richardson, Church Clerk.'

This is the second brother who has embraced the faith once delivered to the saints and joined our ranks from the above Church within the past ten months. And I have good reason to believe that the light is breaking in upon the minds of others, who will ere long be set free from the withering influence of Partialism.

I have held several meetings of late in that section of this town and Fairhaven, called, 'The head of River'—and I am happy to say that that hitherto sterile region is actually putting forth some signs of life. Cold and indifferent professors are awaking from their slumbers; many who have been groping in darkness begin to see the light, and are anxious to know and feel and obey the truth; and, as you may well suppose, our tr[illegible] steadfast friends in that region, are thank[illegible] God and taking courage. The subject of building a Church in what is called the Village, has already been agitated, and if present indications are not deceptive, it will not end in talk. The Societies in Mattepoisett and Sippican are enjoying a season of prosperity under the judicious labors of our good Br. Vose; the former of which, I am told, intends to have preaching every Sabbath after the present winter. Thus is God building up Zion in this section.

But in the midst of all these tokens of good, Millerism, that product either of craft or delusion, unequalled for its seductive and withering effect, even by the Eastern-land speculation itself, has been raging among and around us with all its fury. Some have fallen before its blighting power, and been removed to the Hospital, raving maniacs; while vast multitudes have almost entirely neglected their domestic and secular concerns, that they might run to meeting from morn till night, and from night till morn, to be prepared for an event which the Bible nowhere declares is yet to come. But, thank Heaven, 1843 has come at last, and I am quite sure that its revelations will prove as fatal to this delusion, as the gospel itself is destined to prove to all other errors that may exist in the world.—But the wheels of time are rolling on, and the fleeting months of the year will soon have passed; and we may reasonably expect that in its expiring throes, this huge delusion will rant and rave and foam out its fury and its shame. But thanks to the wisdom and goodness of God for the conservative power, and almost Omnipotent energy of plain, simple gospel truth. It lives and moves while darkness reigns around, and holds in check the raging furies of men's invention. And when the mission of these apparent evils is accomplished, like the sun in the firmament, emerging from the warring elements and casting his mild beams over the face of terrified and trembling Nature, the gospel will arise in all its native loveliness and power, and send its tranquilizing and hallowing influence through all the channels of intellect and feeling. May Heaven hasten that happy era.

Thine truly, Thos. G. Farnsworth.

A Reason.

People sometimes complain to us, that we do not notice their letters. What is the reason?—A person accosted us a few days since in the street with the remark, 'Well, Mr. W. you have not explained that passage of Scripture yet.'—What passage, sir? 'O, the one I wrote about; I thought you could not explain it.' I know not what you mean, sir? 'O don't you remember I sent you a letter, and requested you to explain a certain text for me?' I do not, sir; I have read no letter from you. 'Indeed! why I certainly wrote you, and put it in the Post Office with my own hand—I do not see how it could have miscarried.' Perhaps it did not miscarry, sir. 'Why then (said he) did you not take it from the Post Office?' I do not take all letters from the Post Office, sir, that come directed to me, and perhaps yours was not taken out. 'Why should you not have taken it from the Post Office?' said he. To put an end to his wonder we asked him, whether he paid the postage on his letter? He acknowledged he did not. Well, friend, said we, the next time you write to have a passage explained, pay the postage on your letter; and then it will be taken from the Post Office. We cannot take every letter from the Office, whether it be paid or not. We must use our best judgment and discretion about that matter; and if persons would be sure to have their requests noticed, ought they not to pay the postage? Why should we pay it?

Conference in Lee, N. H.

Our brethren in old Strafford, N. H. have recently enjoyed a soul-stirring Conference meeting at Lee. Br. Henry Jewell has transmitted us the following account, for which he will please accept our thanks. It will be read with interest:

My Brother:—Full of the good spirit of the blessed gospel, I embrace this moment to inform you of the good meeting that we have enjoyed at Lee during this week. The Strafford Quarterly Conference held its second session in the above mentioned place, beginning on Tuesday evening and ending on Thursday at 9 o'clock. A good time we all had—a season of refreshing from the presence of the Most High. Although but five preachers were in attendance, still we had large congregations during the whole time, and seven sermons were delivered and three very interesting Conference Meetings were held. Our souls were cheered and minds fed by greeting and hearing from our faithful and well-tried Br., Abraham Norwood, of Canton, Mass. whom the Lord sent over to help us in the good work.

Our friends in Lee received us all with every indication of brotherly affection and Christian attachment; and I doubt not that the brethren and sisters who were present from Great Falls, Dover, Newmarket, Nottingham, Epping, &c. will long hold in grateful remembrance the people of Lee.

There is an unprecedented interest in the things of the kingdom in all the easterly section of this State. And for aught I know, on the western borders also. There seems to be a deep and stirring interest among the lay brethren in particular. There is renewed diligence, zeal, energy, warmth, willingness to sacrifice for the cause, and resolute determination, God helping, to do more for the advancement of that which is so blessed to the soul of the true believer.

I am glad that this day has dawned—good must be the result. New Hampshire, in some respects, has lived beneath her privilege in regard to our glorious faith. I grant, with heartfelt satisfaction, that there are many honorable exceptions; but I speak of the State as a whole—there has seemed to be a sort of incubus weighing her down. Some things are being removed out of the way, and a better state of things already appears. God hasten the happy period when his truth shall cover this whole State, and Zion shall rejoice in the triumph of truth. Our brethren in old Strafford are doing well. They are making efforts to secure the services of some brother to operate as a Missionary in the counties of Belknap, Carroll and Strafford. The Lord bless their movement, and make his face to shine upon them and give them peace. On the whole, we have great reason to be grateful and humble—diligent and zealous. Let all our Universalist brethren in this State look at Maine on the east, and Massachusetts on the south, and be stimulated to double their efforts to speed the good work. Amen. Yours, H. J.

Exeter, March 4, 1843.

P. S. I forgot to say that a good resolution was passed, unanimously, by asking the congregation to rise, in favor of the glorious Washingtonian movement. The moral movements of the age find many sympathizing hearts in this region. The following is the resolution referred to:

Resolved, That we recognize in the great and truly benevolent Washingtonian Temperance movement, one of the essential features of the gospel, and therefore feel imperatively called upon to give it our hearty and willing support both by precept and example.

Novel Petition.

Several petitions have been presented to the Legislature of Massachusetts, during a week or two past, that capital punishment may be abolished; and if it be judged inexpedient to abolish it, that the awfully solemn duty of executing the criminal may be transferred from the humane Sheriffs, to those of the clerical profession who are in favor of such a punishment. We know nothing of the manner in which these petitions originated. We happened to be in the House of Representatives, as a spectator, when the first one was presented. Several of the members seemed horror-struck. Mr. Gibbens, of Boston, who has generally been the leader of the rum party in the House, was the first to take the floor. He was overwhelmed with astonishment, if we may judge from his remarks; and was so deeply excited, he said, that he dare not proceed. He felt specially called upon to defend the clerical patrons of the halter. Others took part in the debate. The petitioners had immediate leave to withdraw. In a day or two afterward, another petition of the same description came in. It was referred to a committee, who, on the next day, reported that the petitioners have leave to withdraw. Subsequently a petition of the same character was presented in the Senate. We have said, we knew nothing of the origin of those petitions. They were doubtless intended to give notoriety to those clergymen, who have taken an active part in sustaining capital punishment, among whom stands preeminent our quondam antagonist Rev. Parsons Cooke.

If hanging must be continued, it certainly ought to be done by those who think it agreeable to the religion of Christ.

May we ask a favor.

By looking at our list of weekly receipts by mail, our readers will be led to suspect that our income at present is unusually small. We do not wish to dun,—it is unpleasant. But if our patrons will reflect that we are obliged to pay the Printer $48 per week, and the paper maker nearly as much more, besides all other expences, we do believe they will see the necessity of forwarding what they owe us. We ask only for justice.—Such as have paid will please accept our thanks. Those who have not paid will please remember, that every word of the above is intended for them. Only let our patrons do what they can do, and we will ask no more.

Chapin's Lectures.

The Philosophy of Reform; a Lecture delivered before the Berean Institute, in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, Jan. 20, 1843, with four discourses upon the same general topic, delivered in New York and Brooklyn. By Rev. E. H. Chapin. New York, C. L. Stickney, 130 Fulton Street. Small 12 mo. pp. 136.

The author of these discourses is so well known, that it can scarcely be necessary for us to recommend the little volume before us. There is much in it to thrill the soul and instruct the mind. We advise our readers to obtain a copy,—read it, meditate upon it, practice it.

Sears' New Monthly Family Magazine, No. 3, is received. We thank the publisher for transmitting us a copy. It is not filled with light fables, of no practical importance to any body; but abounds with solid fact, and is profitable to the rising generation. Saxton & Peirce, 133 1-2 Washington St., Publisher.

'The Prophecies of Daniel with their application and fulfilment. By Rev. L. L. Sadler.'—Portland, S. H. Colesworthy. Small 12 mo. pp. 152. Br. Sadler is well known to the Universalist community. The object of these lectures is to arrest the influence of Millerism. They evince much study of the prophecies; and we commend them to all who are seeking information on that topic.

Names and Titles of Christ.

This work, from the pen of Br. Charles Spear, has been republished in London, and favorably reviewed in the London Inquirer.

Read the letter on the first page from Mrs. Mary L. B. Woodman. It is full of scriptural authority. How fast are men and women coming to the knowledge of the truth.

The Boys' and Girls' Magazine for February, 1843, is received. It is edited by Mrs. S. Colman. This number is illustrated by several very handsome engravings. Price 12 1-2 cts. Boston, publishers, T. H. Carter & Co.

General Intelligence.

Municipal Court. From the Atlas, we learn that Chief Justice Williams is of opinion that a question might be raised whether the Legislature had passed a constitutional law in the one just enacted relative to the Municipal Court.—First—by the Constitution it is provided that the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas shall hold no other office under the government of the Commonwealth, the office of Justice of the Peace and Militia officers excepted. But by this law, the Legislature proposes to make them Judges of the Municipal Court also. Second—the Constitution requires all Judicial officers to be appointed by the Governor and Council—but here the Legislature, by its own act proposes to appoint the Judges of the Municipal Court. It was also suggested by a member of the Bar, that the city of Boston has or might have doubts as to the authority of the Legislature to require the city to pay into the State Treasury certain dollars for the purposes specified in the act.

Burglar Arrested. On the 13th of February last, the store of Mr. Joseph Ballister, No. 17 Central wharf, was entered in the night time, and one gold pencil case, a quantity of tobacco, and several bills of Exchange, were stolen therefrom. Also on the 17th of February, the store of Messrs Wainwright & Tappan, No. 25 Central wharf, was entered in the night time, and ten quarter boxes of Spanish cigars, of the value of $40 stolen therefrom. Constables Clapp and Andrews obtained a warrant last week, to search a Refreshment Room, occupied by Wm. Nugent, a colored man, situated in Richmond, near Ann st. The officers obtained the assistance of Shute Jr., and Bowdin, two very efficient Police officers, who are stationed in that section of the city, and proceeded to the premises of Nugent. On searching him, they found on his person two bills of Exchange, which were identified as the property of Mr. Ballister, and they subsequently found at other places, 7 boxes of the cigars, belonging to Messrs. Wainwright & Tappan, and a quantity of tobacco, which articles had been sold for about one third of their value. Nugent was taken into custody and committed to jail. He was discharged from our State Prison on the 17th of October last, having served the State 3 years, for a larceny committed on Commercial street, in this city.—Atlas.

Great Fire in Cincinnati! Several Men killed and many Wounded! The Baltimore correspondent of the New York Tribune, under date of the 2d inst., writes:

The Western Mail brings us an account of a dreadful fire which occurred in Cincinnati on the afternoon of the 25th ult., about five o'clock, by which seven men are known to have been killed, and twenty, more or less, seriously wounded.—The fire broke out in the smoke house of Messrs. Pugh & Alvord, at the corner of Walnut street and the canal. The smoke house stood in the rear, and was somewhat detached from the main building, by a wooden door which opened on a narrow passage. The fire, it was supposed, could be confined to the smoke house, by closing up the pork house on the main building, and this was accordingly done—all the windows and doors and shutters being closed.

In the course of half an hour, the main building was filled with smoke, rarified air and probably some inflamable gas, from the smoke house, and when the flames burst through the wooden door connecting the two buildings, an instantaneous roar of flame was perceived, and in the twinkling of an eye, the whole of this spacious, substantial building was a mass of ruins. The whole roof was lifted up in the air and thrown into the streets in large fragments—the second story walls on the north and south sides were thrown down, and the whole eastern end of both stories, fronting on Walnut, blown into the sts., from its foundation up.

The appearance of the explosion was awfully terrific, and its consequences fatal to several most estimable citizens. It is thought that from eight to twelve persons were immediately killed, and probably twenty severely wounded—some of them dangerously.

Of the number that were positively ascertained to be killed, this morning, were

Joseph Bonsall.
Caleb Taylor, of the late firm of Woodnut & Co.
H. S. Edmunds, pork packer.
J. S. Chamberlain, pattern maker.
John Ohle, a German laborer.

And two or three other German laborers, whose names we could not ascertain.

Of those most severely wounded, are

George Shillito, firm of Worthington, Shillito, & Co.
H. Thorpe. inspecter of pork.
T. G. Shaeffer, printer.
Mr. Alvord, firm of Pugh & Alvord.
Samuel Schooley, a lad.
Mr. Finch, carpenter.
John Blakemore, machinist.

And probably a dozen or twenty others, whose names we could not ascertain with certainty.

In view of the melancholy circumstances of the case, the loss of property is hardly worth mentioning. There were about 200,000 pounds of bacon in the smoke house, totally destroyed, fully insured, however. We understand there was also $6000 insurance on the pork house, which will rebuild it, as the lower floor and foundations are uninjured. The surrounding sheds and yards were filled with barrels of pork, bacon and lard which was generally got out without much injury.

The pork house was erected by a Mr. George W. Jones in 1830, for the late Bank of the U. S. and built in the most faithful and substantial manner throughout.

This is the largest fire that has taken place in this city since the 16th of last March, when the pork house occupied by R. W. Lee & Co. and Pugh & Alvord was destroyed. A similar explosion took place then, from the pent up smoke and gasses, which shattered the walls, but did little other damage, as the building was open and partly burned at the moment.

Further particulars. The Cincinnati Gazette of Monday states that the whole number of persons killed at the late fire in that city, so far as ascertained, is nine. Mr. H. O. Merrill is the only person killed whose name was not in the list we published yesterday. The number of persons severely wounded is fourteen, and about twenty are reported to be slightly wounded. The following wounded persons were not mentioned yesterday:—Lewis Wisby, John M. Vansickle, Joseph Tiefis, arm broken; A. Oppenheimer, Jas. Tyatt, Robert Rice, William H. Goodloe.

Taking it Coolly. On Tuesday, the 27th of Dec. last, James F. Taylor, Esq., of Hull, to Miss Betsey Edey, of the same place, were married. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. Williams, at 7 o'clock in the evening, upon the ice on the Chaudiere Lake. The reason assigned for selecting this cool retreat is that ministers of the Methodist persuasion are not authorized by the law to marry persons in Lower Canada.—The Reverend gentleman did not conceive that Hymen's torch would afford his optics sufficient light to read the marriage ceremony by, he had therefore provided himself with a lantern. After the knot was tied, the happy pair drove off for a more congenial clime to enjoy the honey moon. —Ottawa Advocate.

Fire in Worcster. We learn from Mr. Leonard, of the Worcester express, that a fire was discovered this morning, about one o'clock, in the brick building next door south of the Central Hotel, on Main street. It was principally occupied by Messrs. Spear & Farnsworth, as a restorateur and boarding-house, which, with its contents, was entirely destroyed. The fire had made such progress before it was discovered that the occupants of the building had barely time to escape with their lives.

The adjoining building known as the Central Exchange, was soon on fire, and notwithstanding the exertions of the firemen and citizens, was entirely destroyed. This building was occupied by the Post office, the Worcester Bank, the printing and publishing offices of the Worcester Palladium, the Worcester Waterfall, lawyers' offices, &c., and the amount of property consumed must be very large. We learn that there was an insurance on the building of $15,000, partly in Worcester, and partly in this city.

A livery stable, situated immediately in the rear of the exchange, owned by Nahum Parker, was also burned to the ground. We do not learn the amount of Mr. Parker's loss, or whether the building and contents were insured.

The 'Wool store,' a very large brick building in the rear of the one in which the fire was discovered, formerly used as a storehouse for wool, but latterly unoccupied except in the third story, was also entirely destroyed.

A letter received from the postmaster of Worcester says:—'All the letters, papers and property, belonging to the post-office, have been preserved—but they are in such a state of confusion as will cause some irregularity. I hope to restore order in a day or two.'

This is the most destructive fire that has occurred in Worcester for a number of years, and but for the praise-worthy exertions of the fire department, and the prompt and efficient aid rendered by the citizens, must have proved still more so, as the buildings burned were standing in the very centre of business, in close proximity to several large and valuable buildings. The Central Hotel was on fire several times, as also was the splendid mansion of Daniel Waldo, which stands but a few feet south of the Exchange.

P. S. Since the above was in type we have received a letter from a correspondent in Worcester, from which we learn that the books, papers, bills and specie of the Worcester Bank were removed to a place of security without loss. The printing materials belonging to J. B. Ripley, printer of the Palladium, were mostly saved—but the contents of the Waterfall office were entirely destroyed and but partially insured.—Mercantile Jour.

Earthquake in the West Indies. A slip from the office of the Washington, N. C. Whig, contains the particulars of an earthquake, which happened at St. Martin's, on the 8th of February. The first shock happened about ten o,clock in the morning, and lasted from three to four minutes; during which period, and for sometime after, the town, Phillipsburg, Netherland Division, exhibited a distressing scene. The heads of families out on business, were seen hastening home, scarcely able to keep their balance, owing to the agitated movements of the earth; some of them finding their wives, children, relatives, and servants in the yards, others in the streets; those that remained in their houses, in many cases, clasped together, imploring the Omnipotent hand, for pardon and mercy, expecting every moment to be the last. The noise and jar of furniture moving about, the breaking of glass, &c., &c., added to the creaking of the houses, and the awful roar of an earthquake, filled the boldest heart with fear and consternation. Many wall houses were much injured. The sand or earth forming the shores of the town, opened and rose in an extraordinary manner; showing the escape of confined air.

Disgraceful. Mr. Sprigg, Member of Congress, from Kentucky, on Thursday, last week, got into a fight with a person named Drudge, a miller's cart driver, which terminated in his opponent's biting the largest portion of his ear off! Dr. Sewall did his best to repair the mischief, but the fragment of Mr. Sprigg's ear, (which is now in the Doctor's possession) was too much lacerated to be restored, and the Hon. member will of course carry the mark of the scuffle to his grave. He is addicted to intemperance!

Statue of Washington in New York. It is in contemplation to erect a statue of Washington in the Park, to be executed by Stout, the American sculptor; the figure to be fifteen feet high, on a pedestal, with an elevation of twenty-five feet.—The figure to represent the outline of the form carved with a simple drapery, in the style of Michael Angelo. The ladies are enlisted, and it will go ahead, of course.

A new village has sprung up within a few years, on Machias river, 8 miles from Machias Port. In this village are ten first rate saw mills and five lath mills. A railroad connects this village with Machias Port. The mills can make from 300 to 400 thousand feet of lumber per week, and the railroad can transport about 20,000 feet a day from the mill to the port. The railroad, including the engine, cars, &c., cost $50,000—engine is of six tons weight and 50 horse power. The village is on a beautiful plain on the west bank of the river, and together with the railroad, and a large quantity of valuable timber lands further up the river is owned by gentlemen of Boston.—Newburyport Herald.

Accident. The Post states, that on Sunday evening, as Mr. Ball of the firm of Lows & Ball, was returning from Reading, his horse ran against some ice carlessly left in the road in Medford; the sleigh was upset, Mr. B. and the gentleman with him thrown out, and the former severely bruised about the face. The horse a valuable animal, was pursued a couple of miles, and found dead having come violently in contact with a bridge.

The United States Mails. It is stated that the U. S. mails during 1842, traversed 11,644,693 miles on horseback, 18,757,036 miles in coaches, and 4,424,282 miles by railroad and steamboat, during the year ending 30th June, 1842—total 34,835,991 miles; equal to 145 voyages to the moon, or 1393 voyages around the world. To go this distance would have occupied a locomotive for 154 years, running at the rate of 30 miles an hour, night and day, Sundays excepted.

A Goolsend. A few evenings since, as we learn from the Hartford Courant, as a Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon, of Winsted Village, Conn, were preparing to retire, they were started by the crying of a child in their bed-room, and on examination they found a female infant, about 3 months old, on their bed, together with a band-box of clothes. As Mr Sheldon has no children, says a Winsted correspondent of the Courant, and is independent of the world, except in this matter, he will no doubt consider it a valuable gift, and it could not have fallen into better hands.

Good Hauling. The schr. Mount Vernon, Capt. Wonson, of Gloucester, arrived at this port on Wednesday from George's Bank, only six days out, with a cargo of 550 live halibut, which weighed 22,000 pounds, and were purchased by Holbrook, Smith & Co., for 2 1-2 cents per lb., amounting to $550.—Post.

End of the World. On Tuesday, February 14, a woman travelled from her home in the country to Lowell, Mass., and on her arrival, asked for a night's lodging, and said she had come for the purpose of ascending up to heaven on the morrow, (Wednesday) with Elder Cole, and the other brethren of the city. She had her ascension robes all ready, and talked of the matter with great calmness.—Times.

Railroad Accident. When the morning train of cars which left Philadelphia on Monday, had reached within half a mile of Elizabethtown, in passing a cross road the engine came in collision with a top wagon, which an elderly lady, named Winans, was then driving over the rails. The body of the wagon, with its burthen, was received on the pilot of the engine, and carried along about 100 yards. Mrs. W's. collar bone was broken and she experienced a contusion of the skull which is thought to be dangerous. The horse's leg was broken. The engineer gave the usual warning before reaching the road.

Fair at Newton Upper Falls.

The Ladies of the Universalist Society at Newton Upper Falls, will hold a FAIR in that village, on the 28th, 29th, and 30th of March. The object of the Fair is to aid the Sunday School connected with the Society, in the purchase of a Library. It is to be hoped that there will be a liberal attendance of the friends of Sabbath Schools from Newton and the neighboring towns, to encourage the industrious and praiseworthy efforts of our ladies to advance the cause of religious and moral education. s.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. H. Jewell will preach in Epping, N. H. next Sunday.

Br. C. H. Webster will preach in West-Haverhill, next Sunday.

Br. J. Harriman will preach in Templeton on the 3d Sunday in March; and in Ashburnham on the 4th.

Br. L. R. Paige will preach in Lancaster on the 4th Sunday in March.

The opening buds and flowers of spring
Could scarcely with his charms compare;
The fragrance which soft zephyrs bring
Is not so sweet, is not so rare.

Dear lovely boy, thy smiling face
Oft have I seen with fond delight;
When in thy mother's soft embrace,
Thou didst my grateful eyes invite.

But thou art gone, sweet child, to rest
Where Eden's deathless lilies bloom;
Thy soft repose is on the breast
Of him who triumph'd o'er the tomb.

Let mourners wipe their tears, and raise
Their eyes to that sweet home above,
Where all shall join in songs of praise,
Of the immortal power of love. H. B.

In Watertown, Feb. 8, of scarlet fever, Clarissa Margaret, aged 14, eldest daughter of Mr. George and Mrs. Margaret Hill. This rising and hitherto happy family, have, for the last two weeks, been deeply afflicted with this dreadful disease; and it can be truly said, that the father alone hath escaped to tell the news. Miss Hill was beloved by all her acquaintance. Her disposition was always gentle and affectionate.—Her attachments to earth were many and her prospects bright. But this promising bud, ere it blooms, falls into an early tomb. While friends mourn their loss, and while those eyes which oft beamed with sweet expressions of love and kindness are filled with tears, thou, dear girl, art enjoying the sweets of eternal rest in the bosom of thy God, who has called thee to himself before the days of sadness and grief thickened upon thee, and furrowed thy face with anxious sorrows. Thy seat in heaven was first prepared; soon we shall follow thee, and meet in that world where we shall be freed from all pain and sickness, and no more feel affliction's dart, or the eyes be dimmed with tears, but all being subdued to Christ, shall live and reign in love, and be forever with their God.

In Watertown, very suddenly, of scarlet fever, Thos. L., only child of Thomas L. and Esther French, aged 5 years. The deceased was a promising and affectionate child, and his early departure has filled the hearts of his fond and doating parents with deep anguish.—We commend them to the thrice blessed gospel of our risen Saviour for that consolation which they so much need. May the hope of a reunion with the loved and lost of earth, cheer them as they travel homeward to the skies, and at last, when earth with its busy cares and corroding sorrows shall recede forever from their vision, may the everlasting Father of man vouchsafe unto them a triumphant entrance into that world where all is bliss, glory, immortality. Bells, Clocks, Organs. George H. Holbrook, East Medway, Mass. manufactures Church Bells, Church Clocks and Church Organs.
Holbrook's BELLS are well known. It is the general testimony of those who are judges, and who have had opportunities of forming an opinion, that his Bells are the best which are manufactured in the United States, both for strength and brilliancy of tone. The best Bells in Boston, New York, and other great cities, are from Holbrook's Foundry.
Mr. Holbrook's CLOCKS are well known. There are probably a greater number of tower Clocks in Massachusetts manufactured by him, than any other man. He has facilities for manufacture, which enable him not only to make good Clocks, but to undersell all other manufacturers. These are the causes of the great number he has sold.
His ORGANS may be judged of by the Organ at the Marlboro' Chapel, which is from his manufacture.
The public are assured that it will be for their interest to call, if they wish to purchase either Bells, Clocks or Organs.

Fourth Edition of Confer ence Hymns. The fourth edition of the Conference Hymns is now out of press. Br. Everett, of Salem, said a few days since, 'I desire, Br. Whittemore, to return you my unfeigned thanks for getting up your little book of Conference Hymns and Tunes.—It is one of the best things for Conference Meetings ever published. Our Conference Meetings have become very large, and very interesting; and this book has been a great help. The music is easy to sing, interesting in its character; those who cannot read music catch the tunes easily; and in this way almost all who attend the meetings are led to join in the singing.'
